The "Athenaeum" Portrait of GEORGE WASHINGTON

By GILBERT STUART

This was the last of three original portraits of George Washington by Gilbert Stuart, and was painted in 1796. It was not finished and Stuart refused to dispose of it, using it for making many copies. It is generally accepted as the standard portrait, and a reproduction of this portrait in poster size was placed in every school room in the United States and in many schools and libraries abroad by the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission. This portrait of George Washington and the companion portrait of Martha Washington are owned by the Boston Athenaeum, and are exhibited in the Museum of Fine Arts at Boston.

THE WHITE HOUSE
WASHINGTON

June 1, 1933

My dear Mr. Bloom:

It is most gratifying to learn that the Celebration of the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington was observed during 1932 in 259 cities in 81 countries outside the boundaries of the United States. This event was without precedent as a spontaneous expression of international courtesy and good will.

I have been impressed by the significance of this unusual tribute. People of other nations have learned much of the philosophy of our government in a way that was clear and effective. It was, I believe, probably the greatest lesson in history and political development ever given the peoples of the world by any one government.

We are deeply indebted to our neighbors for this gracious and magnanimous foreign participation in our Bicentennial Celebration.

Very sincerely yours,

Hon. Sol Bloom, Director,
United States George Washington
Bicentennial Commission,
Washington, D. C.

PREFACE

THIS volume of the general report of the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission, which contains the accounts of Foreign Participation in the Celebration of the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington, is in some respects the most interesting and important publication ever issued by this Commission. In it are found references to Bicentennial observances and events taking place in 81 countries and 259 cities outside the boundaries of the United States during the Bicentennial Year of 1932. As stated by President Franklin D. Roosevelt in his letter, reproduced on another page, "This event was without precedent as a spontaneous expression of international courtesy and good will," and, "People of other nations have learned much of the philosophy of our government in a way that was clear and effective."

It must be understood that neither the Congress nor the Commission asked or directly invited foreign participation in the great Celebration. All that was intended was to call attention to the event and give other nations and peoples of other lands the opportunity to join with us in such manner and to the extent they desired. This accounts for the interesting variety of celebrations abroad.

Rulers, parliaments, heads of government, statesmen and leaders of thought and culture in all parts of the world, joined with generous enthusiasm in honoring the memory of the Father of our Country. As George Washington was the chief exponent of the theory of political liberty in a world then filled with tyranny and oppression, it seemed appropriate in 1932, after a century and a half of the operation of George Washington's plan of government, that an account should be taken of his influence upon the world of today. This was the keynote of the scholarly and dignified addresses of statesmen and students of history in other nations. And the greatness of George Washington as it now shines upon mankind, finds reflection in the liberty and political enlightenment that encircle the earth.

Included in this volume are certain selections from the general literary material published by the Commission, in order that added value be given it in its use by statesmen and students of foreign countries. Indeed, the number of inquiries from abroad that have come to the Commission for more historical material on George Washington and his time, has been greatly appreciated, and it was largely in response to these many requests from other countries that the additional material already in print was given a place in the book.

On behalf of this Commission I want to express our sincere gratitude to all who have so unselfishly joined in this inspiring world tribute. We are especially appreciative of the generous help we have received from Foreign Diplomatic representatives in the United States, our own State Department and Diplomatic representatives abroad, as well as many other officials of our government, foreign governments and citizens of this and other lands.

The effect of our happy mutual cooperation, leading to a clearer understanding among nations of the principles of human relationship laid down by the founders of our own Republic, will continue through succeeding centuries to encourage peace and good will among men.

SOL BLOOM,
Director,
UNITED STATES GEORGE WASHINGTON
BICENTENNIAL COMMISSION

PUBLISHED BY THE UNITED STATES GEORGE WASHINGTON BICENTENNIAL COMMISSION

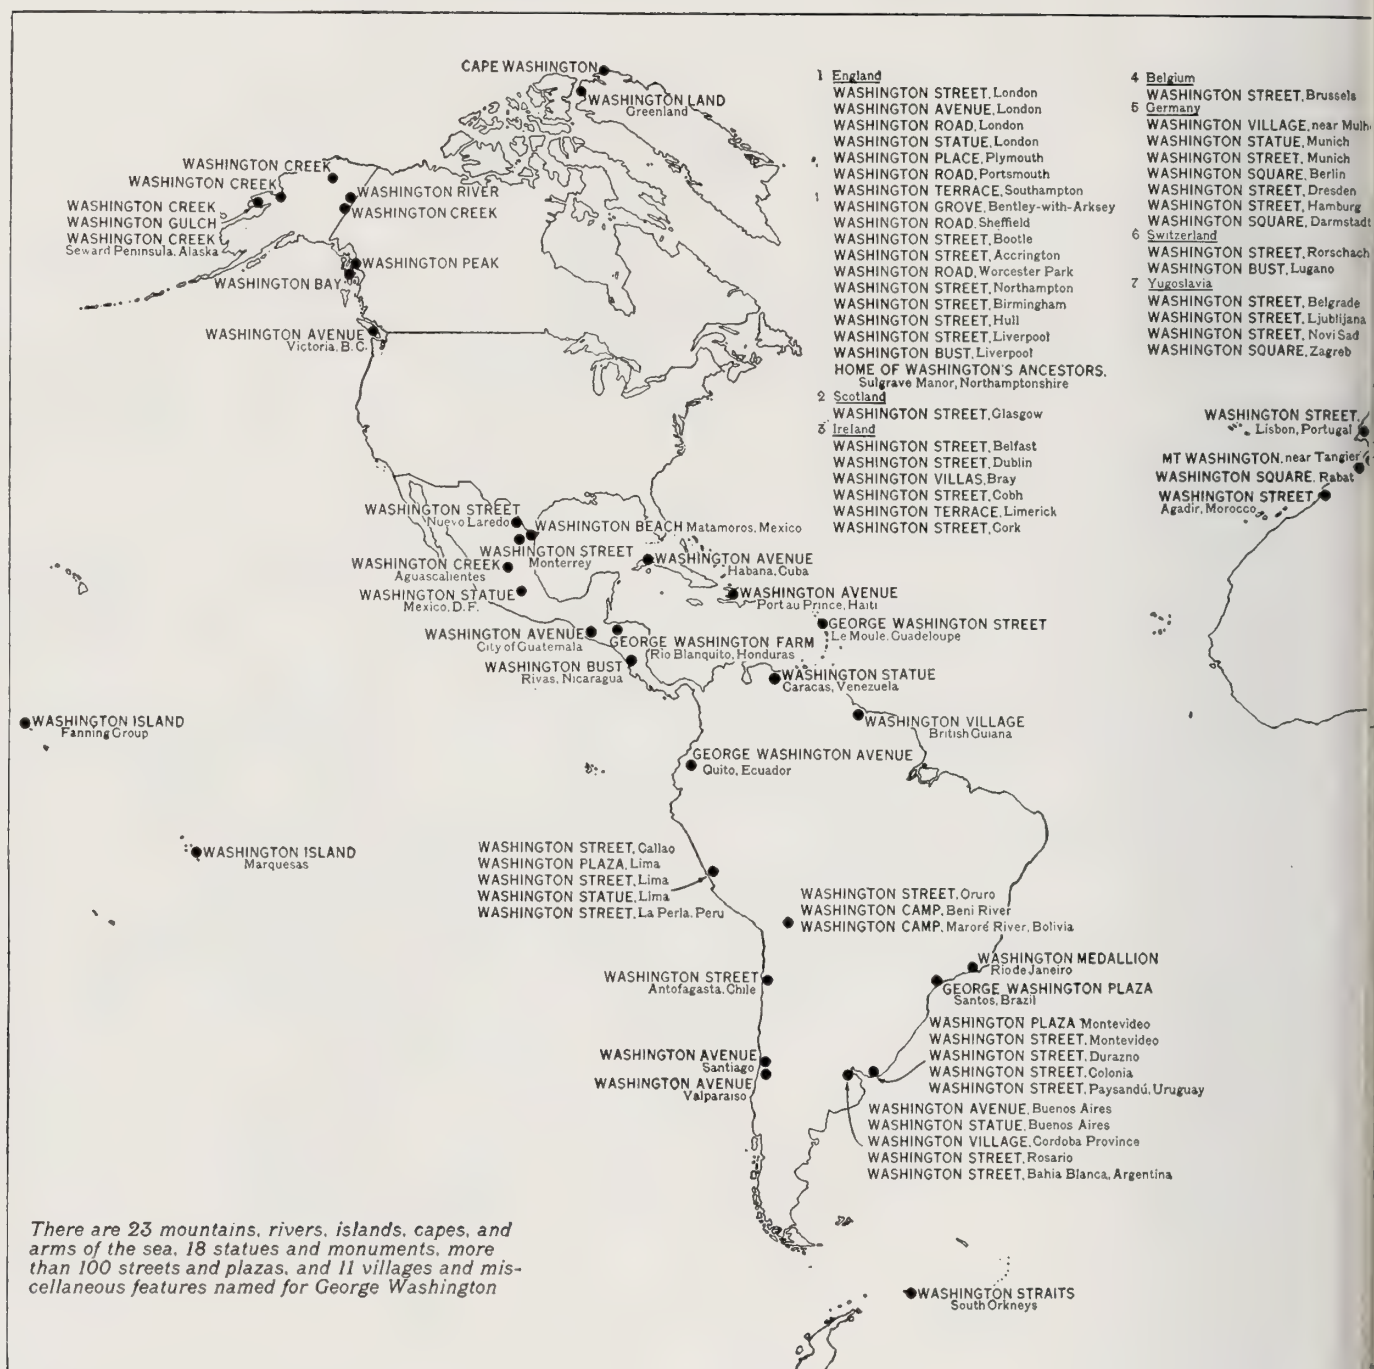

Plate No. 4

The name of Washington is familiar to people living in the far places of the earth. Monuments, streets, squares, buildings and geographical features bear the patriot's name. From Cape Washington on the bleak coast of Greenland within the Arctic Circle, to Washington Straits of the South Orkneys almost within the Antarctic Circle, on the Western Hemisphere, the name of Washington dots the maps of two continents. From Bergen, Norway, to Nelson, New Zealand, are scores of similar reminders of the love which all humanity bears our First President. Some of these memorials are old, but many are new. The hundreds of George Washington Bicentennial Celebrations in foreign countries reawakened interest in the great American and as the years pass no doubt many additional memorials will be established to show world tribute to the man his countrymen have so signally honored during the Two Hundredth Anniversary year of his birth.

FOREIGN PARTICIPATION IN THE GEORGE WASHINGTON BICENTENNIAL CELEBRATION

 A RECORD of universal acclaim for one man two hundred years after his birth this book is unique. It stands alone and unparalleled.

The Celebration of the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington was world-wide. Never before have so many nations, so many millions of people everywhere, joined with spontaneous enthusiasm in paying honor to the memory of one man.

In every part of the world it was evident that the people of other lands and American residents abroad welcomed the opportunity to give public expression to the sentiments inspired by the name of Washington.

Interest was sustained in an unprecedented manner from February 22 until Thanksgiving Day, November 24, 1932. Bicentennial ceremonies were continued at intervals throughout the entire period, breaking all records for such observances.

Congress in the Act of December 2, 1924, creating the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission, authorized the Commission, "if the participation of other nations in the commemoration be deemed advisable, to communicate with Governments of such nations." Foreign participation in the celebration became the subject of conferences between representatives of the Commission and the Department of State early in 1931, and it was decided that the Government of the United States would issue no invitations to any other government to join in the observance, but would supply informally to all governments and all peoples information concerning the plans of the United States Government and people to observe this anniversary in 1932. In supplying this information the Department of State and other branches of the Federal Government cooperated with the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission.

Many channels were employed to transmit information concerning the plans for the celebration to foreign governments and peoples and to Americans residing abroad. Printed material issued by the Commission—historical articles relating to George Washington and his contemporaries, suggested programs for local bicentennial ceremonies in the cities and towns of the United States, pictures and similar material—was sent, through the State Department and directly by the Commission, to all diplomatic representatives of foreign governments in Washington, to all American diplomatic and consular officers abroad, to American clubs, chambers of commerce and other groups in foreign countries, to American missionaries and educational institutions abroad, to American business concerns maintaining foreign branches, to individuals in many parts of the world, and, in fact, to any person or organization—American or foreign—showing interest in the plans for the celebration. The Department of Commerce gave valuable assistance by sending information and printed material, furnished by the Commission, to its representatives in foreign countries, who in turn distributed it to foreigners and Americans residing abroad.

Long before his death George Washington was recognized as a man whose fame would extend beyond his own country. In other countries in 1932 he was hailed as a citizen of the world, whose fame had increased with the passing years. All peoples recognized in him their own ideals of unselfish patriotism, love of freedom and nobility of character.

The honor paid to the memory of George Washington in 1932 reflected honor upon the country which produced him. American diplomats in their official reports to the Department of State and to the Commission repeatedly declared that the bonds of international friendship had been greatly strengthened by the Bicentennial Celebrations in the countries to which they were accredited.

COMPILED FROM OFFICIAL REPORTS

The accounts in this volume of George Washington Bicentennial Celebrations in foreign countries have been compiled from official reports received by the Department of State and the Commission from American Ambassadors, Ministers and Consuls, from foreign diplomatic missions in Washington, from American and foreign organizations and individuals in other lands, and from currently published accounts in foreign newspapers and magazines.

The order in which the reports are arranged in this volume is in accordance with the order in which the diplomatic representatives accredited to the United States were officially received as published in the official Diplomatic List of February 22, 1932. Reports from countries and political divisions in the category of colonies or dependencies follow the reports from the nations with which they are associated. Reports from independent countries, or political divisions which do not fall into either of the above classifications, are printed next in order.

Although the Commission has made every possible effort to see that these reports are complete, in some instances they represent inadequately the extent of the Bicentennial observances abroad. It is known that celebrations of various kinds have been held by schools, churches, fraternal organizations and other groups in some countries without being reported. If more space is given to activities in some countries than in others, it is because the reports received by the Commission have been more extensive in some instances than in others. In every case all material that the Commission has been able to obtain relating to foreign participation, including written matter and illustrations, has been consulted to the fullest extent in preparing this book.

One of the most remarkable things about the part taken by other countries in this celebration is the knowledge of George Washington and his times displayed by foreign writers and speakers who are quoted in this volume. No attempt has been made to correct errors of fact in such quotations. Considered as a whole, they are striking evidence of the deep impression made upon the minds of intelligent persons the world over by the character and achievements of George Washington.

He is probably better known today than any other world figure.

The interest aroused by the literature published by the Commission and distributed throughout the world, and by the world-wide Bicentennial observances, has gone a long way toward bringing about this situation. It was a primary purpose of the celebration, as planned by the Commission, to inculcate in the hearts of all peoples a knowledge of the life and ideals of George Washington. This volume is overwhelming proof of success in this respect among the peoples of foreign lands.

GREAT INTEREST DISPLAYED ABROAD

To comply with requests for information and assistance from foreign governments, from foreign societies and groups of all kinds, as well as from individual citizens of other lands and Americans residing abroad, the Commission found it necessary to set up a special section, which became known as the Division of Foreign Participation. The work of this division expanded during the years 1931 and 1932 until it was mailing to foreign countries, at the peak of its activity, several hundred letters a day and thousands of printed pamphlets and pictures.

In no instance did the United States Government spend any money for foreign celebrations, nor was any money requested for that purpose. Foreign governments and peoples, and Americans residing abroad, provided everything themselves, except the printed matter sent without charge by this Commission.

George Washington Bicentennial Celebrations were held in eighty-one foreign countries and more than two hundred and seventy-five foreign cities.

Foreign participation took many forms. Kings, queens, presidents, premiers and cabinet ministers of foreign governments took an active part, addressing their parliaments and public meetings and broadcasting speeches over international radio hookups. Many heads of foreign governments sent Bicentennial messages to the President of the United States both at the beginning of the celebration on February 22, and at the close on Thanksgiving day, November 24, 1932.

Thirty-three cities in seventeen countries named streets, boulevards, parks and squares for George Washington during 1932. In addition Turin, Italy, named a new bridge for him; Vienna, a municipal apartment house. In Saigon, French Indo-China, and in Florence, Italy, beautiful monuments were erected to Washington. A medal in honor of George Washington was struck by the French Mint. School children of the Village of Washington, in Durham County, England, exchanged flags with school children of Washington, D. C. The American colony in Stuttgart, Germany, raised more than $11,000 to endow a library of American books in that city to be known as the George Washington Memorial Library. Haiti declared February 22 a national holiday. The municipal authorities of Budapest, Warsaw, Johannesburg, and a number of other cities planted commemorative trees. Poland issued a new postage stamp bearing the likenesses of Washington, Kosciuszko and Pulaski to commemorate the Bicentennial. In Italy, Germany, France, England, and other countries public lectures were held; and in practically every country in the world there were special observances in the schools. In Japan, Canada, several Latin American countries, Madagascar, and elsewhere George Washington essay contests were held in the schools.

Copies of the Athenaeum portrait of George Washington, painted by Gilbert Stuart, were sent by the Commission through the State Department to every American embassy, legation and consulate. That these fine portraits, lithographed in colors, supplied a long-felt need was evident from the letters received by the Commission. One American Minister wrote:

I cannot close this letter without congratulating you . . . Thanks especially to the Commission, excellent portraits of Washington may now be seen, appropriately framed, in practically every Government establishment in the world. . . .

Many of these portraits were also presented to educational and other public institutions abroad. Similarly, a chart published by the Commission, portraying in colors the development of the American flag, was distributed to all of our diplomatic and consular offices, and to many foreign educational institutions and libraries.

Walnut seedlings and seeds from walnut trees at Mount Vernon were furnished by the National Nut Tree Planting Project, in cooperation with the Commission, to every American-owned diplomatic and consular office located where climatic and soil conditions were favorable to their growth. As a result, there are now more than forty of these trees growing in the grounds of American official residences and offices abroad.

CEREMONIES ORGANIZED LOCALLY

The Commission did not have foreign representatives, nor did it name bicentennial committees abroad. In most cases American diplomatic or consular representatives were associated with committees of foreigners and resident Americans who organized the ceremonies. In capital cities, where Americans were numerous and in many cases already organized, American ambassadors, ministers and consular officers joined American groups in cooperating actively with foreign governments and societies. In numerous smaller places American consuls themselves organized ceremonies among members of the American colonies.

Besides communicating with every American diplomatic and consular representative, the Commission sent information to practically every American chamber of commerce, trade organization, club and educational institution abroad. Responses were immediate and requests came from every corner of the globe for assistance in celebrating the anniversary. The Commission sent historical data for speeches, information, photographs, and matrices for use by the press; plays, pageants, music and costume designs; cuts and photographs for use on printed programs, and other material.

A record of the splendid results of the Bicentennial activities abroad may be found in the files of the Commission. There are newspaper clippings—bundles of them in some instances—from almost all of the eighty-one countries where Bicentennial Celebrations were held, one of the most unusual being a special children's page in a Japanese newspaper featuring stories and pictures of Washington. There are copies of invitations and programs, originally and beautifully commemorating foreign celebrations of this great anniversary. There are unique posters announcing Bicentennial events in English and in foreign languages. There are translations of biographies of Washington published in honor of the Bicentennial, special editions of magazines and issues of government organs honoring the First President of the United States. There are hundreds of photographs from every corner of the globe recording commemorative assemblies, dedications of statues, streets, parks, and buildings to George Washington, tree planting, balls, receptions, plays and pageants. All these are striking evidence of the way foreign governments and rulers, municipalities, organizations and citizens joined in the Bicentennial Celebrations in foreign countries.

One of the most gratifying results of the Bicentennial Celebration was the increase in mutual understanding and friendship which it brought about between the United States and other nations. The character of George Washington has a powerful appeal to all peoples without regard to nationality. In the honor paid to this world-citizen esteem for the man naturally encompassed the nation that gave him birth; and, in becoming better acquainted with its First President and its early history, foreign peoples gained a better understanding of the United States of America. Formal political and diplomatic ties found new and deeper roots in a stronger friendship of people for people. . . .

The Commemoration of the Washington Bicentennial . . . has broken the chain of traditional hostility . . . It is certain that a new appreciation has been created of the friendliness now existing between our two peoples. . . .

This is the statement of an American Consul in an official report to the Department of State.

CELEBRATION IN THE UNITED STATES

It will be of interest to readers of this volume to have a brief summary of the George Washington Bicentennial Celebration within the boundaries of the United States.

Essentially this was an American celebration and the major efforts of the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission were directed to organizing the celebration in the homes and communities of the United States. How this was accomplished, and the tremendous amount of work required in the process, will not be touched upon here. The results, however, are important.

Active promotion of the celebration was begun in the spring of 1930 and the work was so correlated that it included contact with every city and town; every church, school, patriotic, civic and agricultural group; every boy and girl unit; all libraries, memorial tree-planting committees and thousands of miscellaneous organizations.

In the 123,153 cities, towns and villages in the United States, 126,870 municipal and community programs were given. In the 212,159 churches, there were 210,320 programs. Of the 98,356 fraternal, patriotic and civic organizations 85,344 carried out 156,435 programs. There are 887,073 school units in the United States and these units presented 3,548,292 school programs. The 77,680 women's organizations, held 316,221 Bicentennial Celebrations. In addition to women's organizations there were 148,560 committees composed entirely of women who presented 435,247 programs.

By agricultural organizations, totalling 108,439, programs were given to the number of 240,167. There are 44,669 boy and girl scout units which gave bicentennial programs during the year to the number of 153,478. More than 73,000 schools entered the Declamatory and Essay Contests conducted by the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission and the reports of these schools filed with this Commission indicate that approximately 30,000,000 school children in public, private and parochial schools and institutions of higher learning, participated in some form of observance in honor of George Washington.

A poster-picture, in colors, of George Washington was placed in every school room in the United States, numbering 901,164 and a similar poster representing Wakefield, the birthplace of George Washington, was placed in 96,438 post offices and other public buildings. More than 30,000,000 trees were planted as memorials to George Washington. To summarize the activities of this Commission, 1,555,755 municipalities and organizations were contacted. Committees were appointed to the number of 894,224 and the total number of programs presented, as reported to the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission, was 4,760,345. In addition to these activities, there were a number of outstanding events of an impressive character—national, state and municipal. Memorial coins and a series of Commemorative Postage Stamps were contributed by the Federal Government. Wakefield, the birthplace of George Washington, was restored as a national monument.

The Mount Vernon Memorial Highway, which is one of the most beautiful boulevards in the world, was completed by the Federal Government in the year 1932 as a bicentennial feature. This boulevard is about fifteen miles long and connects Mount Vernon, the home of George Washington, with the City of Washington. It skirts the Potomac River and is not only beautiful, but is one of the most interesting and historic drives in America. The highway enters the National Capital over the great Arlington Memorial Bridge spanning the Potomac River, which also was completed in 1932.

Another project of the Federal Government is the establishment of the George Washington Memorial Parkway, an extension of the National Capital's beautiful park system, to the Great Falls of the Potomac River with elaborate park areas on both sides of the river.

These are only the barest outlines, but they will serve to impress the reader with the amazing results achieved by this Commission in carrying out the mandate of the Congress, and will indicate to participants abroad the character and scope of the celebration in the homeland.

AMERICANS PRESENT IN SPIRIT

Americans at home and abroad have been warmly appreciative of the honor paid to George Washington by foreign governments in 1932 and have been deeply impressed by the friendly attitude of foreign peoples toward the United States, as expressed in the Bicentennial Celebrations. An American foreign officer expressed it in these words:

The American nation has been present in spirit at each of the innumerable gatherings which have been arranged spontaneously in foreign countries to do honor to the memory of George Washington. American citizens travelling in foreign lands will point with pride to the public squares, boulevards, avenues and streets which, during this Bicentennial Year, have been named in honor of their illustrious leader. Their children will stand reverently with uncovered heads in the shade of the noble trees which have this year been planted in foreign lands; in spots already rich in local tradition and in historic interest, to commemorate the George Washington Bicentennial.

GEORGE WASHINGTON'S BOOKPLATE

This bookplate George Washington had engraved for his personal use, and copies of it are found in the surviving books. In his letter of November 22, 1771, to Robert Adam, a friend who was going to England, he requested him to get "a Plate with my Arms engravd and 4 or 500 Copies struck." The copperplate was made by S. Valliscure, and 500 prints were sent over. The original plate has been recently found. The coat of arms is that which through many generations was borne by the Washington family, there being slight variations from branch to branch and from generation to generation, especially in the crest. It is probable that the coat as George Washington used it was brought over by a great-grandfather on a signet ring inherited from an uncle. The history of the motto is obscure. The coat was of silver or white with the bars and stars red; the raven of the crest, black; or, in heraldic terms: Argent, two bars gules, in chief three mullets of the second; crest, a raven proper, wings endorsed, issuing out of a ducal coronet or.

ITALY

THE ITALIAN GOVERNMENT and people joined in the world-wide tribute to the memory of George Washington during 1932 with a series of celebrations unequalled in magnitude and importance by any tribute to a foreign hero in the history of modern Italy.

King Victor Emmanuel committed himself and his country to the Bicentennial in the following cablegram on the occasion of the official opening of the celebration:

ROME, FEBRUARY 22, 1932.

HIS EXCELLENCY
PRESIDENT HOOVER,
WASHINGTON, D. C.

ITALY, WHICH ADMIRES THE GREAT MERITS OF GEORGE WASHINGTON, CELEBRATES TODAY WITH CORDIAL ENTHUSIASM THE TUTELARY GENIUS OF THE GREAT FRIENDLY NATION. BE GOOD ENOUGH, MR. PRESIDENT, TO ACCEPT THE EXPRESSION OF THESE SENTIMENTS ON THIS GLORIOUS BICENTENNIAL.

VITTORIO EMANUELE.

The admiration of the Italian people for the First President of the United States was again officially expressed, months later, in the following message:

WASHINGTON, D. C., November 24, 1932.

HONORABLE HENRY L. STIMSON,
SECRETARY OF STATE.

The Chargé d'Affaires of Italy has the honor to communicate to His Excellency, the Secretary of State, the following message just received from the head of the Italian Government with the request that the Secretary kindly convey it to the President of the United States:

ON THE OCCASION WHEN THE CELEBRATIONS OF THE TWO HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE BIRTH OF GEORGE WASHINGTON COME TO AN END, THE FASCIST GOVERNMENT WISHES TO ASSURE THE GOVERNMENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF THE CORDIAL SENTIMENTS WITH WHICH THE ITALIAN NATION HAS JOINED WITH THE UNITED STATES IN HONORING THE GREAT PATRIOT, SOLDIER AND STATESMAN. THESE CELEBRATIONS DURING 1932 HAVE MADE STRONGER THE BONDS OF FRIENDSHIP WHICH EVER UNITED THE AMERICAN AND ITALIAN PEOPLES.

MUSSOLINI.

The Bicentennial Year coincided with a revival of hero worship in Italy and the Italian people recognized in the character of George Washington the qualities of their own immortals. Amedeo Fani, Italian Undersecretary of State for Foreign Affairs, stressed this feature of the George Washington Bicentennial Celebration in Italy, when he said in a notable public address at Milan:

In the second centenary of the birth of George Washington, Fascist Italy, which, reconsecrating every spiritual value against invading materialism, has re-established hero worship because it feels and comprehends that the invisible power of God avails itself of these champions of the ideal to reveal to the ignorant the eternal laws of truth and justice, has willed solemnly to celebrate the memory of the American hero, who as warrior, as statesman and as man, was the noblest, the purest and the least selfish among the creators of the independence of his country.

The national importance of the anniversary in Italy was evinced by the creation of a committee to supervise its observance throughout the kingdom. Prince Ludovico Spada Potenziani, Senator of the Kingdom and former Governor of Rome, was made chairman, and the other members were the following eminent Italians and Americans in Rome: Professor Franco Bruno Averardi; Professor Federico Chabod; Agostino Depretis, Minister Plenipotentiary; Nelson Gay, director of the American Library in Rome; Astorre Lupattelli, president of the Royal University for Foreigners, Perugia; Professor Arturo Marpicati, Vice Secretary, National Fascist Party; Count Francesco Pellati, Supervising Inspector of Fine Arts; Sig. Gaetano Polverelli, Chief of the Press Office of the Chief of Government; Sig. Omero Ranelletti, counselor of the Italo-American Association; Professor Gorham P. Stevens, director of the American Academy in Rome; and Sig. Fulvio Suvich, Commissioner of Tourism.

Under the direction of this committee and with the sanction and encouragement of the Government the Bicentennial observance occurred on a nation-wide scale. Rome and Florence named streets in honor of George Washington; in Florence a monument also was erected to him and in Turin a new bridge was given his name—the first of eight Turin bridges to be named for anyone not an Italian.

A distinctive feature of the Bicentennial celebration in Italy was its cultural aspect. Many public lectures were delivered under the auspices of Italian and Italo-American organizations, while lecture and study courses were conducted in the high schools and colleges by the Ministry of National Education. The purpose underlying this feature of the celebration was twofold: to honor the First President of the United States and at the same time to give to the Italian people a better understanding of the nation he founded.

OPENING CELEBRATION IN ROME

The Bicentennial Celebration in Italy opened with a notable reception on February 21, 1932, at the Palazzo Salviati in Rome, under the auspices of the Italo-American Society, when addresses were delivered by Signor Amedeo Fani, Undersecretary of State for Foreign Affairs; Count Giuseppe Volpi di Misurata, President of the Italo-American Society and former Minister of Finance, and Hon. John W. Garrett, the Ambassador of the United States.

The names of those in attendance were "indicative of the importance attributed to this reception," said Ambassador Garrett in his report to the Department of State. The list also included: Grand Admiral Thaon di Revel, Duca del Mare; Signor Federzoni, President of the Senate; General de Bono, Minister of the Colonies; Prince Boncompagni Ludovisi, the Governor of Rome, and Prince Spada Potenziani, President of the George Washington Bicentennial Commission of Italy.

To a large and distinguished audience of Italians and Americans Signor Fani, in an impressive address of welcome, outlined the purposes of the celebration. He declared that it was the intention of his country to join the American people in honoring the memory of "the noblest among the founders of the United States," in a series of manifestations throughout Italy during the same period set aside in the United States for the commemoration. Paying tribute to Washington's virtues in public and private life, Signor Fani said that history presents him as one of those rare examples of manhood which all humanity seeks to emulate. The celebration, he said, would solidify the bonds existing between Italy and the United States.

Signor Fani concluded his remarks as follows:

In the name of Washington, which through the initiative of the Italo-American Society has been re-invoked here this evening, I express the hope that in a fusion of aspirations and ideals, America and Italy, standard-bearers of civilized progress, may mark out for humanity the world's upward path.

Count Volpi was then introduced and in an eloquent, forceful address pictured the many qualities of George Washington's character which made him chief among the builders of the United States. He spoke of the resemblance of Garibaldi and Cavour to Washington, stating that these two famous Italians appeared to have assumed many of the great American's virtues. George Washington's most impressive characteristic, according to Count Volpi, was his sense of proportion. This quality, he said, was especially needed today by all world leaders, and he expressed the hope that Washington's memory would be celebrated everywhere by a return to "the eternal safeguard of men—the sense of proportion."

The earliest struggles between the English and French in America in the middle of the eighteenth century seemed unnecessary in those days; so much so that Voltaire wrote in "Candide" that the two nations were warring "for a few snow-covered slopes along the Canadian side" and that they were spending more in this war than all Canada could possibly be worth. A fallacious prophecy it was, as often happens in history. These first uncertain movements, in fact, were thirty years later to transform through the course of two long wars, the thirteen modest English colonies into the United States of America; and, slightly less than two hundred years later, into the great Republic of forty-eight states and 130 millions of inhabitants—a republic so large and powerful as to be recognized and called throughout the world by the name of an entire continent: America. And we are here to pay homage to America in the majestic and immortal figure of her greatest builder, the second centennial of whose birth occurs tomorrow.

Not to me should the honor fall of being the first to speak of George Washington in the celebration which Fascist Italy has arranged in his honor, for I can boast of no virtue as a biographer and historian. The honor is mine solely by reason of my presidency of this Italo-American Association, which position I hold through the kindly designation of its members and through the desire of the Chief of Government.

ROME HONORS GEORGE WASHINGTON. ONE OF THE STREETS OF THE VILLA UMBERTO WAS NAMED FOR THE FIRST PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES AT A SOLEMN BICENTENNIAL CEREMONY IN 1932.

In history George Washington, like few men and few leaders, stands as the very expression of his country, and his activity identified itself harmoniously whether it was merely because of the greatness of his character that this man so powerfully influenced the destinies of his country, or whether it was not rather that he was the complete man fitted to answer the needs of his country, such as Providence at rare times sends to peoples in their critical historic moments in order to insure their destinies.

To me, a Latin and an Italian, George Washington, who never set foot upon European soil, seems a Latin hero and an Italian spirit of the Risorgimento. He was profoundly devoted to the memories of Rome. His work as statesman and general has been often and correctly compared, even during his lifetime, to the work of Fabius Quintus Maximus "cunctator." His three returns to the land—after his first command of the Virginian troops, after the dictatorship which created the United States, and after his second presidency—have justly made him comparable to Lucius Quintus Cincinnatus.

Washington also seems close to two of the great men of our national Risorgimento, and it seems that, in turn, these two Latins assumed some of his qualities: Garibaldi and Cavour.

These men and their works unite us in respect and gratitude, unite our faith in the immortal virtues which the voices of one's own soil express and renew throughout the centuries.

Count Volpi then referred to Washington's life in its various phases, from his youth and early activity in agriculture to the first hard military trials which began in his twenty-first year; from the chief command of the Virginian troops to his return to Mount Vernon in 1758. He went on to examine the causes of the Revolutionary War and the fatal process of the separation of the colonies from the mother country, over which process presided the determination and courage of the American hero.

Count Volpi dwelt upon the fifteen years of private and family life of the gentleman of Mount Vernon which preceded the Revolution, and upon the decisive cycle of the war, continuing:

The Declaration of Rights of the Philadelphia Congress proclaimed to the world the problem of American independence. To the ensuing war, France lent her support, first with Lafayette's volunteers and later with the dispatch of regular troops. With the Yorktown victory and the surrender of the English general, Cornwallis, in October, 1781, the war ended. There followed the Peace of Paris (September 3, 1783) which recognized American independence. Thus arose the United States of America.

But the fruits of victory threatened to be lost in the discord which followed. Demagoguery was rampant and Washington, the champion of liberty and democracy, but a man accustomed to command, wrote: "Experience has taught us, that men will not adopt and carry into execution measures the best calculated for their own good, without the intervention of a coercive power."

The National Convention in Philadelphia, which deliberated in secret sessions from May 25 to September 17, 1787, drew up the constitution which still governs the United States today. In April, 1789, while the French Revolutionary Assembly was being opened in Paris, George Washington was unanimously elected President of the United States. On April 30, Washington, who had arrived at New York in triumph from his Mount Vernon retreat, accompanied all during the journey by frenzied demonstrations, pronounced his oath before the people, who enthusiastically acclaimed him President of the United States.

During the first period of his presidency, Washington was faced, assisted by his Finance Minister, Hamilton, with the grave financial questions resulting from the war, which weighed down heavily upon a nation still small and weak; and he had to quell the revolts provoked by this same question, as well as a serious Indian uprising. These tests served to prove the robust solidity of the Federal Government.

The second period of his presidency was marked by serious events in foreign politics and his ability as a statesman was tested by a series of extremely delicate developments.

First there was the repercussion of the French Revolution. Caught between the "British party" of Hamilton's followers and the "French party" of Jefferson's followers, Washington induced his government to adopt a neutral attitude, which he himself defended against violent attacks at the sacrifice of his own popularity. New difficulties also were created for Washington by England; and he succeeded, not without difficulty, in concluding a treaty which, even though it was in the nature of a bargain, safeguarded American rights and eliminated danger of another war.

He could thus with tranquil conscience reject, out of respect to the constitution, a further reconfirmation in office and once more return to his land, relinquishing the powers of government to his direct collaborator, Vice President John Adams, elected as Washington's successor to the Presidency of the United States.

Immediate subsequent developments marked another critical moment for the United States. This time it was France, who adduced from her disappointment over the Anglo-American Treaty of 1794-95 a motive for a violent break with her ex-ally. Washington was designated Lieutenant General of the army which was mobilized as a consequence of developments, and it seemed as though he was once more destined to abandon his agricultural occupations to take up arms for his country.

This period, which was among the most bitter of Washington's life, finally gave him two consolations which must have been inexpressibly dear to his heart: Before death overtook him, in fact, he was assured that the resistance of the Union was stronger than any external or internal menace; and the maintenance of peace, which he had obtained through the utmost hardships, still triumphed, thanks to the tenacity and ability of his successor.

George Washington could now continue his simple life at Mount Vernon, looking after the extensive property which made him one of the wealthiest men of America. Unexpectedly a rapid disease seized him while he was occupied at his daily tasks, and he expired on December 14, 1799, at the age of 67.

The nation's sorrow was profound, and all the people wore mourning for one month; Congress consigned his fame to history, and voices of condolence were heard throughout Europe.

Abraham Lincoln, in one of the most beautiful tributes to Washington ever uttered, said:

"Washington is the mightiest name of earth—long since mightiest in the cause of civil liberty, still mightiest in moral reformation. On that name no eulogy is expected. It cannot be. To add brightness to the sun, or glory to the name of Washington is alike impossible. Let none attempt it. In solemn awe we pronounce the name, and in its naked deathless splendor leave it shining on."

This praise, which would seem to be the highest that could be spoken, is surpassed by that of Napoleon: "He is the greatest of men and he will be venerated by mankind when my fame shall be lost in the vortex of revolutions."

Now, after the lapse of two centuries, Washington's figure stands out in its luminous and kindly beauty, untouched by time and undeformed by legend. Even today his memory is exalted in the United States and in Europe, and even today citizens and foreigners wend their way to Mount Vernon to pay him homage.

I, too, have had the privilege of visiting the verdant retreat of the founder of the world's greatest nation, which has now become a temple of sacred memories. This homage I paid the first time I visited the United States, in 1925, whither I was sent by the Chief of Government to settle the accounts of the last war; I repeated it on the occasion of my last visit across the ocean.

Let us leave it to superficial persons to say that America is a nation without a history. The life and works of its founder alone would suffice to disprove it. This is a people which has marched forward with giant strides, which has assimilated into the original Puritan stock a mixture of the most varied races, which has overcome the most difficult technical and social problems, still maintaining political and linguistic unity and a firm predominance of the federal system over a vast territory divided into economically independent states.

The greatness of Washington is particularly expressed by his character, by his balance, by his honesty, by his will power; these gifts he exercised in all their splendor both in war and in peace, both as general and as president.

Loyal to republican institutions, he spurned the crown offered him by discontented officers and later put down a revolt of the army against the civil power.

His love of liberty was unfailingly linked to the conception of a strong state whose authority was supreme.

He believed in freedom of speech and freedom of the press. But when attacks passed beyond the bounds of decency, he remarked: "If the government and the officers of it are to be the constant theme for newspaper abuse, and this too without condescending to investigate the motives or the facts, it will be impossible, I conceive, for any man living to manage the helm or to keep the machine together." And on another occasion he added: "I shall not, whilst I have the honor to administer the government, bring a man into any office of consequence knowingly, whose political tenets are adverse to the measures, which the general government are pursuing; for this, in my opinion, would be a sort of political suicide." The speaker is always the great master of life, the achiever, never the doctrinarian, always the man who possesses the sense of proportion in life.

Count Volpi closed his address with a quotation from a speech which, he explained, he had delivered at a banquet given in his honor in New York by prominent financiers of America:

(Translation from the report of the American Embassy)

In Wall Street, in the throbbing heart of that world of teeming business, stands the old 18th century Federal Treasury building, upon whose front rises a simple and kindly statue of George Washington. It seems that from out his statuary image, George Washington gazes bewildered upon the opulent and incredibly high skyscrapers which press so close about him as to take away his breath and make him feel that the sense of proportion in the world has been lost.

If every outstanding man leaves to posterity throughout the centuries the dominant imprint of his own personality, Washington has left us a sense of measure and proportion. While the whole world today, in honoring America, pays homage to George Washington, we would express the hope that the greatest and best characteristic of his earthly life, the sense of proportion, which at this moment seems to have been lost by all men in all countries, may re-assume its proper value. Everything today in the life of mankind seems out of proportion and paradoxical.

While upon the banks of Lake Geneva the greatest conference of nations ever seen is in session for the purpose of bringing about a general disarmament susceptible of preventing war, which becomes ever more cruel among men, two nations, who together represent perhaps one-fifth of living humanity, are fighting in the Far East, and on each side the unarmed are paying the heaviest cost of the incipient conflict. What a boundless and paradoxical irony of fate, and what a warning to the leaders of nations!

While the world is in complex travail, political and, even more, demographic in character, which disturbs it in its deepest relations and functions of economic life and which demands mutual confidence, collaboration, and recognition among peoples, the tragic accounting—as the Duce of Fascism has called it—of a war ended 13 years ago poisons the life of all, piles difficulties upon difficulties, which by their very nature seem insurmountable.

While all peoples and all leaders are at heart convinced that very little more can be paid, that very little more can be received, all are digging themselves into positions which they believe, often in good faith, unassailable. Situations are complicated, settlements are postponed, equilibrium is made impossible. International relations, commerce, and trade grow more difficult. The monetary situation of every country becomes more untenable, bringing about artificial protective barriers and an unwilling and dangerous egotism, which retards any possible settlement.

Unbounded, paradoxical, tragic conflict!

These two references to the two greatest phenomena disturbing the world, which today is preparing to celebrate the genius of measure and proportion in life, unite us all in a single desire, in a single aspiration: That the second centennial of the birth of George Washington be celebrated worthily throughout the world by returning to the eternal safeguard of men—a sense of proportion.

Count Volpi's address made a deep impression and was received with every evidence of appreciation. When he had concluded Ambassador Garrett was introduced. Mr. Garrett said:

All over America the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington is being celebrated this year. To us who live abroad there is great significance in the interest that is being taken in this memorial year in other countries than our own. Particularly in Italy we are made happy by the recognition of Washington through the extensive program of conferences and meetings of which you have heard, and I think it is appropriate and important to recognize the spontaneity of this celebration. It is certain that the repercussion at home will have fine effect in stimulating our cultural relations with the new-old country between which and ourselves so many and such important ties already exist. The Italian character of these manifestations would, it seems to me, be lost, or at any rate lessened, by too many words from us. We all are conscious of what is going on, we are proud of it and gratified, and while we share in it wholeheartedly, we do not forget that Italy's participation is her own tribute to the greatness of Washington and to what he has left to the whole wide world. May I, therefore, on behalf of my fellow countrymen, simply thank Count Volpi and Signor Fani for what they have said; for we are deeply touched.

AVENUE NAMED FOR WASHINGTON

On Washington's Birthday, the day following the program in the Palazzo Salviati, the municipal authorities of Rome presided at a public ceremony when a beautiful avenue of the Eternal City was renamed in honor of George Washington. The street selected for this honor is one of the main entrance avenues to the Borghese Gardens.

"I cannot fail to express my satisfaction and pleasure at the good taste of the municipality in choosing such a dignified and beautiful street," said Ambassador Garrett in his report to the State Department.

The Ambassador also commented on "the cordial and spontaneous nature of the Italian observance of the Washington commemoration" as "a good indication of the general friendliness in relations between Italy and the United States."

RECEPTION AND RADIO BROADCAST

Later in the afternoon of February 22, Ambassador and Mrs. Garrett held a reception at the Palazzo Rospigliosi, to which were invited the Americans in Rome, Italians identified with the George Washington bicentennial celebrations in Italy and members of the diplomatic corps in Rome, in all, about eight hundred guests.

A radio program in honor of George Washington, broadcast on the evening of February 22 from Rome under the auspices of the George Washington Bicentennial Committee of Italy, brought to a close the opening Bicentennial ceremonies in the Eternal City. Prince Spada Potenziani, chairman of the committee, delivered the principal address on this program, paying high tribute to the genius of Washington and telling of Italy's participation in the celebration of the two hundredth anniversary of his birth. Great interest was added to this program by the broadcasting of musical selections familiar in the days of George Washington.

The importance of the ceremonies in Rome, extending over two days and marking the beginning of the Bicentennial observance in Italy, was recognized by all Italians and Americans interested in further cementing the bonds of friendship between the two nations.

His Excellency, Nobile Giacomo de Martino,

Italian Ambassador at Washington, wrote to the Hon. Sol Bloom, Director of the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission, a few days later, transmitting a report of these events received by cable from his government. He added this comment:

"Thus the spirits of the American and the Italian peoples are once more drawn close together in a memorable expression of the sincere and lasting friendship happily existing between them."

THANKSGIVING DAY IN ROME

The end of the Bicentennial celebration in Rome was observed on Thanksgiving Day, November 24, 1932, with a notable meeting at the Farnesina, under the auspices of the Royal Academy of Italy.

Senator Guglielmo Marconi, president of the Academy, presided, and the hall was crowded with the elite society of the capital. The American colony in Rome was present almost in a body and representatives from many other countries were in the large audience.

Among those who attended were: Ministers Ercole and de Francisco; Alexander Kirk, Chargé d'Affaires of the United States, representing Ambassador Garrett, who was absent from Rome; Signor Agostino Depretis, representing the Governor of Rome; Honorable Fausto Bianchi, Quesitor of the Chamber; Minister Taliani; Honorable Luciano Scotti; Professor Marpicati, representing the Secretary of the Party, and also a member of the Italian Bicentennial Committee; Honorable Renzo Pellati; Minister Plenipotentiary Pagliano; and the following members of the National Committee to honor George Washington: Prince Spada Potenziani, chairman; Signor Francesco Pellati; Signor Astorre Lupattelli and Professor Federico Chabod.

Those present were received by President Marconi, Professor Carlo Formichi, Count Volpi, Francesco Orestano and Signor Tucci, all members of the Academy.

The program was opened by President Marconi, who briefly explained the reasons for the gathering. It was, he said, the closing ceremony of the national celebration in which all Italy had honored the memory of George Washington, the chief among the founders of a great and friendly country. After welcoming all those in attendance, he voiced the appreciation of the Academy for the presence of so many who thus wished to join in the final Italian tribute to Washington's memory in connection with the commemoration of his birth.

Prince Spada Potenziani, chairman of the Italian Bicentennial Committee, was then introduced by President Marconi. In the name of the committee, Prince Potenziani expressed sincere thanks to the Academy for the ceremony planned under the direction of its officials in which the Italian commemoration of George Washington's birth was being concluded.

DR. FORMICHI PRAISES WASHINGTON

The principal speaker of the evening was Professor Carlo Formichi, vice-president of the Academy. Beginning his discourse with references to many of the great names in history, Dr. Formichi pointed out that few of these aroused the degree of respect that was awakened by the mention of George Washington.

"The title 'hero,'" said Dr. Formichi, "usually denotes an extraordinary man accustomed to triumphs and unacquainted with the bitterness of defeat. On the contrary, the heroism of George Washington consisted in his remarkable ability to oppose adverse fortune with an incomparable tenacity."

In the face of all obstacles and in the darkest of hours, Dr. Formichi reminded his auditors, Washington kept his faith and courage undiminished. Even when beaten in battle he did not despair, and "the American people, in confirming their confidence in him at a time when apparently he least deserved it, showed themselves worthy of their hero."

Dr. Formichi then reviewed the almost insurmountable difficulties which Washington had to overcome during the Revolutionary War. The woeful lack of discipline in an army of continually changing personnel because of the short terms under which the troops were at first enlisted; want of money and munitions; the failure of Congress to comprehend the problems of prosecuting the war and its slowness to act; sectionalism and rivalry among the officers, were some of the trials cited by Dr. Formichi with which Washington had to cope. Washington, he recalled, has been said to have lost many battles but never lost a campaign, and this was borne out at Yorktown where the American won his crowning military triumph. He continued:

We ask ourselves what could be the motives which induced the great man, confronted by so many anxieties which lasted for years, to stay at his post? Only the purest love of country could enable him to perform such an enormous task.

After having won independence and unity for his people, he applied himself to conserve the supreme benefits which had been acquired, and from a great captain he became a great statesman. He was a decided adversary of demagoguery, and had little sympathy for some of the ramifications of the French Revolution. On the other hand, he was not led astray by military criticism and refused the crown which some of his officers wished to put on his head. He loved justice and order above all things and considered only that government strong which was capable of providing for the interests of the nation.

Dr. Formichi then cited seven political axioms from Washington's Farewell Address, which he said were true even today. He concluded by describing Washington as "a man born to administer justice and to bring order out of chaos—the assertor of eternal ideas."

At the conclusion of Dr. Formichi's address there was enthusiastic and prolonged applause from the large and distinguished audience.

Before the meeting ended President Marconi read two telegrams sent by the Royal Academy of Italy that evening:

COURSE OF STUDY ON WASHINGTON

Signor Balbino Guiliano, Minister of National Education, issued a bulletin to the heads of all Italian universities, instructing that a course of study of at least eight lessons on George Washington and American history be conducted for the dual purpose of commemorating Washington's birth and "of giving tangible proof of the neverbelied friendliness of the Italian people for the Starry Republic" of the United States.

A series of four lectures under the auspices of the National Fascist Institute of Culture was presented in Rome by eminent Italian officials and educators. In addition, several similar lectures were given in other cities under the sponsorship of various groups.

The newspapers of the country also contributed to giving the Italian people a greater knowledge of America's First President, publishing many articles on George Washington, most of which were written by historians and other scholars. Further, the press fully reported every event connected with the Bicentennial Celebration in Italy. The importance of the lectures and press and magazine articles, as well as the extent of this propaganda, will be brought out later.

The government organ, REVIEW OF COMMUNICATIONS, published one of the most interesting and significant articles to appear in any Italian publication with reference to the celebration in honor of George Washington. The article, headed "George Washington and Inland Navigation," by Professor Torquato Carlo Giannini, Royal Italian Counselor of Emigration, discussed Washington's part in opening up the Ohio Valley and other western lands in the United States through his interest in the development of inland communication and navigation, and paid high tribute to Washington's vision and perseverance in the accomplishment of these purposes on which the consolidation of the United States so largely depended.

FLORENCE NAMES BOULEVARD

While Rome, the capital city, was taking a leading part in the Italian observance of the Bicentennial, the city of Florence was giving the name of Washington to one of its most prominent boulevards, and the Americans resident there were erecting on it the first monument to George Washington on the Italian Peninsula.

This boulevard in Florence, now bearing the name of Washington, was formerly the Arno Boulevard, extending the full length of the Cascine, one of the world's most beautiful parks, on the bank of the River Arno. Half of the boulevard is known as the Boulevard of the Queen; the other half is the Viale Giorgio Washington.

When it became known that the city intended to name so prominent an avenue after the first President of the United States, the American Consul in Florence, Mr. John Emerson Haven, conceived the idea of placing a monument to George Washington at its entrance. Americans in Florence entered into the plan with enthusiasm, and a Washington Memorial Fund was set up to receive contributions. Mr. Haven then prepared a tentative design for the memorial, and through the co-operation of the Mayor, Count Giuseppe della Gherardesca, submitted it to Signor Ezio Zalaffi, Technical Inspector of the Communal Fine Arts Bureau, who conformed the design to the Tuscan architecture being developed in the Cascine.

Made of a light grey material known in Italy as "pietra serena," the monument consists of a high central section with two sloping wings. A niche in the central section holds a reproduction in Carrara marble of the famous Houdon bust of George Washington mounted on a marble base. Above the niche, thirteen stars symbolize the union of the first American colonies, and on the two wings appear the American eagle and shield. Below the niche is a white marble tablet bearing the following inscription in Italian:

DEDICATED TO THE CITY OF FLORENCE
BY THE AMERICAN RESIDENTS ON THE 200TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE BIRTH OF GEORGE WASHINGTON TO HONOR HIS MEMORY AND RENDER HOMAGE TO THOSE IDEALS WHICH HIS LIFE EXEMPLIFIED

Dedicatory exercises for the monument and the boulevard were held June 1, 1932, in Cascine Park. At this program the United States Ambassador, Mr. Garrett, officially presented the monument to the City of Florence with the following words:

Onorevole Podestà: My countrymen at home will hear with great appreciation of your gracious action in giving to this beautiful Viale the name of George Washington. Those of them who live in Florence have combined together to present this bust of Washington, which, on their behalf I have the honor to ask you, Sir, to accept.

Count Gherardesca accepted the gift on behalf of the City of Florence, saying:

In naming one of the avenues of the Cascine after the heroic liberator of the American Nation, first founder and legislator of its civilization, Florence is continuing her tradition of hospitality toward friendly nations. Thanks to this tradition Florence is considered as the gathering place for all elect minds, for all the noblest ideals of art, poetry, and culture from every part of the world.

The American people, a Cyclopean race forged upon an heroic anvil, have a special predilection for Florence, because all strong spirits like lovely things and because they find amidst our monuments and our works of art and in the natural charms of the Florentine landscape consolation and repose from their heavy labors, a pure fount of ideals and beauty in which they renew their faith and spiritual joy and receive strength to continue in their gigantic work of building up a new civilization.

Florence, too, loves the American people, for it feels that their youthful vigorous heart throbs with that same passionate generosity which led Italy on to the conquest of her liberty and set her upon the path of her new history.

The gift of George Washington's image which Mr. Garrett gave to our city in the name of the American colony in Florence and for which I give heartfelt thanks in the name of my fellow citizens, is therefore the pledge of a genuine, deep friendship which will certainly yield good fruits to my country and to the American Nation.

SPEAKS FOR THE ITALIAN GOVERNMENT

At the conclusion of his speech the Mayor introduced His Excellency Signor Dott. Ugo Ojetti, of the Royal Italian Academy, representing the Italian Government. Signor Ojetti's address, a translation of which follows, was enthusiastically applauded by the large audience in attendance.

It is to be hoped that George Washington will this morning deign to cast from his place on high a benignant glance upon our Cascine and upon this stretch of the River Arno. To receive his memory and his image offered with such gracious friendliness by its American guests, Florence could indeed not have found a spot more verdant, serene and tranquil, more similar, in brief, to the Elysian fields where, if it pleases God, according to the concordant testimony of our poets, great and good souls betake themselves to rest from the weariness of having lived. He will find before his eyes a river as in his beloved home, Mount Vernon; and if the Potomac has more water than the Arno, the Arno in compensation has more history. And he will see lovely fields and trees hardy and clear-cut as he would have had men be, and an expanse of those cultivated fields which all his life were, after his love for his new-born country, his great and constant love. They were the great love also of Count Cavour, the founder of another free nation, so that to explain to ourselves in both of these men their unquenchable faith even in the hour of defeat, the indomitable energy even when the faithful betray or falter, the unshakeable poise even under the explosions of wrath, it would perhaps be well to consider, first of all, this agricultural occupation which they followed for years and years, their attachment to the solid, sure, tangible soil of the fatherland. Hail, hurricane, flood, tempest may strike down and scatter the harvest of the year; but the farmer knows that the land is ever living beneath the trampled crops, beneath the broken branches and the uprooted trees, and that one must only be patient, sow again and plant again and weed again and prune again, and wait. Only from the fields does one learn what Camillo Cavour, with a phrase that would have found favor in Rome with Cato, who also was a farmer, and in America with George Washington, called the philosophy of the possible: that is, it is useless to wear out oneself, others, and destiny by seeking to change autumn into spring and rain into sun, and rushes into oaks, and that every fruit, if you have sowed and protected the plant, comes to your hand in its own good time. Will is power: big words if one is speaking to children. But if a chief speaks to men and has charge of men, he has first to measure obstacles; and only then, without an instant's delay, does he send them forth.

This sense of measure, this wisdom, this unwavering expectation which came to him from long, silent, trustful communion with nature in his native land, in his lovely Virginia amid mountain, river, and sea, this feeling of loneliness even at the head of a turbulent army, even before a divided and wavering parliament, are the qualities which today, one century and a half after the completion of his work, make of Washington a model of man and leader such as even we place beside those heroes of Plutarch who have for two millenniums served as a guide to our civilization; a civilization which may be shadowed by the clouds that after the great tempest still drift across the skies of the soul, but which behind the clouds loses not one degree of its warmth nor one ray of its light. And the proof is that upon this civilization was patterned the new American civilization; that indeed, in the bitter trials of today even there, in order to save itself as certainly it will do, that civilization will more fittingly adapt itself to the pattern, giving patience a place beside audacity in its fundamental virtues, moderation beside greatness, discretion beside liberality, compassion beside strength.

Among Washington's papers there has been found a notebook containing the rules of conduct and civilization which his teachers had given him to copy when he was a lad and which he had always kept close at hand. And one of these rules commands: "When a man does all he can though it Succeeds not well blame not him that did it."

And another says: "Undertake not what you cannot Perform but be Carefull to keep your Promise."

And still another: "Wherein you reprove Another be unblameable yourself; for example is more prevalent than Precepts."

These are rules of ours, Roman and Latin rules, collected at the end of the 16th century (and perhaps Washington did not know this) by the Jesuits in a manual for young students.

Thus of all the long, laborious life of this exemplary man, soldier, farmer, legislator, and, above all, gentleman—faced on one side by the haughty English and upon the other by the suspicious French until the latter through hatred for the English decided to assist him—from which was gradually formed not only the nation but the very American character, the years which today seem to us more worth remembering and admiring are those between 1775, when Congress entrusted him with the supreme command of the Army of the United Colonies, and the victory of Yorktown in 1781, which marked the end of English resistance. The army murmured, grew weary and restless as it waited, and he every day worked with severity or kindness to hold it together, for the army was necessarily the nucleus around which America was knitting together, the standard bearer which amid confusion held aloft the star-spangled banner. Congress wandered from one city to another. Practical men advised leaving England and France to fight among themselves without the new States having to shed so much blood and spend so much money. When the two rivals should be worn out, then the rebellion and the war of liberation would be resumed.

Washington alone never doubted. Erect and calm in his buff and blue uniform, surrounded by his officers and his young military staff, he appeared not only as a chief and a leader, but as a symbol of the future. There were murmurs, criticisms, sufferings, but the great taciturn man, accustomed to hark in the quiet of the country to the distant bleating of strayed lambs, was gathering into his breast during those years of waiting and anguish, amid the tumult of faint hearts, an urge, a voice, that as yet could not form a word, a voice that was only hope: the voice of the country being born. And he heeded no other voice. Yes, the troops of the King of England held New York and Philadelphia; occupied Georgia, South Carolina, North Carolina; even in Virginia destroyed crops and sent expeditions that struck terror into the hearts of merchants and colonists. Yes, for six years Washington was unable to carry off a victory; but he felt that the English were holding the ground and losing the war, for now wherever a redcoat of the King of London appeared, the Americans would give the alarm that an enemy had appeared. The American spirit was being fanned to white heat and every blow shaped it in the image which Washington carried in his heart.

Thus with the first victory there came the end of a world and the beginning of a new world. King! King! His colonels asked him to accept the crown, and he replied with the famous letter: "No occurrence in the course of the war has given me more painful sensations . . . and I must view with abhorrence and reprehend with severity. Let me conjure you, then, if you have any regard for your Country, concern for yourself or posterity, or respect for me, to banish these thoughts from your mind."

In 1789 he accepted the office of First President of the United States. Since that time every American gazes upon this patriarchal figure, this severe face, these grave eyes, these compressed lips as upon the image of his patron saint.

On this side of the ocean, Europe applauded. Liberty for all peoples, justice for all citizens; the first flames did not spring from Paris, but from Philadelphia, and in Italy generous hearts immediately warmed themselves at the blaze. I do not speak of that honest adventurer, the Florentine Filippo Mazzei,—surgeon, merchant, farmer, diplomat,—so well considered by General Washington as to be entrusted with secret but highly important missions by him, and well received in France and elsewhere. It is enough for me to recall that in December, 1788, Vittorio Alfieri in Paris dedicated the first Brutus "to the serene and free man, General Washington," for "only the name of the liberator of America can stand beside the tragedy of the liberator of Rome," and that the first thorough historians of the American War of Independence were, from Londonio to Botta, Italians and so ardent that Botta at first thought of writing that resounding story in verse rather than in prose.

But perhaps it is well today to read, rather than the aulic historians, the concise words which the nobleman Daniele Dolfi, Venetian Ambassador to the Court of the King of France, wrote on September 10, 1783, in reporting to his Government the first American declaration of sovereignty: "Provided that the Provinces remain united, it is proper to expect that with the favor of time and of European arts and science this America will become the most formidable Power of the universe."

The years which we are now living, alas! are hard, and superlatives are necessarily out of fashion. But perhaps the Americans of Florence, whom we wish to thank for the precious gift they have today made to us, may take pleasure in that long-ago prophecy of the keenest diplomat that Italy had in those days.

In the world of tomorrow the greatest Power will be the Power that restores peace not only among the nations but in the heart of every man as well, the peace which will make him confident of his future.

Following the program at the park the municipality of Florence tendered a reception at the Palazzo Vecchio in honor of Italian and American guests numbering nearly 1,000. The reception was carried out in true medieval splendor, with trumpeters, footmen, and guards dressed in the Florentine costumes of the Middle Ages. A cold buffet luncheon was served to the guests.

Later in the afternoon Consul and Mrs. Haven entertained at a reception and garden party at their home in honor of Ambassador Garrett. Edith Mason of the New York Metropolitan Opera sang several selections, "thus contributing," wrote Consul Haven, "to a day which will remain locally unique in closer Italo-American friendship and understanding."

OLD MAP OF NEW YORK PRESENTED

An interesting incident of the day was the presentation by Mayor Gherardesca of a copy of an old map of New York to Ambassador Garrett to be forwarded to the Mayor of New York. The original of the map, known as the Castelplano, is in the Laurentian Library in Florence, and the mayor stated that no previous copy of it had ever been made. It is said to be the oldest plan of the City of New York now existent.

Attesting the interest which Americans in Florence took in the erection of the George Washington memorial is the fact that more than a sufficient amount to pay for the monument was contributed. Of this sum, Consul Haven set aside in perpetuity a fund, the interest on which will be adequate to purchase a wreath on Washington's Birthday each year to be placed at the base of the monument. The permanent committee for the placing of the wreath will consist of the American Consul, the Rector of the American Church, and the manager of the American Express Company who may then be stationed in Florence.

After the monument was paid for and the above mentioned sum set aside, Mr. Haven reported that more than $250 remained of the funds contributed to the project. This amount, by agreement of the American colony, was turned over to the Unemployment Relief Fund of the City of Florence, an act which received the grateful acknowledgment of the Italians.

GENOA HONORS WASHINGTON

Genoa, "the Superb," famed birthplace of Columbus, immortal discoverer of the land where George Washington and his associates were later to create a nation, witnessed, on February 29, 1932, a program commemorating the birth of that nation's First President.

The feature of this program, which was presented in the University of Genoa, was an address on George Washington by Professor Torquato C. Giannini, Royal Italian Counselor of Emigration. Leading officials of the city and province as well as foreign representatives in Genoa, dignified the occasion by their presence and indicated its importance.

The meeting was presided over by Professor Mattia Moresco, Rector of the University of Genoa, who briefly but warmly welcomed those in attendance. Such large numbers, said the rector, could only be accepted as evidence of the interest which had been aroused in Genoa in the commemoration of the birth of a man recognized by all mankind as one of the foremost champions of human liberty in all history. It was a pleasure to introduce the speaker of the evening who was, Professor Moresco stated, so well qualified to discuss the life of George Washington. Professor Giannini was then presented to the assemblage.

Speaking before this large and appreciative audience, Professor Giannini first considered the youth of George Washington, calling attention to the factors which helped prepare him for the great tasks he was later to perform in the service of his country. Touching briefly upon the Revolutionary War as being perhaps well enough known to his hearers to need no retelling, the speaker emphasized the importance of Washington's character in that conflict as the main reason for the success of the American armies.

Professor Giannini next took up the burden of his speech, in which he spoke of George Washington as President of the United States. It was in this position, said the speaker, that Washington's strength of character was best displayed and America will ever be indebted to him for the wisdom and foresight with which he established precedents in domestic and foreign policies. He continued:

Today's celebration is not merely an act of international courtesy towards a great country allied to us during a tragic event and a friend in peace, but is a deeply felt act of human solidarity spontaneously arising from mutual sympathy and natural and historical tendencies which are more keenly felt at Genoa than in other places.

Genoa, or Janua, to express the name in Latin, is the large door through which passed the crowds that sailed the ocean leading West, building between the old "domina maris" and the new City of York a living bridge made up of disappointments, sorrows, anxieties, homesickness and victories. At the two ends of this "bridge" I see the gigantic images of Columbus and Washington: the bravery of the former discovered the new continent for old Europe, and the latter, with the elements of old Europe, established on it a workshop of marvellous progress.

Genoa is the port from which sailed Francesco Vigo, erroneously called the Spaniard on account of his name, but rightfully called the "giver of kingdoms." It was he who, at the head of a mercenary group of hired soldiers opened to General Clark the road to Vincennes, the key to the West, where his remains are kept under the monument erected by the Daughters of the American Revolution, and by the conquest of which it was possible for the Americans, in the course of peace negotiations with the English, to obtain the extension of their State as far as the Great Lakes and the Mississippi River.

After recalling the association of Genoa with one of Garibaldi's expeditions in his endeavor to complete the third unification of Italy, and after referring to the Italian patriot's use of American ships in the transportation of his troops, Professor Giannini concluded his remarks with these words:

In no other place could the struggle of the colonies for national independence find a more sympathetic echo than in this district of Italy, of which Genoa is the port. Here already were fermenting the germs of an undertaking similar in many ways to the American Revolution which inspired the poet Vittorio Alfieri to address George Washington as follows:

"Your bravery will be second to none; you have defeated the enemy's army which now must lower its flag and stop fighting. Its great pride has collapsed while your glorious name will never be forgotten."

MESSAGE FROM THE COMMISSION

Following a report of this celebration at Genoa by the American Consul General, W. Roderick Dorsey, a message of appreciation on behalf of the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission was sent to the mayor of the city and the rector of the university by Honorable Sol Bloom, Director, through the American consulate. Mr. Bloom's letter was as follows:

MAY 24, 1932.

Honorable W. Roderick Dorsey,
American Consul General,
Genoa, Italy.

My Dear Mr. Dorsey:

Please be so kind as to convey to the Mayor and to the Rector of the University the deep appreciation of this Commission for the honor which they have rendered to the memory of the First President of the United States. Such spontaneous tributes by the peoples of other countries find real gratitude and friendship in the hearts of the people of the United States.

Sincerely yours,

SOL BLOOM,
Director,
United States George Washington
Bicentennial Commission.

In reply to this message, Mayor E. Broccardi issued the following statement which was published in the newspapers of Genoa:

The news that the United States Commission for the Celebration of the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington has expressed its appreciation of the solemn commemoration held at this Royal University under the patronage of the municipal authorities is most gratifying to me.

The City of Genoa, keenly appreciative of all that is great and noble, could not fail to join with all the rest of the world in rendering homage to the memory of the First President of the United States, the pride of his country and of all humanity.

Consul General Dorsey, in his report to the State Department, said that the city's participation in the Bicentennial was limited to this one program owing to conditions which prevented any extensive celebration. Generous accounts of the ceremony were published in all the Genoa newspapers, which praised Professor Giannini for his discourse, and viewed the event as an outstanding expression of Italian appreciation of George Washington and the United States.

OBSERVANCES AT LEGHORN

At Leghorn, George Washington's Birthday was commemorated at "one of the most brilliant receptions that has ever taken place" in that city, according to a newspaper account forwarded by Josè de Olivares, American Consul there, who took the leading part in organizing the celebration.

The reception took place at Villa Orlando, residence of Consul and Mrs. Olivares, the evening of February 22, 1932, and was attended by a large number of guests representing the highest official and social circles of the Province and City of Leghorn, as well as members of the American colony there and many others.

A large framed reproduction of Gilbert Stuart's famous Athenaeum portrait of Washington, sent by the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission, and a bronze bust of the great American, were appropriately displayed in the reception rooms. Buffet refreshments were served, and an orchestra provided musical entertainment.

When all the guests had assembled, the orchestra played the "Star Spangled Banner" while all stood at reverent attention. Mr. Olivares in his report of the event especially mentioned this attitude on the part of the guests, together with their many expressions of appreciation, as "eloquent attestations of the enthusiasm which characterized the celebration."

Considerable space was devoted to a report of the reception by IL TELEGRAFO, the leading newspaper of Leghorn. Among other items noted was the telegram received by Consul Olivares from Cesare Giovara, Prefect of Leghorn, who was unable to attend. The telegram read:

UPON THE FELICITOUS ADVENT OF THE SECOND CENTENNIAL OF THE BIRTH OF GEORGE WASHINGTON, CREATOR OF THE INDEPENDENCE AND POWER OF THE GREAT AMERICAN PEOPLE, I AM PLEASED TO EXPRESS TO YOU MY MOST ENTHUSIASTIC CONGRATULATIONS.

THANKSGIVING DAY RECEPTION

On Thanksgiving Day the home of Consul and Mrs. Olivares was again the scene of a reception, the closing event of the Bicentennial Celebration in Leghorn. The associate host and hostess at this function were the newly appointed American Consul John R. Putnam and Mrs. Putnam, the reception marking the debut of the new consul into official circles in Leghorn. Reporting the interesting event, IL TELEGRAFO said:

This last of a long series of delightful social entertainments given at the local American consular residence since the arrival here of Mr. and Mrs. Olivares had a four-fold significance; namely, the honoring of the memory of Washington, the celebration of Thanksgiving Day, the local debut of Consul Putnam (the newly assigned Principal Officer of the American Consulate) and his wife, and finally, the parting social gesture of Consul and Mrs. Olivares on the eve of their retirement to private life.

The beautiful drawing rooms of the Villa were tastefully adorned with the choicest flowers. In the large dining hall sumptuous refreshments were served, while music, dancing and bridge entertained the numerous guests until after midnight.

The reception was attended by a large number of the leading officials and residents of Leghorn and their ladies, and never was a social function in this city more perfectly planned and carried out.

Among the many guests present, the following were noted in the newspaper report:

General Giuseppe Sanna, Commander, Military Division of Leghorn; Admiral Romeo Bernotti, Commandant Royal Italian Naval Academy; Commandator Salvatore Montaperto, Duke of Santa Elisabetta, Consul of Spain; General Ugo Guidotti, Commandant, Volunteer Militia; M. Vittorio Chayes, Consul of Rumania; M. Achard, Consul of France; Professor George Stewart McManus of the University of California, and many other officials and prominent citizens of Italy and other countries.

NOTABLE CELEBRATIONS IN MILAN

In the city of Milan, commercial and industrial center of Italy, George Washington's two hundredth birth anniversary was celebrated on February 22, 1932, by the largest gathering of Americans ever witnessed in northern Italy. The feature of the day was a banquet and dance arranged under the direction of a committee appointed by United States Consul Homer Brett and consisting of Francis J. Heffernan, Elmer F. Stucke, and John M. Kennedy. Stephen A. Crump, Jr., President of the American Chamber of Commerce for Italy, presided, and Mr. Brett was the speaker of the evening.

The celebration, held at Milan's famous restaurant, Campari's, was attended by the Prefect of the Province, the Mayor of Milan, and many other government officials in addition to Americans and other nationals residing in Milan. Consul Brett reported the appearance of numerous articles on the life of George Washington in all the principal publications of Milan, and many press notices in leading newspapers of Italy commented most favorably on the program as one of the outstanding events connected with the Bicentennial Celebration in that country.

Musical numbers for the celebration were furnished by Mary Newson, formerly of the Scala Opera, who opened the program by singing the "Star Spangled Banner," and by the International Quartet consisting of George Knisely, John Rowlands, Ellis Loeb and Mary Newson.

Mr. Brett delivered an eloquent and inspired address on the character of George Washington and the importance of his services in the establishment of American independence. Every people has its leaders, the consul pointed out, and there have been great men in history whose names and services will ever be celebrated in the hearts of men. But Washington was no ordinary hero, he said, the brightness of his virtues being outstanding among all those immortals "whose mission on earth is to accomplish the seemingly impossible." Mr. Brett said in part:

Every race has its leaders, every history its heroes, there have been great men in every age and there are great men today, but there is a rank of humanity above and beyond the merely great and we are gathered tonight to pay tribute to the memory of one of the brightest of that shining band of the immortals whose mission on earth is to accomplish the seemingly impossible. Two hundred years ago this day, a man child was born in Virginia. The country had been white man's land for five generations, births were no novelty and no circumstance showed that this one was important except to the family concerned. But this child was to be named GEORGE WASHINGTON and surely, the shadowy form of Clio, Muse of History, must have hung above his cradle knowing that the life then beginning would affect the fate of millions yet unborn in lands both far and near. Of his childhood we know little, of his boyhood only that it was short, for, the son of a widowed mother, at sixteen he was earning his own living by the hard work of surveying lands in the wilderness. While still a lad and after others had failed in the task, he was chosen to cross the trackless ranges of the Appalachians and find out what the French were doing in the Ohio Valley. A little later it was his lot to begin the Seven Years War with a defeat and a surrender and we next see him on that day of dreadful slaughter when, with four bullets through his clothing and two horses killed under him, he and his frontiersmen saved the wrecks of Braddock's routed army. Years of military employment on a harassed frontier gave him the habit of command; by inheritance and marriage, wealth came to him in early manhood and then were followed some fifteen years of fulfilled duty as husband, master, neighbor, citizen, church-member and Mason; of faithful service in the House of Burgesses; of continued education and development of character until of the First Continental Congress Patrick Henry could say: "But for solid information and sound judgment, Colonel Washington is unquestionably the greatest man on the floor."

1775! Winds from New England brought the startling news of Lexington and Concord, and the knowledge that Americans must either fight like men or live like slaves and the very British blood within their veins, made their answer certain. Unanimously chosen commander-in-chief, Washington put himself at the head of the patriotic mob around Boston which bore no semblance to an army. Organization, discipline, food, clothing, arms and ammunition—everything was lacking—and there was no money with which to buy, nor credit upon which money could be raised. History has no finer tale, poetry no nobler epic than that of this one man's devotion during the next seven years of that time that tried men's souls. Grieving over the suffering of his soldiers in the terrible winter camps at Morristown and Valley Forge, almost heartbroken by the treason of the beloved Arnold, provoked by the constant incapacity of Congress, conspired against by the envious, Washington's faith and courage never faltered and when the spirits of the not-yet-created nation sank near to the breaking point, he would revive them by some sudden midnight crossing of the ice-filled Delaware or by such victories as Princeton, Trenton or Monmouth. Washington, by nature bold, impetuous, daring even to the border of rashness, knowing that he could not and must not ever risk a defeat in the open field and that the fate of a nation and of liberty in the world depended upon his ability to keep an army in being, became the American Fabius even more famed for his quick and skillful retreats than for his sudden attacks upon an unwary foe. Year after year dragged its slow length along but at last the gods of fortune favored the patient, and then, when his enemy had blundered, Washington cast aside the cloak of Fabius and swooped to the attack as swiftly as any Alexander. Yorktown became a historic name; in the mid-night streets of Philadelphia, watchmen cried the glad news that Cornwallis was taken, and a new nation assumed its separate and independent station among the peoples of the earth.

Sheathing his victorious sword and bidding an affectionate farewell to his comrades, Washington returned to the simple life of a planter at his beloved Mount Vernon. But his public service was far from being ended. Independence had been achieved, but not unity. There was a confederation, but no nation. Suspicion, fear, jealousy and strife existed between the thirteen states and for seven years confusion grew worse confounded. Washington more than any other man realized the need for union, more than any other he worked to bring about the Constitutional Convention and, as its presiding officer, he more than any other helped it toward a happy conclusion of its labors. His name was then America's sole symbol of unity; confidence and trust in him was the only common bond between the sections and the knowledge that he would be at the head of the new government was the most powerful of all arguments for ratification. If by some miracle the Revolution could have been fought and won without a Washington, the result would have been not one, but several nations, and the establishment of a new and perhaps more quarrelsome Europe in America.

As the first President of a new republic with a constitution as yet on paper only, Washington rendered services greater than even he had ever given in any other capacity. All his solid information and sound judgment; all the wisdom of his ripe experience; all the prestige of his known patriotism and exalted character, were needed to guide the tiny ship of state safely along its troubled course. Two men, as far apart as the poles and yet both great, Hamilton and Jefferson, agreed in nothing save in respect for Washington, and he used the talents of both to weave strong the fabric of the nation. Many of his words of that time ring fresh and apt today: "My ardent desire is . . . to comply strictly with all our engagements, foreign and domestic; but to keep the United States free from political connexions with every other country, to see them independent of all and under the influence of none. In a word, I want an American character." While injudicious partisans shouted, Washington sternly kept the country neutral in European ears; from the British he secured the surrender of the northwestern forts and from Spain, freedom of navigation on the Mississippi; when rebellion raised its head at home he personally accompanied the troops which asserted the authority of the republic; scorning fatigue he visited every state; he personally chose the site and supervised the planning of our national city and with his own hands he laid the cornerstone of the Capitol. For eight years he guided the government along the unexplored path of nation-hood and then performed a last but supreme civic service by declining a third election by which he set a precedent of untold value to the republic in that it sternly blocks the road to all incipient Caesars.

It is not Americans alone who pay tributes to Washington. Frederick the Great sent him a present as from the world's oldest general to its greatest; Lafayette thought that the key to the Bastille, emblem of tyranny overthrown, could hang nowhere so symbolically as upon the walls of Mount Vernon and Napoleon Bonaparte, who to the world's benefit might have imitated him in deeds, said "Washington imparts to us the same vivid impression as the most august examples of antiquity and his heroic simplicity meets without debasement the majesty of kings, while Byron in an ode to this same Napoleon exclaimed:

"Where may the wearied eye repose
When gazing on the great
Where neither guilty glory glows
Nor despicable state?
Yes—one—the first—the last—the best,
The Cincinatus of the West,
Whom envy dared not hate,
Bequeathed the name of Washington
To make man blush there was but one."

A very human man, who liked to dance and to play cards; who enjoyed cock-fighting, fox hunting and horse racing; an emotional man who often laughed, sometimes wept; who prayed fervently and, upon very rare occasions swore, Washington of all the superlatively great men that have lived was perhaps the least gifted. He had none of that flashing intelligence or quick mental brilliance which we associate with genius. Genius is spasmodic and erratic but Washington was as steady as the stars in their courses. He was probably not born great; he certainly acquired greatness and his preeminence was due almost solely to a constant rightness of desire that we call character.

The little country that George Washington fathered is now a mighty nation of the earth. The three million citizens of then, are one hundred and twenty millions now, and the United States possesses a national power perhaps beyond all precedent in history. But if the character of Washington had been less noble than it was; if he had been an able but selfish soldier greedy for power and grasping for a throne; if there had not been ever before the eyes of his successors his shining example of willingness to serve and his even more remarkable willingness to relinquish power, our republic would hardly have endured, we would hardly have remained one nation and we would not have been great. Abundance of material resources alone cannot suffice for the foundation and the sustenance of a state. Many regions have had such wealth and their people have remained as beggars sitting upon heaps of gold. Of all the gifts that Providence with lavish hand has showered upon America, not one nor all together are so great in value as the rich legacy of character and unselfish service bequeathed by him who will be forever called, "The Father of his Country."

The next commemorative event in Milan took place, under the auspices of the Lombard Group of the Italo-American Society, on the evening of April 14, 1932, when Professor Giuseppe Gallavresi, eminent historian of the Royal University of Milan, delivered an address on the life and character of George Washington and his importance in history.

The audience on this occasion included government, provincial and municipal officials, authorities of the University of Milan, and several hundred other Italians and Americans. Professor Gallavresi's address was given at the suggestion of the Italian Government and was appreciatively received by his hearers.

ADDRESS OF SIGNOR FANI

The next Bicentennial event in Milan was a notable program in honor of George Washington presented by the Philology Club on the evening of June 7, 1932, the feature of which was an address on the life of America's first President by Signor Amedeo Fani, Undersecretary of State. The large audience attending the lecture included municipal and provincial officials of Milan, United States Consul Homer Brett, members of the American colony, and many other distinguished persons.

Signor Fani, who privately toured the United States in 1930, held the complete interest of his audience throughout his learned and eloquent address. Dwelling on Washington's early training as the basis for the wisdom, self-abnegation, patience and courage which characterized him in his official and public life, the American leader was, said Signor Fani, one of the greatest men in history.

Signor Fani's address follows:

[Translation from the UNIVERSALITA ROMANA]

In the second centenary of the birth of George Washington, Fascist Italy which, reconsecrating every spiritual value against invading materialism, has re-established hero worship, because it feels and comprehends that the invisible power of God avails itself of these champions of the ideal to reveal to the ignorant the eternal laws of truth and justice, has willed solemnly to celebrate the memory of the American hero who as warrior, as statesman and as man was the noblest, the purest and the most disinterested among the creators of the independence of his great country.

And in heartily thanking those who have invited me here, I feel highly honored to speak of Washington in this your Milan which perhaps more than any other Italian city, has known the misfortune and the woe of foreign domination, the cruel invasions of princes, kings and emperors who seized it for their crowns; in this city where from the Combat of the Carroccio to the Five Days the centuries have written the diurnal tragedy of Italian hopes, and where, with the dreams of writers and the blood of martyrs, there was silently prepared the epic of our independence and political unity culminating in that glorious risorgimento which was to give finally, with a reconquered country, national dignity and a definitive civil consciousness.

And also accepting your invitation, I thought that Destiny had willed that here, in a day not long past, there was thrown out from a divining mind that first seed of rebirth that was to lead our country along the great road of History. So the new heroic and warlike feeling that today brings all Italy to rally round the great name of George Washington is derived also, my Milanese, from this your city, boiling with traffic, pulsating with fecund life which from the summit of its cathedral seems to radiate over the peninsula the light of its ardent spirituality and the breath of its vigorous Spring.

To trace the figure of Washington, to circumscribe in the scope of a few phrases this imposing personality of History, has always appeared to every one a bold and complex enterprise.

At first glance he appears to lack those outstanding characteristics, those flashes of genius, those powerful lights and shadows that in human conception should ever mark the leader of peoples, the dominator of events, the hero.

And though history offers innumerable examples of modest beings who were unexpectedly called into light by the force of events and concluded their mortal lives leaving behind them—with only one gesture, with only one attitude—shining and imperishable halos, rarely, almost never, can there be found the phenomenon of a character as great as Washington's in history, with conquests as vast, yet being completely pervaded with silent industry and severe modesty and filled with persevering directness and disinterested renunciation. Nevertheless some believed and dared to say that all prominence came to the figure of Washington from an easy and benevolent fortune. They were those who were deceived by the apparent simplicity of his virtues, by his stubborn shyness of honors which caused him to minimize his every triumph. But they should have considered that all this went to make up that formidable harmony which was the principal trait of his character, a harmony having in itself a perfection that goes beyond the human, that same perfection which makes him the apostle and the standard bearer of his country, a symbol and a synthesis of the thought of his age, one of the milestones along the via sacra of humanity.

It was in Virginia in a little house built upon a bluff, a modest house with a pointed roof and its eaves reflected in the clear waters of the Potomac, that George Washington first saw the light on the 22nd of February, 1732.

The Washingtons, sprung from solid Anglo-Saxon stock of good lineage and of anglican, monarchical and cavalier tradition, transplanted themselves to Virginia about 1657. The great-grandfather of George, a Colonel in the Virginia militia, led in wars against the Indians, and having acquired lands on the upper Potomac, built there a house at Bridges Creek, became a notable of the place and began a promising family career.

George Washington was left fatherless at an early age and his education was then entrusted to his mother. From her, a rather plain woman, he had furthermore inherited firmness of character and a natural inclination toward physical activity.

No finished education for him; refined education in the colleges of the mother country was reserved to the offshoots of the Virginian aristocracy and so to his older brother, presumptive heir to the name and the fortunes of the Washingtons. For him, instead, a little Latin, a little grammar, some solid and practical teaching of elementary subjects.

Life in the open and physical exercises attracted him more than mental speculations. From his earliest years he was inclined to solitude, of frank and loyal character, but taciturn.

The exterior world which struck upon his senses he did not discuss with others, but he reflected upon it in his mind. So he educated his spirit without making of it a gift distressing to his friends and companions and, almost as a presage of his great future and of the mission to which he was destined by Fate for the fortune of the American people, he accumulated in his soul those treasures which he later showered upon humanity organizing a nation and creating a new political system.

From a boy, agriculture attracted him irresistibly through that tenacious love of the soil which was in him almost a religion and which never left him.

At the earliest possible age he became a surveyor, and during long expeditions through the boundless reaches of the region he learned to know intimately both places and men, to practice the cult of exactitude, the discipline of the will, the mastery of passions and contempt for danger.

Endowed with a sharp faculty of observation and profoundly attached to his race, he knew how to estimate its nature and character, appreciate its virtues, discern its defects and—quite otherwise from the great minds of the Eighteenth Century such as Voltaire, Rousseau and Franklin whose spirits panted with desire to find interpretation to the world entire—he adapted himself perfectly to the restricted environment of Virginia with its settlers and its negroes whose life he studied and interpreted.

George Washington was therefore a mentality which let itself be guided by its own instinct, by its own conscience, that little spark of celestial fire that he struggled to keep alive in his heart, thus practising one of the maxims of the Jesuit fathers of La Flèche, a maxim which Washington himself had written in a copybook carefully preserved among the letters of his youth.

So upon this youth strong and wild, filled with practical sense and realistic knowledge, descends from on high a light that warms and brightens, the same that will point out the way during the stormy hours of doubt and will comfort the spirit when agony shall be unendurable.

A decisive circumstance of his life awaits him at the threshold of his twentieth year. His half-brother, Lawrence, head of the family, heir of the name and the estates of the Washingtons, dies of consumption and he passes suddenly from a poor disinherited cadet to the head of the house and a man of wealth.

Here we have him at twenty years possessor of great estates, of profound knowledge of his country, armed with a will of iron, disciplined by the adversities of a hard life, ready, in short, for any event.

And events ripen, now that Destiny, preparing the theater for its great act, is transforming that far and forgotten land of Virginia,—that which Voltaire called ironically quelques arpents de neige dans le Canada into a fire of discord between the two most potent nations of Europe upon whose dissensions the greedy glances of all the civilized world are fixed.

So it was that at 21 years of age George Washington began his political life as a negotiator designated by the Governor of Virginia for a delicate mission. The selection was not made at random. He is already a notable person, head of an illustrious house of the land, knower of the woods and trails and with confidence in his instincts and his experience. But the beginnings are not easy: terrible marches, tempestuous passages, storms of heavens and of men.

His mission happily terminated, he was created Colonel; for the first time he heard the whistle of bullets, he smiled at them; for the first time before the horrors of massacre and the woe of others he shuddered.

He felt that he could not express the pity inspired in him by the terror of the inhabitants of Winchester threatened with massacre by Indians. He wrote:

"The supplicating tears of the women, and moving petitions from the men, melt me into such deadly sorrow that I solemnly declare, if I know my own mind, I could offer myself a willing sacrifice to the butchering enemy provided that would contribute to the people's ease."

And he is scarcely at the beginning of the bitter struggle which lasts indefinitely, treacherous and bloody.

There is fighting everywhere with varying fortune.

Aide-de-camp to General Braddock, he sees his chief fall mortally wounded by a musket-ball.

He himself has two horses killed under him and many bullets pass through his clothing.

The spirit was unconquered but the weakness of the flesh betrays him. The symptoms of the terrible disease which had carried off his brother attack him, but his sound temper does not yield, and well again after weeks of agony, he obtains command of the troops of that Virginia of which he was already the hope and the living expression. After months and months of obscure but stern efforts, of disasters and unheard of struggles, finally on November 25, 1758, behind the flying French forces, he had the fortune and the joy of seeing the English flag raised over that Fort Duquesne which for so long had menaced the peace and well being of his land.

This notable victory ended French domination on the Ohio and, it may be said, initiated European recognition of the glory of Washington who now became "The soldier of Virginia." In the battles of this war he had seemed to be invulnerable, as if Divine Providence had resolved to preserve him for the future and for greater deeds.

Cantù in fact narrates that during a trip which Washington made many years later to the Ohio region, an old Indian Chief at the head of his tribe asked to see him, saying that in the war he had often aimed at Washington and had ordered his best marksmen to do the same but to their astonishment no one of their shots had found its mark. Convinced that Colonel Washington was protected by the Great Spirit he had ceased to fire on him then, and now came to pay homage to the man whom Heaven had so evidently saved from perishing in battle.

But more than by his invulnerability, every one had been impressed by his outstanding superiority derived from his persevering self-abnegation, his exceptional valor and his iron firmness.

His fellow citizens rendered him public honors and called him to high offices. Astonished Europe knows him and admires him unconsciously, but History knows already that this first part of his life is nothing more than a sample of his quality, a first brief experience and training to meet the grander mission which the future will confide to him.

The trial was undergone with honor, experience was consecrated by victory, the country knew then that it could count upon its worthiest son as soon as events had ripened and when the people shouted for their leader and their hero.

Before Washington reappeared in the public eye there passed sixteen years, 16 years of peace, of silence and of oblivion which he seemed to enjoy as desert travelers enjoy the longed-for oasis.

He has returned to familiar customs, to Mount Vernon, his own well loved home, where he devotes all his time and efforts to agriculture.

First a surveyor, then a soldier, the land has always been his great love, but he has not been able hitherto to devote himself to it intensely, methodically and scientifically. Now he feels the necessity, now he wishes to transform his untilled and half-abandoned lands into a prosperous and productive domain. All the most important technical books of the epoch become the objects of his tenacious and passionate study and for more than 12 years they so remain.

As he can, he enlarges his possessions, adds new lands to the Mount Vernon estate, buys a beautiful house in Williamsburg and builds another in Alexandria, and in watching the daily progress which occurs under his firm guidance, counting the flocks which increase and the harvests which triple, in noting how his dependents add to their well-being, he rejoices as in a victory.

His meditative spirit feels the wholesome beauty of this creative struggle against the stubborn land and he writes:

"The more I am acquainted with agricultural affairs, the better I am pleased with them . . . how much more delightful . . . is the task of making improvements on the earth than all the vain glory that can be acquired from ravaging it. . . ."

In his hospitable manor, goal of illustrious visitors and gathering place of friends and acquaintances, he has at his side his wife, the widow Martha Custis whom he married shortly after his return from the war and to whom he will be a faithful companion as long as life lasts.

A companion tender and devoted, an affectionate friend; but it was written in the book of Fate that the solitary hero who should win for his country its greatest conquest was never to realize for himself that which was the great love of his life. This was the serene Sally, dowered with a strange beauty, made for strength and gracefulness but, above all close to his heart because of that mysterious, instant comprehension which sometimes makes two separate souls into one only being. He had met her first at 16 years but even then too late, for Sally, two years older than he, was no longer free, having married George Fairfax, the best friend of Washington.

So this sad and sterile passion will always remain for him a thing of loss and sorrow, the most cruel passage on the road of renunciation. He never recovered from the hurt, and on the eve of his death, to her, now a widow, poor and abandoned of all, he wrote that nothing had been able "to eradicate from my mind the recollection of those happy moments, the happiest in my life, which I have enjoyed in your company."

Meanwhile the most solemn hour of the country approaches; the hour of the supreme crisis in which the American Colonies, for years and years taxed and mocked, will shake off with iron and blood the shameful yoke imposed by the blind and tyrannical policy of the mother country and will dare to try their fate.

And when—the American Congress having uselessly made its last appeal—a storm of rebellion broke and swept resistlessly over the whole country, every eye turned instinctively toward George Washington as toward the only being capable of silencing all dissensions and jealousies, of bending to discipline the unorganized and heterogeneous contingents of the revolutionary army, of teaching all by example how sacrifices should be made, capable, in short, of unfurling and of holding high the banner of the rights of his country and of carrying it onward into the light of victory.

In that historic moment he showed himself to be the only one who had the great quality of action, the only one who, knowing the road, dared to enter upon it conquering the skepticism of the crowd.

At this stage Washington, more than a man of action is a doer of things. The people know that an indomitable will is his, a will that overcomes every obstacle and that the harder the task, the more it bends to the struggle. To him was well fitted the phrase of the poet that, "Danger is the belt for the flank of a hero."

But constructive tenacity is his and therefore he is an organizer. He will organize men, give them a consciousness and out of them construct a state. He succeeds in organizing an army even though it lacked the fusion of souls impossible in those lands, fusion that he never fully obtains not even after the last and glorious victory of Yorktown. Not even then could he say that in so many years and so many battles he had given his army a spiritual unit. Therefore,—and here the hero appears in all his brightness,—the more desperate his efforts, the more trying the tragic situations which from time to time arose, the greater was his merit and the more brilliant every success even though little in itself.

We will not follow the fortunes of this tragic war of more than seven years with its struggles, disasters, bitter disappointments, sufferings without end, battles desperate and obscure.

Certain it is that from that 15th of June, 1775, from that day in which Washington who had entered the assembly as a mere delegate from Virginia issued from it as the General-in-Chief of the United American Colonies, he knew well that he had assumed the burden of a superhuman mission. But he was equal to his task; he himself was superhuman. It may be said that for more than six years he knew no repose and was in constant struggle against everything and everybody—against the enemy, against his own people. He alone, with his faith, with his obstinacy, with his valor, defied the hurricane with lowered head and overcame it in a storm of silence by the force of his tenacity, with discipline and with the bronze-like inflexibility of his great spirit. Failure did not discourage him, treason did not stop him, defeats did not conquer him and desperation he never knew.

There was one moment when his army found itself facing the enemy without shelter, without shoes, almost without clothing, almost without food. Shelter, provisions, munitions, everything essential was lacking, and winter with its snows and its storms was coming on. In the midst of so many miseries there came from England proposals of peace, propositions which would save the honor of both sides and put an end to the universal suffering. But they would have meant returning to subjection and the reply of Washington was not delayed a moment:

"Nothing short of independence, it appears to me, can possibly do. A peace on other terms would . . . be a peace of war. The injuries we have received from the British nation . . . have been so great and so many, that they can never be forgotten."

And the Congress, though not ignorant of the hard situation of the army and the country, did not dare to contradict the great voice in which it heard the inspiration of heroism and the warning of Destiny.

The Bicentennial celebration of the Philology Club, at which Signor Fani delivered the above address, was the last celebration in Milan until after the summer months.

CLOSING PROGRAM IN MILAN

Thanksgiving Day, however, is always observed in Milan by a luncheon under the auspices of the American Chamber of Commerce for Italy. This year the luncheon took on the character of a closing observance of the Bicentennial in the principal speech by Consul Brett. The following is an excerpt from his remarks:

With this day the observation of the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington as officially ordered by Congress comes to an end and . . . a few words of tribute will certainly be in order.

In the unanimous opinion of all Americans one man only was the Father of his Country and remains always and incomparably first in their hearts and memories. He was not only the military chieftain whose faith and courage won the Revolution and the political leader whose personality made the nation and established the form of government, but he was and still remains not only the national hero of America but its ideal of civilized manhood. This preeminence, felt by his contemporaries as well as by succeeding generations, was due to no mental brilliance or intellectual excellence but solely to qualities of character such as courage, honesty, sincerity, unselfishness and that utter devotion to the public good which is the highest ideal of patriotism. No American can imagine that Washington should ever have desired a wrong thing or that he would ever have stooped to achieve a righteous end by unworthy means. Intensive study of his life and deeds during the century and a third elapsed since his death has revealed no fault in him and an American mother can make no nobler prayer for her son than that he may become a man like Washington.

Every institution is but the magnification of some individual and the American nation at its highest and best is the projection of the shadow of the first and greatest of our magistrates and leaders. In an almost religious manner we feel that his spirit still presides over our destinies; that when we have faithfully followed his example and his precepts we have been great and fortunate and that our abandonment or forgetfulness of these has always been followed by sorrow and disaster. As Abraham Lincoln so eloquently said, "Washington needs no eulogy. In solemn awe we pronounce that name and in its naked, deathless splendor leave it shining on."

STIRRING TRIBUTE IN NAPLES

Outstanding in its solemn tribute to George Washington was the celebration in Naples on February 22, 1932, under the auspices of the Italo-American Union of that city. The program was of especial interest to Americans because it was initiated and carried out entirely by Italians under the direction of Contessa Fanny Zampini Salazar, founder of the Italo-American Union and moving spirit of the Neapolitan celebration. The Contessa received valuable assistance from United States Consul General Coert du Bois and other American consular officers.

Contessa Salazar personally contributed to the program on Washington's Birthday by reading in English the Bicentennial Ode, "George Washington the Nation Builder," written by the American poet, Edwin Markham. Music was furnished by a string quartet of Naples which played several compositions written by Americans during the life of George Washington. The reading and the musical numbers were thoroughly appreciated by a large audience, comprising numerous government, military, judicial, and municipal officials, educational and cultural leaders, members of the consular service of foreign countries in Naples, and the entire American colony of the city.

The principal speaker was Avvocato Edgardo Borselli, prominent lawyer of Naples, who delivered an impressive address on the life and character of George Washington. The following translation of a summary of Cavalier Borselli's address is from IL MATTINO:

Cav. Edgardo Borselli made a speech praising Washington and his life and showing that he was a man of feeling and of action. He illustrated the most notable facts of his military career, his personality as a great condottiere, and his religious sentiments.

The speaker continued, to say that Washington was able to accomplish the miracle of carrying out a grand destiny for the reason that he was possessed of the three fundamental virtues necessary: self-reliance, reflection, and perseverance. These are the most notable qualities in the American's character and although they are also attributes of the Italians, Americans have the extra quality of being optimists, and they complete everything they start for the sake of the fact of having undertaken it.

Cav. Borselli went on to say that George Washington stands out in his period like some marvellous figure in sculpture and becomes a symbol as did our Roman heroes and those of our Risorgimento, who inspired his life.

Cav. Borselli then pointed out that this is what is actually occurring in Italy today. The great fascist "Condottiere" has also been able to change the course of the life of a nation. He has been able to set the torches of the Roman era alight and to re-awaken heroism in the Italian soul. Examining the causes of the wide sympathy which unites Italy to the United States, Cav. Borselli happily ended his speech hoping that Italy and America would together contribute to strengthen the human cause of peace, the birthright of the history and civilization of these two countries.

LECTURES ON WASHINGTON AND HIS TIMES

A series of lectures on George Washington and his times was inaugurated May 3, 1932, in Naples under the auspices of the Royal Superior Institute of Economic and Commercial Science of Naples, at the request of the Ministry of National Education, by Professor Corrado Barbagallo.

IL MATTINO next day published a report of this event of which the following is a translation:

Yesterday, in the great hall of the Royal Superior Institute of Economical Science, Professor Corrado Barbagallo held the first of a group of conferences to be given this year under the auspices of the Ministry of National Education before an interested audience of prominent personalities and a vast assembly of students. The subject was: "George Washington's country," or the "State of Virginia in the Eighteenth Century."

The orator stated that the insurrection of the British colonies of North America from which the Republic of the United States originated and which inspired all the European revolutions of the Eighteenth Century, was led by a man of gentle birth from Virginia, that ancient and most spiritual of colonies. Professor Barbagallo described the origin and development of this country where, owing to the cultivation of tobacco and the character of the early colonists from England a society had formed of enormous class differences. In this connection the speaker gave a vast and interesting account of Virginian society of the period, comparing it with that of the northern and central States of America, as different as "fire from water," according to British writers. Professor Barbagallo pointed out the resemblance of existing customs in Virginia during the Eighteenth Century to those of feudal Europe in the middle ages, where the political classes were composed of conquerors and warriors and gave a vivid sketch of the similarity in tastes and habits. Towards the middle of the Eighteenth Century society was constituted of a number of large families of noble and aristocratic descent among which was that of the Washington family.

OTHER PROGRAMS IN NAPLES

The Bicentennial of George Washington's birth was observed again in Naples on two other great American holidays—July 4 and Thanksgiving Day.

The July 4 celebration was held on the Island of Capri in the Bay of Naples, with the Americans residing or sojourning in that vicinity, joined by a large number of their Italian friends, combining an observance of Independence Day with a commemoration of George Washington's birth. The festivities included a banquet in the evening at the principal hotel in Capri attended by the highest Italian officials on the island and by most of the Americans who participated in the earlier activities of the day.

The entire program, according to a communication of November 5, 1932, to the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission from Consul General du Bois, was dedicated to the memory of George Washington. The First President of the United States was spoken of in all the addresses, and many toasts were offered in his honor. Frequent references were made by the speakers to the appropriateness of dedicating the celebration of America's independence to the memory of the man who, more than any other, made that independence possible.

THANKSGIVING DAY IN NAPLES

With the official close of the Bicentennial Celebration scheduled for Thanksgiving Day, November 24, 1932, the American colony in Naples prepared to bring the series of Neapolitan observances in honor of George Washington to an impressive and dignified end. They were joined in these plans by their many Italian friends in the city headed by Contessa Fanny Zampini Salazar, who presided over the fête, and Cavalier Avvocato Giulio Nocerino, who delivered the principal address. The program was given at 5 P. M. in the Excelsior Hotel, with instrumental music of Washington's day, including some of his favorite selections, being featured.

The Contessa's remarks on this occasion follow:

I consider the highest success of the Italo-American Union and the most deeply appreciated privilege of my very long life, to have been able, last February 22 and today, to cooperate, in Naples, to the honors paid in the United States, in Rome and abroad, for the Bicentennial of the birth of George Washington.

But I could not have done anything had not the authorities in Naples supported and encouraged it all, it having been the wish of Italy to pay due homage to the father of the great American nation, with whom we feel to be linked by cordial, spiritual alliance.

The presence of the American Consul General and of several Americans, residents or visitors in Naples, make us feel their kind interest in this work of love, and we hope they will have their country-people hear how faithful and devoted to the United States is the Italo-American Union, in its long and deeply cherished ideal of that spiritual alliance.

In addition to the afternoon program the Americans residing in and near Naples further celebrated the distinctly American holiday by partaking later in the evening of a Thanksgiving dinner which was served in a private dining room in the Excelsior Hotel. The salon used on this occasion was appropriately decorated, portraits of George Washington being prominently and attractively displayed. Only informal remarks were made at the dinner, but they all included tributes to the great man in whose honor the Bicentennial Celebration had taken place.

Describing this event in a communication to the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission, November 25, 1932, Consul General du Bois assured Director Sol Bloom of the success of all observances taking place in Naples during the year. He wrote:

I feel no hesitation in assuring you that the observance of Thanksgiving Day in Naples, and other programs here, carried out in every practicable way your suggestions with respect to the significance of the Washington Celebration.

PALERMO PARTICIPATES

Despite the small number of Americans residing in Palermo, the two hundredth anniversary of George Washington's birth was observed in fitting manner with the cooperation of United States Consul Howard K. Travers and his associates. A tea was given on February 22, 1932, at the Consulate for Americans resident or visiting in Palermo and eminent Italians of the district, and in the evening Consul Travers gave a dinner for all Americans in the vicinity.

In accordance with instructions issued by the Ministry of Education a commemorative lecture was presented at the Royal University of Palermo on March 8, 1932, by Professor Gaspare Ambrosini of the Faculty of Political Science of the University. The lecture was attended by the entire staff of the American Consulate, together with students and faculty members of the University and officials of the city and province. Extolling the virtues of America's first President in eloquent and dignified terms, the speaker was enthusiastically received by the large audience. Professor Ambrosini's lecture was given wide attention in the Italian press, and the speaker himself was highly commended.

Professor Ambrosini also contributed to the literature published during the Bicentennial Celebration a book entitled "George Washington, the Statesman."

IMPORTANT OBSERVANCE IN TRIESTE

Even smaller than the American colony in Palermo is that in Trieste where there were scarcely a half-dozen Americans in 1932. But the Bicentennial of George Washington's birth was not allowed to pass unnoticed either by the Americans themselves or their Italian friends in the latter city.

The American part of the program occurred on Thanksgiving Day and took the form of a reception given by the United States Consul at Trieste, Rollin R. Winslow, and Mrs. Winslow, at their home.

Previously two excellent lectures had been presented by eminent Italian speakers as Bicentennial features in Trieste. The first of these was an address given by Professor Antonio Foschini, editor of POPOLO D'ITALIA, on May 13, 1932, under the auspices of the Fascist Institute of Culture, and the second was presented by Professor Vittorio Franchini of the University of Trieste.

Professor Foschini told his audience of the genius of George Washington which proved so valuable in the founding of the United States, and said that this genius was a direct development of his contact with the soil as a farmer and with the American frontier as a young militia officer. The stability of Washington's character in times of stress and storm and his total lack of desire for personal glorification were cited as reasons for the profound respect and admiration for him which prompted his countrymen to hold in his honor the greatest national celebration of its kind in all history.

Attended by many officials and leading residents of the city, Professor Foschini's lecture was an outstanding contribution to the Bicentennial Celebration in Italy. Press accounts of the discourse praised the speaker highly for his interesting and well-expressed speech.

Professor Franchini's address was delivered at the University of Trieste as a feature of the series of similar lectures presented at institutions of higher learning throughout Italy at the instance of the Italian Ministry of Education. As instructor of economic history at the University, Professor Franchini was well qualified to discuss the subject of his discourse, which was "Washington, the Statesman and Economist."

The personality of the great American, said the professor, might be compared with a light which the passing centuries could not dim. Washington's personality dominated the entire struggle of the American Revolution and its strength was still radiant enough to inspire his countrymen and all others who are devoted to the cause of human liberty. As the first President of the United States, it became Washington's duty to chart the unknown seas of government and statesmanship upon which the young republic was embarked under his direction. How well he built the foundations of government, the speaker said, was shown in the progress of the nation which still found his doctrines and teachings as applicable today as they were when first uttered.

"The commemoration," said an account of the lecture appearing in IL POPOLO DI TRIESTE under date of May 20, 1932, "dignified and solemn, was timely and significantly made to coincide with the closing of the course in 'Economic History' for the academic year 1931-32 as conducted by Professor Franchini. It was greeted by the students with great enthusiasm and was followed by hearty applause for the distinguished professor."

The tea on Thanksgiving Day at the home of Consul and Mrs. Winslow concluded the Bicentennial Celebration in Trieste. Mrs. T. Monroe Fisher, wife of the vice consul at Trieste, Mrs. Icilio Grandi, and Mrs. John Patterson, also Americans, assisted in serving. Mr. Winslow then delivered a short speech in Italian in which he explained to the Italian and other guests present the significance of Thanksgiving Day in America and briefly reviewed its origin as a national holiday in the United States. As a day of national Thanksgiving, said Consul Winslow, it was a most appropriate occasion to bring to an end the great celebration in honor of George Washington which had extended to every corner of the earth during the year 1932.

WASHINGTON'S PROCLAMATION READ

At the conclusion of the Consul's remarks, the first Presidential Thanksgiving Day Proclamation, issued in 1789 by George Washington during his first year in the Presidency, was read in English by the Rt. Rev. Archdeacon G. R. Beamish, a Canadian residing in Trieste. Many toasts were then offered to the continued friendliness in the relations between Italy and the United States, "the sincerity of which was apparent," wrote Consul Winslow.

There were nearly a hundred guests at the celebration, most of them being Italian or of nationalities other than American. Among those attending were the ranking Italian officials in Trieste, the Consular corps, and the American colony.

"The reception," wrote Mr. Winslow to the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission on December 1, 1932, "was of a most informal and friendly nature. All the guests appeared to enter whole-heartedly into the spirit of the occasion."

It was, the Consul added, a fitting program in which to bring the Bicentennial Celebration to a close in Trieste, and in it, as in those which preceded it, the warmth of Italo-American relations was emphasized and enhanced.

TURIN NAMES BRIDGE FOR WASHINGTON

Turin's observance of the Bicentennial was an event not merely of 1932, but a commemoration that will last as long as the city's newest bridge spans the River Dora in its course through that city. In a colorful ceremony the city celebrated the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington by giving his name to this structure. The dedication of the bridge occurred in October, 1932, but the American colony in Turin meanwhile paid honor to the First President of the United States and were joined by Italians.

On February 22 the Americans and a large number of their Italian friends assembled under the auspices of the American colony of Piedmont for a George Washington birthday dinner and dance. In a report dated February 25, 1932, William W. Heard, American Consul at Turin, said:

"The dinner was attended by 114 persons, including the Prefect of Turin and Mrs. Ricci, the Vice Podestà of Turin and Mrs. Gianolio, Count and Countess Ettore Fugino (the Count representing the Italo-Americans for Piedmont, recently named by the Italian Government to participate in all activities touching upon the United States).

"After all the guests had taken their places at the tables they stood at attention while the 'Marcia Reale' and 'Giovinezza' were played and the first verse of the 'Star Spangled Banner' was sung by Cavalieri Giuseppe Vogliotti, a well-known tenor in Turin."

Consul Heard delivered a brief address in which he said:

First I wish to thank His Excellency, Doctor Ricci, Prefect of Turin and Avvocato Gianolio, Vice Podestà of Turin for the honor they have accorded us in attending this celebration to commemorate the 200th anniversary of the birth of George Washington. Their presence here tonight is an outward manifestation of the cordial sympathy which exists between our two countries. And speaking on your behalf I wish to express through them our sincere wishes to His Majesty the King and the Chief of the Government.

As you know our celebration this evening is to commemorate the 200th anniversary of the birth of George Washington, the Commander-in-Chief of our first Continental Army and the First President of the United States. I shall not elaborate upon the part played by him in helping to lay the foundation of our country. The story of his career is well known to all of us. I have thought it desirable, however, to reprint on our menu for this evening a brief extract from the life of Washington recently written by James Truslow

Adams, one of our foremost historians. In this extract you will observe that Mr. Adams lays stress upon the character of Washington which caused the people to put their faith in him in their troublesome times. Washington thought of his country first—not in a selfish way, because he well knew that nations must always have due regard for each other if difficulties and even wars are to be avoided—and I should like each of you to try and think of your country today as Washington did, thus helping, each in his way, to overcome the difficulties which seem to beset us on all sides.

Just one brief word more. By Act of Congress the celebration of this event is to take place simultaneously throughout every city and village of the United States and its possessions, as well as every part of the world where Americans may be gathered. The Commission appointed under this law has planned to continue the celebration until Thanksgiving Day, November 24, 1932. It is hoped, therefore, that we may be able to come together again on July 4th and on Thanksgiving Day.

The Prefect of Turin replied in glowing terms of the friendship existing between Italy and the United States and expressed his "deep appreciation at being present at the celebration of the two hundredth anniversary of George Washington's birth," according to the report of Consul Heard. As the Prefect spoke extemporaneously, and no notes were taken, it is not possible to report his address.

An attractive little folder adorned with a picture of George Washington was presented each guest on this occasion. On the inside was printed a tribute by James Truslow Adams, American writer and historian, and on the opposite page appeared the American menu for the dinner. The words of the "Star Spangled Banner" were printed on the back.

"From the remarks which I heard," summarized Consul Heard, "I have no doubt everyone was highly pleased with the way in which the program was carried out."

BRIDGE DEDICATION IS COLORFUL

An interesting feature of Turin is the number of bridges which span the River Dora. Until 1932 there were seven main bridges over which the city's principal thoroughfares crossed the stream. All but two of these are named for rulers of the House of Savoia, and all are named for Italians. When, therefore, the Mayor of Turin notified Consul Heard that a new bridge under construction would be named in honor of George Washington, it was accepted by the American colony as an especial mark of the city's regard for the first President of the United States.

The official ceremony of naming the bridge and opening it to traffic was held on Sunday morning, October 16, 1932, in the presence of all of the high authorities of the City of Turin, including the Prefect of the Province, the General commanding the First Army Corps, the Rector of the University of Turin, the Podestà and the two Vice Podestà, as well as a large number of other important persons. At the request of the Podestà, all the Americans residing in the Turin district were especially invited to the dedication.

NEW BRIDGE IS BLESSED

In accordance with the Italian custom, the bridge was first blessed in colorful and impressive religious ceremonies. Following this the Podestà, or Mayor, of Turin, Count Paolo Thaon di Revel, delivered the following short speech lauding George Washington and expressing Italy's friendship for the United States:

The National Fascist Government has celebrated with solemn official manifestations the memorial date of the Bicentennial of the birth of George Washington.

Already many of the principal Italian cities have rendered homage to this great leader, whose high and immaculate figure shines luminously through the present time and passing beyond the borders of his country to gain for himself the respect and admiration of the world.

Turin, by reason of tradition and sentiment, the birthplace of patriots, statesmen, and great thinkers, as the cradle of national idealism, has particularly felt the fascination of the personality of the founder of the Starry Republic and of his constructive work, and has desired to give public and enduring evidence of its tribute by dedicating this bridge to his glorious name. At the same time it also wishes to evidence sympathy and friendship towards the great American people because of the particular affinity and likeness of their national hero and our chosen chief in our redemption and revolution, and on account of the special ties between our laboring classes and industrials, and generally because of their genial hospitality to so many of our countrymen.

While I thank His Excellency the Prefect for his intervention and the authorities here assembled, I salute with particular pleasure and deference your presence, Mr. Consul, and also the members of the American colony in Turin.

There is deep satisfaction in having the spiritual participation of the American Department of State for Foreign Affairs and of the central Commission for the commemoration of the Bicentennial and I beg you, Mr. Consul, to convey to those honorable bodies our warmest thanks.

To George Washington, the great animator, whose works constituted an identity with the destiny of his country, who has devoted his life to his nation, for the purpose of realizing its unification, its independence and its greatness, we offer all our veneration and admiration.

At the end of the Mayor's address, Consul Heard delivered a speech of thanks expressing his own and his country's appreciation for the manner in which Turin had chosen to honor George Washington. The Consul said:

As Consul of the United States of America I find a particular pleasure in my duty today to extend the thanks and expression of appreciation on the part of my Government for the high honor the authorities of the City of Turin have paid to the memory of our illustrious first President, George Washington, in giving his name to this bridge.

In America, and in fact all over the entire world, this year the name of George Washington is being especially honored because it is the 200th anniversary of his birth.

During the most trying and difficult days of the young American Republic, Washington led his compatriots by the shortest road to independence and prosperity, and by his wise counsel, written in our constitution and other documents of state, he has saved them from many trials and hardships to which they would have been natural heir in the normal course of events. Therefore it is most fitting and symbolical that this bridge which is a masterpiece of modern engineering, resulting in short routes and efficient service, should receive his name.

This action upon the part of the Italian Government is just another of the many manifestations this nation has made in response to our mutual friendship and such acts with a truly friendly nation like the United States never fail of appreciation.

Permit me to read a telegram I have just received from the special Commission created by Congress for the celebration of the 200th anniversary of the birth of Washington:

ON BEHALF OF THE UNITED STATES GEORGE WASHINGTON BICENTENNIAL COMMISSION, PLEASE EXPRESS TO THE AUTHORITIES AND CITIZENS OF TURIN OUR DEEP APPRECIATION OF THE HONOR THEY RENDERED TO THE MEMORY OF GEORGE WASHINGTON BY NAMING THEIR NEW BRIDGE FOR HIM. THIS WILL BE ANOTHER LINK IN THE CHAIN OF FRIENDSHIP BETWEEN THE PEOPLES OF ITALY AND THE UNITED STATES.

SOL BLOOM, DIRECTOR.

Permit me, Mr. Podestà, to express to the Italian Government, through you, the best thanks and sincere appreciation of the Government of the United States.

The ceremony was concluded to the strains of martial music played by the municipal band, while Consul Heard untied the ribbons to open the bridge officially to the traffic between two populous sections of Turin.

In communicating to the American Consul the city's decision to name its new bridge in honor of George Washington, the Podestà of Turin said the action would "express to you and the American nation the high consideration which this city has for the great Statesman."

On the day the bridge was dedicated the Podestà sent the following message to President Hoover:

We are opening today the bridge dedicated to George Washington at Turin, exalting the glorious memory of the founder of the United States, and expressing Turin's profound good will toward the American people.

AMERICANS IN VENICE PLAN STATUE

The American colony in Venice numbers less than a dozen persons, but they had high hopes of commemorating the Bicentennial by the erection of a monument to be placed before the American pavilion at the Biennial Exposition of Art in the Public Gardens.

Advising the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission of these plans, Consul John Corrigan said that the statue at first considered for this project was the famous statue executed by the great Italian sculptor, Canova, for the State House of North Carolina. However, it was found that this statue did not conform to any accepted likeness of Washington and the idea of erecting a duplicate of it was abandoned.

As an alternative to this plan, the little colony next studied the possibility of commissioning a modern artist to design a monument for presentation to the City of Venice. This idea, wrote Mr. Corrigan, "did not meet with favor because of the apprehension that the required fund could not be raised locally even if a satisfactory piece of work could be completed within the time limit." Again referring to the small number of Americans residing in Venice, the Consul assured the Commission that deep regret was felt throughout the colony that the "only scheme which it seemed feasible to carry out has fallen through."

In view of the circumstances and the handicaps under which Americans in Venice were forced to work, the intent can only be accepted as of equal value with the deed could it have been carried through.

PROCLAMATION BY MINISTER OF EDUCATION

At the suggestion of the Italian Bicentennial Committee, Balbino Giuliani, Minister for National Education, issued on April 4, 1932, the following proclamation to the universities and other higher institutions of learning:

As you all know, this year is the Bicentennial of the birth of George Washington, and this event is being celebrated not only in America, but throughout the entire world, with particular solemnity.

Italy, too, pays honor to the memory of the American national hero, whose lofty figure as warrior and statesman looms greater and greater as time goes on; and the commemorations which have been and are being held throughout the Peninsula are directed simultaneously toward celebrating the legendary figure of the First President of the Starry Republic and of giving tangible proof of the never belied friendliness of the Italian people to the Republic itself.

The Italian universities cannot remain aloof from the celebration; George Washington must be brought before the minds of our young students; moreover, the history of the United States of America must be briefly outlined to them from the epic battles of independence to our times.

I therefore give instructions that in all universities of the Kingdom and the higher institutions of economic and commercial sciences, one of the professors, to be designated by the head of the institution, hold during the scholastic year a brief course of lessons, from eight to ten, on George Washington and on American contemporary history, with particular references to the political, economic, and social organizations of the United States.

The students of the various faculties and schools are to be invited to attend these lessons, as well as the students of such other higher institutions of learning as may exist in the same city.

Prior to this, on March 26, the press had published a proclamation from Signor Giuliani addressed to the heads of high schools and college preparatory schools, which read:

While Fascist Italy, heir to a civilization whose history draws close upon its third century, is proudly jealous of the national glories which bestrew her path along all its great length, she also desires to honor the memory and the works of the great men of other nations. She has therefore given full and deliberate adherence to the honors which the United States of America is this year paying to George Washington on the two hundredth anniversary of his birth. I order that the secondary schools also commemorate the great American leader and statesman. The history professor in all classical, scientific, and artistic lyceums, in the higher classes of technical and law schools, in industrial and commercial schools, and in secondary agricultural schools will, at the beginning of the lesson one day within the first ten days of April, deal with the noble figure of George Washington, bringing out the simplicity and purity of his life and his great devotion to his country and his duty.

HISTORICAL DOCUMENTS PUBLISHED

Another contribution of the Italian Bicentennial Committee to the commemoration of Washington's birth was the publication of certain previously unpublished documents containing much valuable information relating to George Washington. Among these the most important were some 450 reports of the diplomatic representatives of the Republic of Genoa in the United States during the Presidency of George Washington. In these reports are many detailed observations on Washington's activities and some interesting comments on his personality. The celebration also brought to light material dealing with Italians who distinguished themselves in the United States and who rendered special service to the cause of American independence. This information was given to the Italian Encyclopedia as well as to the press and other publications, and proved to be of value as a means of spreading knowledge of Italo-American relations.

ASSISTANCE FROM ITALIAN EMBASSY

Any account of the Bicentennial Celebration in Italy would be incomplete without acknowledgment of the valuable assistance received from the Royal Italian Ambassador to the United States, Nobile Giacomo de Martino, and the Embassy staff.

It was through the efforts of Ambassador Martino that the sword of Lafayette, presented to the great Frenchman in 1779 by the Continental Congress, and belonging to Count Perrone di San Martino of Turin, Italy, by reason of his being a descendant of Lafayette, was lent to the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission for display in the Bicentennial Loan Exhibition in Washington, D. C. The sword, a beautiful object, attracted much attention during the time it was on display.

The Embassy rendered great service both to the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission and to the Italian Committee for the Bicentennial Celebration by transmitting information and messages and did much to contribute to the success of Italy's tribute to the memory of George Washington.

CUBA

CUBA, last of the American republics to gain independence, entered wholeheartedly into the commemoration of the birth of "The First American Liberator"—George Washington. This island republic, discovered by Columbus on his first voyage to America in 1492, struggled eighty years for its independence, and George Washington, who had first blazed the way to liberty in the Western Hemisphere, was "a shining symbol" to the people of Cuba as well as the other Latin American republics.

In the words of His Excellency, Dr. Orestes Ferrara, then Ambassador of Cuba and dean of the Latin American diplomatic corps in Washington:

The example of Washington, the chief leader in securing the independence of his country, was an inspiration to the free governments organized on the vast continent discovered by Spain. The American Revolution was a notable step forward along the path of progressive ideas and because of this, as well as for geographical reasons, it had a far-reaching effect on the peoples to the south of the United States. Each son of a new republic, who tendered the greatest service to the nascent democracy, was figuratively called the "Washington" of his country.

The President of the Republic of Cuba, His Excellency General Gerardo Machado, sent messages expressing the cordial sentiments of the people of Cuba for the bicentennial celebration of the birth of George Washington, both at the beginning and the close of the celebration period. His message on Washington's birthday, a cablegram addressed to the President of the United States read:

HAVANA, FEBRUARY 22, 1932.

HIS EXCELLENCY
MR. HERBERT HOOVER,
PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
WASHINGTON, D. C.

IN THE NAME OF THE PEOPLE AND THE GOVERNMENT OF CUBA AND IN MY OWN NAME, I HAVE THE HONOR TO EXPRESS TO YOUR EXCELLENCY OUR SENTIMENTS OF CORDIAL PARTICIPATION IN THE REJOICING OF YOUR GREAT NATION ON THE OCCASION OF THE BICENTENNIAL OF THE BIRTH OF THE ILLUSTRIOUS WASHINGTON, THE FIRST AMERICAN LIBERATOR.

GERARDO MACHADO,
PRESIDENT OF THE REPUBLIC OF CUBA.

On the occasion of the closing of the celebration, President Machado again expressed the admiration which the Cuban people have for George Washington, in the following message to the Government of the United States, transmitted through the Cuban Embassy in Washington:

HAVANA, NOVEMBER 22, 1932.

IN THE DIFFICULT DAYS THROUGH WHICH THE WORLD IS SADLY PASSING, THE COMMEMORATION OF THE BICENTENNIAL OF THE BIRTH OF GEORGE WASHINGTON HAS COME TO ELEVATE THE PUBLIC SPIRIT, BRINGING IT CLOSER TO THE IDEALS OF THE GREAT FATHER OF THE AMERICAN COMMONWEALTH.

IT IS NECESSARY, AT THE CLOSING OF THIS COMMEMORATIVE PERIOD, THAT WE ENDEAVOR TO BE GUIDED BY THE INFLUENCE OF THE NOBLE CONDUCT WHICH, AS AN EDUCATOR THROUGH EXAMPLE, HE FOLLOWED DURING ALL HIS LIFE. GEORGE WASHINGTON TAUGHT TEMPERANCE, SPIRIT OF SACRIFICE AND PATRIOTIC DECISION TO THOSE WHO GOVERN; ORDER, DISCIPLINE AND LOVE TOWARDS REPUBLICAN INSTITUTIONS TO THE GOVERNED, AND MENTAL AND MORAL RECTITUDE TO ALL.

ON THIS DAY AND IN THE NAME OF MY PEOPLE, I EXPRESS THE WISH THAT THE CITIZENS OF ALL THE AMERICAS BE WORTHY OF THE NOBLE EXPONENT OF THE HUMAN RACE WHO WAS THEIR FIRST LEADER IN THE CONQUEST OF LIBERTY AND INDEPENDENCE.

(SIGNED) GERARDO MACHADO,
PRESIDENT OF THE REPUBLIC OF CUBA.

The bicentennial celebrations in Cuba varied from the formal reception at the American Embassy, on the opening day, to rustic picnics on the huge sugar plantations of the island republic; from an impressive commemorative service in the beautiful Holy Trinity Cathedral in Havana, to a Bicentennial Ball that was an outstanding social event of the year. Radio companies dedicated entire programs to the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington; Cuba's famous race track, Oriental Park, had a "George Washington Day," and there were pageants, plays and special ceremonies throughout the island. Commemoration of the bicentennial in Cuba began well before the official date set for the opening of the celebration and continued until its close on Thanksgiving Day.

CELEBRATION BEGINS IN HAVANA

To the Daughters of the American Revolution fell the honor of initiating the Bicentennial Celebration in Havana when they made their regular gathering on February 3, 1932, an open meeting and presented a special program in honor of George Washington.

A patriotic and inspirational address by the Rev. Dewey Burham, pastor of the Union Church, featured the exercises which were held in the Woman's Club before an audience of more than two hundred. Miss Clara White, Regent of the Havana Chapter, had issued a general invitation to all resident Americans, their friends and visitors, to join in the celebration and many distinguished members of the American Colony in Havana were present, headed by Mrs. Harry F. Guggenheim, wife of the American Ambassador to Cuba. Many local organizations attended in a group, the Girl Reserves in their uniforms adding a special dash of color.

The club rooms had been appropriately decorated throughout in a red, white, and blue motif and over the stage hung a beautiful copy of the Athenaeum portrait of George Washington. The flag used on the stage held special significance for the members of the chapter as it had covered the casket of a young soldier who had given his life during the World War and had been presented to the chapter by his mother, Mrs. William Laidlaw.

The program opened with the singing of the Cuban national anthem, "Himno Bayamés," and "America," by the audience, led by a quartet composed of Mrs. Helen Bermudez, Mrs. Ruby Ball Arango, Mrs. Jewel Feike, and Mrs. Louise Stephens, with Mrs. Mary Daniel at the piano.

Dean Hugo Blankingship, of Holy Trinity Cathedral, pronounced the invocation and the regent gave the address of welcome. The "Pledge to the Flag" was then given, followed by the singing of Keller's "American Hymn" by the quartet, the recital of "Old Glory" by Mrs. Rose Ellis, a solo, "America the Beautiful," sung by Mrs. Bermudez, a poem recital by Mrs. Arango and another number by the quartet.

Rev. Dewey Burham then delivered his address on Washington, which was a scholarly discourse that met with the full appreciation of the audience. Relying upon history for estimates of Washington's character by his contemporaries, Dr. Burham cited his heroic example of self-sacrifice and constructive thought for his country as one to be emulated by succeeding generations of patriotic Americans.

The singing of the "Star Spangled Banner" by the quartet and the audience brought the program to a close.

SERVICE IN CATHEDRAL

The next observance of the Bicentennial in Havana was the George Washington commemorative service in Holy Trinity Cathedral the morning of Sunday, February 21, under the auspices of the Daughters of the American Revolution.

The huge church was crowded for the impressive service, which was attended by the American Ambassador, Hon. Harry F. Guggenheim; the British Minister, the staffs of the American Embassy and of the British Legation, the American Consul General and the staff of the Consulate, a representative of the Cuban government, various patriotic organizations in Havana and members of the American and British colonies there.

Bishop H. R. Hulse delivered the sermon, in which he brought out the strong character of Washington as "a hiding place from the wind," a refuge in the storms and stress of those momentous days. He said that in the lives of the great, humanity has its greatest treasure, for they show us our possibilities and inspire us to make something of our own lives. A synopsis of Bishop Hulse's sermon, taken from the HAVANA POST of February 22, 1932, follows:

The Text; Isaiah, 32:2: "And a man shall be as an hiding place from the wind, and a covert from the tempest; as rivers of water in a dry place, as the shadow of a great rock in a weary land."

This is the prophet's explanation of the function of great men in human society. It is part of his philosophy of history.

The life of George Washington and his influence in the establishment and development of the United States is a standing illustration of the way in which great men determine the course of human history.

Competent observers say that the Revolutionary war could not have been won except for Washington. Equally competent observers think that the United States would not have escaped the dangers of the formative period if it had not been for his skillful piloting.

As the commander-in-chief of the army, he had to fight not only the forces of the king but the lethargy of Congress, the intrigues of his officers, the provincial jealousies of the different colonies, and the tendency of his army to disintegrate when the immediate danger was over.

As a result of his patience and industry and ability and character the war was won, the independence of the colonies was recognized, and then came the most critical period in the history of the United States.

Washington became the most influential leader in the movement to unite the states once more and form a new nation and through incessant correspondence he kept in touch with leaders of opinion everywhere.

A convention was called to amend the articles of confederation. The new constitution was not popular, but it was finally adopted, though with small majorities in the larger states. It was adopted because Washington brought all the force of his influence to bear in its favor.

Washington was a Mason and a member of the Church of England. Both had their influence over his character. No one who is familiar with the ritual of Masonry can read over his state papers without becoming aware of the way in which Masonry had influenced his thought.

It has been said that his membership in the church was purely nominal and that he was not a religious man. In favor of this it has been urged that he drank, swore occasionally and delighted in the theater.

In his public addresses he speaks of God and divine providence and the divine author of our religion. Those were not idle words, he knew what they meant. When he prayed he was not doing it for effect; he was addressing his Maker. It seems to me foolish to disregard all this and regard him as a hypocrite who simply used these phrases because they were popular.

Home life, the discipline of the wilderness and of business, religion, these all helped in the formation of his character. But after all, character is man's own achievement. Outward influences help and God helps inwardly, but the result depends upon a man's own response.

The lives of the great constitute humanity's great treasure. They show the possibilities of humanity, and inspire us to make something of our own lives.

We honor them best, not by building them monuments, but by trying to enter into their spirit. Humanity is always building monuments to the prophets and stoning their successors.

The service closed with the "George Washington Prayer" of the Daughters of the American Revolution.

VARIED PROGRAMS IN HAVANA

February 22, 1932, in Havana was the occasion for five distinct observances of George Washington's birthday, varying from special radio programs and formal social functions to a "Bicentennial Day" at the races.

The most important event of the day was the reception tendered the members of the American colony by the American Ambassador and Mrs. Guggenheim, at the beautiful Embassy residence.

Hundreds of Americans called at the Embassy during the afternoon and were received by the Ambassador and Mrs. Guggenheim, repairing afterwards to the garden, which forms part of the Embassy grounds, for out-of-door dancing and refreshments. The First Secretary of the Embassy, Hon. Edward L. Reed, and Mrs. Reed assisted in receiving the guests, as did the Military Attaché, Major James J. O'Hare, and Mrs. O'Hare.

The spacious drawing rooms of the Embassy were appropriately decorated to give significance to the occasion, and tributes to the great American were voiced by British and Cuban guests as well as by those of the many other nationalities represented.

The day was made memorable by two national radio programs, one at noon featuring an address by the Director of the National Press Bureau, Sr. Dr. Rafael Martínez Ybor, the other in the evening over Station CMC of the Cuban Telephone Company.

The afternoon broadcast was made from the Hotel Palace and besides the speech of Dr. Ybor, included a brief address by Prof. Perez Benitoa, songs by nationally known Cuban singers, and the playing of the Cuban and American national anthems by the Cuban Army Band of the Sixth Military District.

In his speech, which was broadcast to the United States, Dr. Ybor said, in part, according to the HAVANA POST of February 23, 1932:

Two centuries have passed since the birth of George Washington, and his life and achievements stand as a guiding beacon not only to the citizens of his country, but also to all the world and especially to peoples of the Western Hemisphere.

His fame survives, bounded only by the limits of the earth and by the extent of the human mind. He survives in our hearts, in the growing knowledge of our children, in the affection of the good throughout the world; and when our monuments shall be done away, when nations now existing shall be no more; when even our young and far-spreading empire shall have perished, still will Washington's glory unfaded shine and die not, until love of virtue ceases on earth, or earth itself sinks into chaos.

The evening radio program over Station CMC was dedicated to the commemoration of the birth of George Washington and featured American music especially selected for the occasion and the reading of the speeches which had been delivered earlier in the day in Washington, D. C., by the Secretary of State of the United States, Hon. Henry L. Stimson, and by His Excellency Dr. Orestes Ferrara, then Cuban Ambassador to the United States, at the impressive exercises in the Pan American Union Building in observance of the Bicentennial.

Each station announcement during the program was followed by a brief dedication of the broadcast to the memory of George Washington, and at the close of the program, the following tribute to the great North American hero was pronounced:

Thus ends the program which this station has respectfully dedicated to the memory of George Washington who, born to serve his country and the world, lives on in a fame as enduring as the earth, as everlasting as Truth and as permanent as Virtue. The fame of Washington is as a rock against which the waves are destined to break eternally without effecting the slightest change.

An extremely colorful observance of George Washington's birthday and in a lighter vein, took place at Havana's famous racing track, Oriental Park, that afternoon. Each race was given a name that recalled the great American and the main event of the day was called the "George Washington Race." The others were: The "Cherry Tree," "Valley Forge," "Bunker Hill," "Yorktown," and "Mount Vernon."

Evening brought a fitting climax to a memorable February 22 in Havana when the George Washington Birthday Dinner-Dance was held in the beautiful silver ballroom of the National Hotel under the auspices of the American Legion, Havana Post No. 1.

This brilliant function was attended by practically all of Havana's large American colony, headed by Ambassador and Mrs. Guggenheim and the American Consul General, Hon. Frederick F. Dumont, and Mrs. Dumont, and prominent members of Havana society.

Charles C. MacKay, Post Commander of the Legion, was in charge of arrangements, assisted by a special Legion committee composed of James S. St. Amour, chairman, Porter King, V. C. Jordan, A. E. Grayhurst, Russell Morgan, F. Franceschi and W. P. Taylor.

Divertissements interpolated during the evening included the acrobatic dancer, June Morgan, in two acts; the dancers, America and Valencia, in Spanish dances, and Mercedita, who presented novelty Rumba numbers.

Hundreds of American visitors in the city who did not attend the American Legion dance also celebrated the anniversary of the birth of their First President, crowding to capacity the Casino Nacional, the Hotel Plaza and other hotels and night clubs throughout the city.

GIFT PORTRAIT IS UNVEILED

In Havana on April 14—Pan American Day—a portrait of George Washington was unveiled with impressive ceremonies in Public School No. 40, "The George Washington School," as part of the observance of "Washington Week," recommended by school authorities of the Republic for special study of George Washington and programs in his honor throughout the entire school system.

The portrait was a gift to the George Washington School by the John Quincy Adams School of Washington, D. C., and had been sent through the good offices of the Pan American Union, the Secretary of Public Instruction and Fine Arts of Cuba and the Havana Board of Education. A letter written by one of the pupils of the Washington, D. C., school accompanied the portrait, and invited the Cuban school children to join in the Bicentennial Celebration of the birth of George Washington.

With the United States officially represented by a secretary of the American Embassy, Hon. George Andrews, and with the entire school in attendance, the unveiling of the portrait was a dignified and beautiful ceremony. The General Superintendent of Schools, Dr. Ramiro Guerra, presided, and other officials on the platform with Dr. Guerra and Mr. Andrews were the Provincial Inspector of Schools, Dr. Heliodoro García; Administrator Dr. Gabriel García Galán; District Inspector Dr. Córdoba de Fernández, and the principal of the school, Dr. María Rodríguez Marrero, with her staff.

The band of the "General Machado Escuela Técnica Industrial" played the Cuban and American national anthems and there was an allegorical representation by three pupils depicting Cuban-American friendship.

This friendship was commended by the principal, Dr. Rodríguez Marrero, in her speech, and by the two guest speakers, Dr. Guerra and Dr. García Galán. The latter referred to the great Cuban liberator, José Martí, and to George Washington, as "apostles of liberty and Pan-American unity." He pointed out that national independence and stability, and reciprocal co-operation, should be the basis of the union between the peoples of America, and called attention to the significance of that day, April 14, which is celebrated in the United States and all the Latin American republics as "Pan American Day."

Dr. Ramiro Guerra praised the unveiling of the picture and the general program of the day, and urged that the school children of Cuba realize the great part they can play in cementing the friendship so happily existing between the United States and Cuba. He referred to the wonderful character of George Washington and added that he was a true patriot—the vivid memory of whom lives forever in the minds and hearts of the people of the United States, serving them as a bright beacon. His noble spirit and his democratic attitude merit this high and universal esteem.

He concluded with a summary of the history of the American peoples, and expressed gratitude for their prosperity and union, "the latter," he said, "effected by natural geography and strengthened by history."

OBSERVANCE AT CIENFUEGOS

Cienfuegos, on the shore of the Caribbean Sea, in the south central part of Cuba, has only a small American colony but through the initiative of the American Consul there, Mr. Knox Alexander, Americans and their friends were able to join in paying tribute to the First President of the United States.

On February 22, 1932, Mr. and Mrs. Alexander held a reception at their residence from 5 to 7 o'clock in the evening. In rooms appropriately decorated practically all the members of the local American colony were received by the Consul and Mrs. Alexander, assisted by Miss Roldán and Mr. Benet of the Consulate staff, and Mrs. Benet.

Many members of the British colony, including the British Vice Consul, came to pay their respects, together with prominent local residents and government officials, and the Spanish Consul and his wife. In all there were about 50 guests, many of whom had come a considerable distance.

Letters of felicitation were received at the Consulate from the Governor of the Province of Santa Clara, the Mayor of Cienfuegos, the Mexican Consul at Cienfuegos, the President of the Cienfuegos Yacht Club, the editor of LA CORRESPONDENCIA, the leading newspaper of Cienfuegos, and from various other officials and persons.

Later in the Bicentennial Year Mr. Alexander presented a copy of the Athenaeum portrait of George Washington by Gilbert Stuart to His Excellency Señor Juan Antonio Vasquez Bello, Governor of the Province of Santa Clara, and the portrait was hung with appropriate ceremony in the Martí Library of the Provincial Palace at Santa Clara.

A copy of the poster, "Wakefield," distributed by the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission, was given by the Consul to the City Hall of Cienfuegos, where it was placed in a prominent position and remained during the whole period of the Bicentennial.

Summing up the observance in Cienfuegos, Consul Alexander wrote that the sentiment of the people there for the American hero "is one of great respect and admiration," and added that he felt the Bicentennial had "served to enhance this sentiment."

SCHOOL CHILDREN CELEBRATE AT PRESTON

The American colony at Preston, a distribution center of the United Fruit Company, with a population of 11,000, boasts an American school, and the school children there celebrated the anniversary of the Father of Their Country with all the enthusiasm of the American school children "back home."

On February 22, 1932, under the direction of their teacher, Miss Stella L. Lee, the children of the American School at Preston gave the following patriotic program with the participants dressed in Colonial costumes:

- I. "Why This Program," a recitation.
- II. "The Inscription on Washington's Tomb," a recitation.
- III. "Flag and Letter Drill," by the pupils of the first and second grades.
- IV. "Life of George Washington," a play given by the pupils of the upper grades.
- V. "The Original Thirteen Colonies," a one-act play.
- VI. "The Making of the Flag," a one-act play.

Several patriotic songs, including the "Star Spangled Banner" and "America," were sung by the players during the performance, and the "Flag Salute" and many familiar quotations by or about George Washington were given.

The presentations were made more impressive and realistic by the attractive Colonial costumes worn by the children, all of which were made locally from a very limited supply of material and equipment.

"WASHINGTON, THE PIONEER" IS HONORED

"George Washington the Pioneer" was the spirit that motivated the Bicentennial Celebration in Bayate, Oriente, where the American Pioneer Society of Cuba has its headquarters. A picnic and dance, in the style of the old-time frontier camp meeting held by the pioneers of Washington's day, opened the celebration on the afternoon of February 21 and continued until dawn of the morning of February 22.

The American Consul at Antilla, Cuba, Mr. Horace J. Dickinson, whose consular district includes Bayate, in a despatch to the Department of State said of the society and the celebration:

Bayate, an agricultural community in the center of Oriente Province, is the home of Mr. Volney L. Held, the founder of the American Pioneer Society of Cuba. This society was organized for patriotic, social and commercial purposes, and its membership includes many of the leaders of American communities in this district, as well as in other sections of Cuba. The greater number of its members are Americans who established themselves in this country subsequent to the Spanish War. It was thought by the leaders of the society that, in view of the fact that they represent a pioneering element, it would be most appropriate to celebrate the George Washington Bicentennial by a picnic and dance such as might have been held by the pioneers of Washington's day.

The celebration began in the afternoon with a picnic and old-time barbecue on the banks of the Cauto River. Late in the evening the celebrants moved to the nearby ranch of one of the Pioneers and at exactly midnight an older member of the society sounded 200 strokes on a large bell, one for each of the years that had passed since the birth of George Washington.

The sounding of the bell was also the signal for the beginning of the dance. The orchestra was composed of a number of the members of the society and they played old-time music and music from the days of Washington, while the others performed the dances of that time as well as the square dance and other typically American dances. In keeping with the "pioneer spirit of ruggedness," the festivities continued until the sun ushered in a new day—George Washington's birthday.

Mr. Held had informed the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission that "all reunions and dances of the society throughout the year will be on the old-time style in honor of the Bicentennial." There was another picnic and dance on March 20, 1932, at Palmarito, similar to that which opened the celebration. Then the rainy season set in and was so prolonged that these plans had to be abandoned. However, all during the year the Bicentennial was remembered by a printed seal, showing the profile of George Washington and the dates, 1732-1932, appearing on all the stationery of the American Pioneer Society and on its bulletins.

WOMEN CELEBRATE AT BANES

The Women's Welfare Association of the town of Banes organized the observance of the two hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington with a patriotic entertainment and dance on February 20, 1932.

Banes, with a population of 13,000, has a fairly large American colony, composed for the most part of employees of the United Fruit Company, which has offices there, and the Women's Welfare Association is made up of wives of these employees.

Having planned the celebration with a two-fold purpose—to honor George Washington and to aid a Cuban charity with the proceeds from the sale of the tickets—the association issued invitations to both Cubans and Americans, and more than 60 percent of the audience which filled the American Club was made up of Spanish-speaking persons.

The clubhouse was appropriately decorated with red, white and blue bunting, the American and Cuban flags, and wall silhouettes portraying scenes in the life of Washington, all of which were subordinated to the main feature of the decorations—a portrait of Washington lent to the association by the American Consulate at Antilla.

A dramatic program featured the early part of the evening and was followed by general dancing. Dr. Peter S. Malaret, superintendent of the hospital at Banes, and a distinguished linguist, acted as master of ceremonies and prefaced each scene of the program, which was given in English, with an explanation in Spanish. In this way the many Cuban guests were able to follow the stories presented, and their lively interest showed that they were fully appreciative of the significance of the occasion.

A summary of the program, with the remarks of Dr. Malaret, follows:

Dr. Malaret: Tonight we are gathered together to celebrate an event which took place two hundred years ago—the birth of George Washington. The history of this great man is known the world over because he is one of the men who belong to the world and not to a nation.

Tonight we are going to touch upon some of the incidents occurring in the life of this great man. The first incident is from a story often related of his boyhood and which clearly shows an intricate trait of character displayed early in his life. This is the story of the Cherry Tree, which we are now going to describe in Spanish so that our Spanish-speaking guests may better appreciate what is going on.

[There followed a brief description in Spanish of the following scene:]

THE CHERRY TREE (Scene I)

(A boy sits by a table reading. A middle-aged man enters. The boy rises and the man hands the boy a package. The boy opens it.)

"Good afternoon, George."

"Good afternoon, father."

"Here is something I have brought you from the market." (He hands the boy a hatchet.)

"Oh! how splendid. Thank you, father. May I try it?"

"Yes, my boy."

(George leaves the room, followed by his father.)

Dr. Malaret: Now by waiting a few minutes we must make believe that a number of days have elapsed before the next scene:

THE CHERRY TREE (Scene II)

The father enters carrying a small tree neatly cut near the roots, and says: "It is a shame." (He shakes his head and lays the tree on the floor.) Then, pacing the floor, he continues:

"Who would dare cut that tree? I must find the culprit."

George now enters, frightened, and says:

"Father, forgive me. I cut down that tree. I am sorry."

Father: "Why, George, you! You cut down my tree! (Pauses.) Well, my son, you are not only truthful, but courageous. I hate to lose the tree. You should have known better, but I would hate worse to see you act cowardly. I forgive you. Take the tree away."

(George takes the tree and goes out. Father goes out.)

THE INDIAN WARS

Dr. Malaret: The next scene represents another incident in the life of Washington. When Washington was nineteen years old, he took part in the French and Indian wars. At that early age he displayed the fine qualities which belong to great leaders. Washington was a surveyor and engineer by profession and in both made a reputation for himself, as well as in soldiering.

Now we will recall "The Indian Wars."

(The ensuing scene showed Washington among the Indians, who gave a war dance.)

THE WASHINGTONS AT HOME

Dr. Malaret: The third scene portrays the home life of Washington. At the end of the French and Indian Wars, Washington returned to his life as the proprietor of beautiful Mount Vernon, on the shores of the Potomac. He loved this enchanting place and was a good farmer. In 1759 he had married Martha Custis, who was his devoted companion until he died. She filled her post of First Lady admirably.

Now comes the third scene—Washington's domestic life—represented by her whom we should always honor, the devoted wife and mother, Martha Washington.

(Then followed a short scene bringing out the character of Martha Washington.)

THE DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE

Dr. Malaret: Now we present one of the most critical episodes of this period—the signing of the Declaration of Independence of the United States by the representatives of the colonies assembled in solemn session.

A number of boys file in and seat themselves around a table. "John Hancock" sits at the head of the table, and begins to read from the paper before him, the Declaration of Independence. Then he says: "Gentlemen, are you ready for the question?"

"Question: All in favor of signing this document will show their assent." All solemnly nod their heads and exchange glances with each other. Then the document is signed by Mr. Hancock and passed around for the other signatures. All remain seated.

Dr. Malaret: Washington was named General-in-Chief of the American Army June 15, 1775. We all know his prowess as a general. He battled unremittingly against a thousand obstacles until he achieved the surrender of Cornwallis in 1781. The following scene shows him being named Commander-in-Chief.

General Washington enters. All the men rise. John Hancock hands him a sword and says: "General Washington, you have been selected by this Continental Congress on this fifteenth day of June, 1775, to become Commander-in-Chief of the Continental Army." George Washington answers: "I realize the responsibility devolving upon me and accept your decision, trusting Providence may grant us wisdom and a successful issue to this momentous problem."

THE FLAG

Dr. Malaret: Now comes the creating of the American flag. Betsy Ross, a lady of Philadelphia, is shown informing General Washington and Mr. Hancock that the work of making the flag is completed.

Betsy Ross appears, sits down, and begins to work on the flag. A boy stands beside her, watching with interest. There is a knock at the door. The boy opens it and Washington and Hancock enter.

Washington and Hancock: "Good morning, Mistress Ross."

Mrs. Ross: "Good morning, gentlemen."

John Hancock: "Well, what success, Mistress Ross?"

Mrs. Ross: "I have just finished the flag."

(The boy helps her to open the flag. The men step back. The orchestra plays "The Star Spangled Banner.") (Audience stands.)

THE DANCE

Dr. Malaret: When the Revolutionary War was brought to a successful close, Washington was chosen as the first President of the United States, in the year 1789. He proved an able leader and organizer, displaying great wisdom in the construction of the new government. After eight years of notable achievement, he retired to his home in Mount Vernon, where he died in the year 1799.

But you must realize that in spite of war, in spite of weighty questions of state, the currents of home life and social activities moved on apace.

The last incident we present tonight depicts one of the dances in great favor during the life of Washington.

(There followed the closing and most spectacular event of the program—a minuet danced by six couples, attired in beautiful Colonial costumes.)

SANTIAGO CELEBRATES BICENTENNIAL

July 4 in Santiago is always the occasion of a celebration in honor of the American soldiers who helped Cuba to win her independence. This year the annual ceremony was combined with the observance of the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of the man who contributed so greatly to secure the independence of the United States—George Washington.

"In this district," reported the American Consul at Santiago, Mr. Edwin Schoenrich, "there is no unified group of Americans at any one place which could be called upon in a body to gather for a patriotic celebration. However, the Bicentennial did not pass unobserved."

Just outside Santiago is San Juan Hill where occurred the battle of that name made famous by the charge of Roosevelt's Rough Riders. A statue to the American soldiers who gave their lives there now stands on this hill and members of the local Society of Cuban Veterans of the Cuban War of Independence annually, on July 4, make a pilgrimage to this statue to lay a wreath at its foot in homage to their American comrades in arms. American residents attended this event and addresses by representatives of the veterans are a part of the ceremony.

July 4, 1932, the event was made an observance of the Bicentennial of the birth of George Washington, and the speakers referred to the life of the First President of the United States and to the world-wide celebration in his honor.

"In appropriate spirit, observance was made in this way of this noteworthy event," wrote Consul Schoenrich in a letter to the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission.

The consul added that beyond this there were no special celebrations of the Bicentennial as unusual conditions conspired to prevent them.

"The initial preventing cause was the disastrous earthquake which shook the region about Santiago, Cuba, on February 3, 1932. This quake was followed by a series of tremors, gradually lessening in intensity, over a period of several months. It was not until late June that the reconstruction of the city can be said to have been quite completed and tranquility restored. This period was followed by one of economic difficulties which prevented the return of normal social life. In this city the lights were not finally restored until November 1, last. Throughout this time martial law was in force in this district.

"Under these circumstances, and with the local population absorbed in its pressing problems, as indicated above, it will be seen that conditions unfortunately conspired seriously against the holding of any other special celebration in connection with the anniversary of the birth of George Washington," concluded Consul Schoenrich.

ISLE OF PINES OBSERVANCES

The Bicentennial Celebration extended even into the island possession of Cuba—the Isle of Pines. This picturesque island, just south of the western tip of Cuba, opened the celebration with all the local color and splendor of a summer picnic under a tropical February moon.

The School Board of the Isle of Pines annually sponsors a moonlight ride on one of the island steamers over the beautiful waters of the surrounding bay, and this year the excursion was made a celebration in honor of George Washington's birthday.

At sunset, the evening of February 20, 1932, the S. S. Pinero set out from the port of Nueva Gerona with practically the entire colony aboard for a seven-hour cruise. Games were played during the trip and there was a program of patriotic music which added interest to Nature's offerings—a full moon, schools of flying fish that darted away from the bow of the boat, and glimpses of large fish that the clear waters revealed lying among the grasses and patches of sand on the bottom of the bay.

The evening of May 4 brought the climax of the Bicentennial observance on the Isle of Pines when the Hibiscus Club of the Isle presented a program of music, plays and tableaux in the Fausto Theater in Nueva Gerona before an audience of more than 200 persons.

The program opened with Sousa's "Washington Post March" played by the orchestra. This was followed by several groups of tableaux depicting: The story of the youthful George Washington and the cherry tree; George Washington and his mother; Washington as a young surveyor; the courtship of George and Martha Washington, during which the actors played and sang appropriate songs; and the Washington family at Mount Vernon.

The tableaux were followed by an orchestral interlude and then a one-act play, "A Pair of Scissors," was presented. This was the story of Betsy Ross and the making of the first flag and Washington's inspection of it.

The program concluded with Cuban and American music rendered by the orchestra, with a final scene, to the accompaniment of a spirited march, revealing a portrait of George Washington garlanded with flowers.

The whole program was enthusiastically received by the audience. An additional note of interest was given it by the fact that many of the properties used—furniture and costumes—were genuine antiques of the time of George Washington, brought long ago to the Isle of Pines by ancestors of the present members of the Hibiscus Club.

As reported in the Isle's fortnightly paper, ISLE OF PINES POST:

The whole program was built to carry out, locally, the world-wide plan of making the life of Washington better known to everyone during this two hundredth year after his birth.

TRIBUTE BY DR. FERRARA

One of the finest tributes to George Washington by a Cuban was written in 1932 by His Excellency, Dr. Orestes Ferrara, Secretary of State of Cuba and former Ambassador to the United States. It is given here as it appeared in the special Bicentennial issue of THE WASHINGTON TIMES, May 30, 1932:

George Washington is one of the beacons placed at intervals along the highroad of History. For his country he serves as a guide in time of stress and a refuge in tranquil moments; a never-failing example of true goodness; a warning to turbulent youths, and a mute accusation of selfish interests.

Thus it is always he who vivifies the moral principles of his fellow countrymen. This difficult and absorbing scene in which he played the leading role did not mar his personality.

He was a redoubtable agitator because the times required it, yet he always preserved his serenity of spirit: he was an energetic revolutionary, imbued, however, with the ideal of order; he was a politician, but not an opportunist; a citizen of a new democracy, but not a martyr. His character was admired by his contemporaries and is venerated by posterity.

Washington is an example of perfect balance, of perfect harmony. He was equally great in peace and in war, in the little acts of daily life and in the general principles which he followed with constancy and devotion.

The people of the United States, with legitimate pride, hold him their greatest glory. But although Washington gave himself only to the service of the Thirteen Colonies of North America, his life is a heritage belonging to the whole world. Virtue claims him for her own and, regardless of frontiers, makes him a citizen of every corner of the globe.

The example of Washington, the chief leader in securing the independence of his country, was an inspiration to the free governments organized on the vast continent discovered by Spain. The American Revolution was a notable step forward along the path of progressive ideas and because of this, as well as for geographical reasons, it had a far-reaching effect on the peoples to the south of the United States.

All the institutions erected on the ruins of colonial rule were modeled on the Constitution which their brethren of the north had previously written for themselves.

In the heroic struggle for independence throughout the wide lands of Latin America, many were the illustrious and glorious leaders who, with magnificent generosity, offered their strength and their intellect to the cause of liberty. To them the name of Washington was a shining symbol, and each son of a new republic, who tendered the greatest service to the nascent democracy, was figuratively called the "Washington" of his country.

The principle that no President should succeed himself for a third term, although not included in the Constitution of the United States by the signers of that document, was nevertheless established by Washington in this country by his own volition. Latin America, however, adopted this principle in its written constitutions, making it notwithstanding crises and lapses.

The precedent set by George Washington in refusing to bow to the will of the majority of his compatriots, who would have elected him to the presidency for the third time, has for more than a century been the Latin-American constitutional principle that is most cherished and respected by the masses.

The parting advice given to his fellow citizens in his Farewell Address, not to take part in European struggles and not to intervene in the controversies which geography and history might occasion in that noble and ancient continent, was a solemn warning heeded also by Latin America.

Statesmen of the 20 republics, which were successively established, managed to keep themselves aloof from the confused fluctuations of European politics, thus preventing the balance of power in Europe, when disturbed, from being redressed as a result of conflict in America, according to the phrase and the desire of an eminent statesman of the last century.

Universal applause, without dissent and without reserve, is a worthy tribute to the admirable picture presented by the life of George Washington. The voice of his soul told him that only noble purposes and good deeds inspire and nourish unselfishness. His mental powers gave him from his earliest years a clear comprehension of the fact that in our mortal life the part reserved for each one of us is but small and fleeting, for from birth we live with others and for others.

WASHINGTON HONORED BY THE PRESS

The story of the Bicentennial Celebration in Cuba would not be complete without reference to the splendid participation of the Cuban press. Weeks before the celebration opened, the newspapers were already giving much space to the approaching anniversary, printing brief histories of the life of Washington, calling attention to the fact that he belongs not only to the United States but to all free peoples, and commending a nation which, "though grown great . . . can . . . express gratitude to those who forged a free country and offered a magnificent example of citizenship and integrity."

EL PAIS, of Havana, gave a great deal of space to the Bicentennial, both before February 22 and during the celebration period. One of the features which this paper published during February, 1932, was an historical series of articles entitled, "Washington, An Historical Interpretation," by Alberto Lamar Swheyer.

HERALDO DE CUBA, of Havana, ran a series of drawings, giving in pictorial form the story of the life and achievements of Washington. The cartoon on February 22 depicted Washington towering over the skyscrapers of America and looming forth from a sky that was the Stars and Stripes. On the editorial page appeared an article on George Washington, a translation of part of which follows:

Today there begins, with all the solemnity that his historic figure merits, the celebration of the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington.

The people of North America can, with pride, make marvelous comparisons between their "yesterday" and their "today," between the British colonies liberated after the middle of the eighteenth century and what those same colonies are now—one of the first powers of the world. . . .

Fortunate is the nation grown great through toil and riches which, nourished by the security of peace and enervated by stability, and, in the midst of its enjoyment of these permanent institutions, can celebrate the greatness of the past and express gratitude to those who forged a free country and offered a magnificent example of citizenship and integrity.

DIARIO DE LA MARINA, of Havana, published many articles on Washington. In one of these, appearing on February 22, 1932, under the title, "Washington," is the following tribute translated in part:

In the heart of every man who loves liberty, whether he is enjoying it or not, this day should have happy echo; for 200 years ago today, in Virginia, was born George Washington, hero of the independence of his country, champion of right, and, as Lee said: "First in war, first in peace, first in the hearts of his countrymen."

In honor of the birth of Washington, First President of the North American Republic, the United States is going to observe this year with great celebrations. . . . What a fine thing is this testimony of veneration for a man whose name is linked with all that pertains most intimately to the well-being, the free institutions of the United States and to the renown of the country!

Washington! A name which had the power to re-animate a nation at a time of terrific and continued public disasters and calamities; a name which shone out in the midst of the horrors of war, a beacon which flooded the soul with its light and guided friends to his country, but blazed as a meteor to confound its enemies!"

THE HAVANA EVENING TELEGRAM, an American newspaper of Havana, on February 22, 1932, said, in a "box" on the first page:

GEORGE WASHINGTON

The two hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington is today being observed by Americans throughout the world. Any attempt to eulogize the achievements or character of America's greatest citizen would be superfluous. His life history and accomplishments are known to school children in every land, and the great nation of which we have the honor to be citizens is a living monument to his work, far more so than any mass of stone that may be erected or literary effusions that may be composed.

It remains only for us, then, to render him tribute in the most practical way—to rededicate ourselves on this day to the ideals of liberty and love of country for which he strove. Washington's greatest service to his country was not in time of war, and his patriotism was of the practical kind that was intensified when the guns of battle were silenced and there was a need for devotion to country which he gave so unselfishly.

In the world-wide crisis of today we can pay the "first American" no greater tribute than to face our problems with the same confidence in our destiny and devotion to our ideals that Washington manifested in the ordeal of integrating a new-born nation.

EL MUNDO, of Havana, featured the Bicentennial prominently with photographs, drawings and an editorial on February 22, which translated reads in part:

Two hundred years ago today in Wakefield, Virginia, was born the liberator of America, George Washington.

Throughout the centuries that have passed since, the nation which he created with his sword has grown great and powerful. But the figure of the Father of his Country has remained in its niche—where he would have wished it to be—in the hearts of the people.

The life of George Washington is the finest example that the North American people could have had in their upward march to prosperity. . . . It is said of Washington that he was "First in War, First in Peace, and First in the hearts of his countrymen," to which could be added "and first great example of American democracy."

The press reported prominently every celebration in Cuba in commemoration of the birth of Washington, and practically all the papers took the opportunity to reprint Washington's Farewell Address, which has always found much favor in the Latin-American republics. Many of the periodicals, especially those which appeared during the week of February 22, notably ORBE and CARTELES, published stories concerning Washington and the Bicentennial and reproduced portraits of him and paintings of events connected with his achievements.

MERCURIO, a daily newspaper of Havana, saluted the Bicentennial editorially with a tribute to George Washington and congratulations to the United States, which could boast such a hero. This feeling of genuine admiration was repeatedly echoed in the press during the entire Bicentennial Year. It found notable expression in a sonnet written almost a century ago by a famous Cuban woman poet and reprinted by many newspapers in honor of the Bicentennial. This little poem was written in 1841 by Doña Gertrúdis Gómez de Avelaneda and later rewritten by her when she visited Mount Vernon and the tomb of George Washington. It is given below in translation:

TO WASHINGTON

Not in the past was there model for your virtue,
Nor will history give example in the future,
No other fame equal to yours in grandeur
Will the centuries spread in their flight.

Europe saw the spirit of war and victory
Stain its soil with blood. . . .
But it was America's reward and glory
That Heaven gave it the spirit of humanity.

While he converts the world into a bleak plateau,
Let the bold conqueror revel in his skill
And haughtily order his slaves about;
The more will the peoples know in their conscience
That he who rules them free, alone is strong,
That he who makes them great, alone is great!

ON PAN AMERICAN DAY

On Pan American Day, April 14, 1932, when twenty Latin-American Republics united in sending messages from their respective Presidents to be read at the tomb of George Washington at Mount Vernon by their Ministers, Ambassadors and Chargé d'Affaires, the President of Cuba contributed the following message:

GEORGE WASHINGTON, GUIDE AND SOUL OF THE REVOLUTION WHICH GAVE INDEPENDENCE TO THE THIRTEEN COLONIES, WAS, AT THE SAME TIME, THE PRECURSOR OF ALL THE REVOLUTIONS WHICH HAVE GIVEN LIBERTY TO ALL AMERICA. HIS EFFORTS, HIS ENERGY, THE CONTINUITY OF HIS AIMS IN THE MOST DIFFICULT HOURS AS IN THOSE OF VICTORY, AND HIS DEFINITE ACHIEVEMENT WERE AS AN IMPERATIVE MANDATE TO THE PATRIOTS OF THE REST OF THE NEW CONTINENT. IN THE LONG CHAIN OF HISTORICAL EVENTS THE NORTH INDICATED TO THE SOUTH THE ROUTE WHICH LED TO THE FORMATION OF A NATIONAL CONSCIENCE, THE HIGHEST STAGE OF OUR MODERN ERA.

WASHINGTON, FROM THE HIGHEST NATIONAL MAGISTRACY, PRACTICING ALL THE VIRTUES, BECAME THE GREAT TEACHER OF ALL RULERS. HIS LIFE, DEDICATED TO THE PUBLIC GOOD, HIS SERENITY OF ACTION, HIS EQUILIBRIUM IN THOSE DIFFICULT TIMES IN WHICH NATIONALITY, THOUGH ALREADY POLITICALLY FORMED, WAS NOT MORALLY OR PSYCHOLOGICALLY PERFECTED, CONSTITUTE THE FUNDAMENTAL TEACHING WHICH WAS FOLLOWED BY ALL RULERS IN NEW COUNTRIES.

CUBA, THE LAST NATION OF AMERICA TO CEASE TO BE A COLONY, HAS FELT THE INFLUENCE OF THE GREAT AMERICAN, AS SHE COULD FEEL THAT OF ONE OF HER MOST ILLUSTRIOUS SONS. HIS GRANDEUR SERVED AS AN EXAMPLE TO OUR HEROES, HIS HIGH STANDARDS OF MORALITY TO OUR GOVERNORS, AND ALL HIS ACTS INSPIRED THE BEST ACTIONS OF OUR PEOPLE.

ON THIS DAY, THE 14TH OF APRIL, WHICH HAS BEEN CONSECRATED TO PAN AMERICANISM, PERMIT ME IN THE NAME OF THE PEOPLE AND OF THE GOVERNMENT OF CUBA TO UNITE WITH ALL THE OTHER PEOPLES AND GOVERNMENTS OF THE AMERICAS IN RENDERING OUR HOMAGE OF ADMIRATION AND RESPECT TO THE WARRIOR, THE GOVERNOR, AND THE CITIZEN, THREE TIMES GREAT, WHO WAS BORN TWO CENTURIES AGO FOR THE GOOD OF THE UNITED STATES, FOR THE HONOR OF THE NEW CONTINENT, AND FOR THE GLORY OF THE WORLD.

GERARDO MACHADO,
PRESIDENT OF THE REPUBLIC.

GEORGE WASHINGTON BICENTENNIAL CEREMONY BEFORE THE FAMOUS STATUE OF WASHINGTON IN PARIS, FEBRUARY 22, 1932. THE PARIS POST OF THE AMERICAN LEGION AND OTHER PATRIOTIC ORGANIZATIONS IN PARIS JOINED IN THIS IMPRESSIVE CEREMONY IN THE PLACE D'IÉNA AT NOON ON THE TWO HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE BIRTH OF THE FIRST PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

FRANCE

FRANCE participated in the worldwide observance of the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington in a series of impressive celebrations which extended with unabated enthusiasm over a period of two years and were unparalleled in the history of Franco-American relations.

French statesmen, scholars, artists, writers, clergymen, military leaders and private citizens joined on many notable occasions in expressing their admiration for George Washington, his American contemporaries and the ideals for which they stood. American residents and official representatives of the American Government in France witnessed this remarkable tribute to the memory of the First President of the United States with that gratitude which had its origin in the days when Lafayette, Rochambeau, De Grasse and other gallant Frenchmen aided the struggling American Colonies to win their independence.

His Excellency, M. Paul Doumer, martyr President of the French Republic, took the lead in paying tribute on behalf of the French nation and the French people to the memory of George Washington on February 22, 1932. Standing beneath an original Stuart portrait of George Washington draped with the Stars and Stripes and the Tricolor, he addressed one of the most brilliant Franco-American assemblages ever convened in Paris, while an international audience on both sides of the Atlantic heard his words broadcast by radio. In the following tribute President Doumer officially identified his nation with the world-wide George Washington Bicentennial Celebration:

On this day when beyond the ocean the United States of America are commemorating the ever-living personality of that great citizen, Washington, I am happy to associate the unanimous French nation with this patriotic and fervent homage.

George Washington holds a great place in the history of the world. In our eyes he symbolizes the noble and generous aspirations that are common to our two peoples and which carry them forward towards an ever more elevated, more human ideal of civilization, through justice and through liberty.

That the sentiment thus expressed was sustained throughout the period of the celebration is evinced by the following official communication from the Government of France to the Government of the United States on Thanksgiving Day, November 24, 1932, transmitted by M. Paul Claudel, French Ambassador in Washington, to the Secretary of State:

At the moment when the cycle of ceremonies commemorating the Bicentennial anniversary of the birth of George Washington is ending with a solemn act, the French Government greatly desires to assure the American Government of the sentiments of cordial friendship with which the whole French people join in the homage rendered to the great man.

The celebrations of this year, following upon the ceremonies commemorative of the siege of Yorktown, have contributed to drawing closer the bonds existing between two peoples who have always defended shoulder to shoulder the same ideal of liberty and peace.

Concerning France's participation in the bicentennial celebration, the United States Ambassador to France, Walter E. Edge, made this comment in a dispatch of February 23, 1932, to the Secretary of State at Washington:

I have the honor to report that the Bicentenary of the birth of Washington was celebrated in Paris in a manner which could hardly be surpassed in a foreign country. Americans and French alike united in a common and spontaneous homage to the First President which made it clear that no matter what temporary problems may exist between the two countries, Washington and the republican idealism which he symbolizes is universally revered. Through the personal attendance at the ceremonies of the President of France, French marshals and other high officials, a tribute was rendered which has hardly been equalled since the death of Washington, when ten days of national mourning were decreed by the Government. . . .

The commemoration in France of George Washington's birth cannot but have fully met the desires of Congress in its project for celebration abroad.

Such quotations as the above echo the theme of the bicentennial in France. The further cementing of amicable French-American relations was the inspiration of every celebration.

MOVEMENT IS SPONTANEOUS

The NEW YORK HERALD, of Paris, in an editorial of February 22, 1932, among other pertinent things, stated: "The most significant portion of the bicentennial is the spontaneous and unanimous enthusiasm with which the whole American nation, whether at home or abroad, has seized upon the occasion to re-examine and appraise the noble figure which is imperishably associated with the gaining of our national independence and the formation of our government."

An examination of all the records dealing with the Bicentennial Celebration in France reveals the equally "significant" fact that not only Americans abroad but the French people themselves "seized upon the occasion to re-examine" the relations which exist between France and the United States.

The celebration in France was not centralized in Paris, but was widespread in effect and in activity. Citizens of the United States resident in Nice, Monte Carlo, Cannes, Strasbourg, Lyon, Bordeaux, Calais, Nantes and other French cities, supported by enthusiastic Frenchmen, gathered together on Washington's Birthday, Flag Day, Independence Day, Thanksgiving Day and the birthdays of French and American heroes, to pay honor to George Washington and his patriot contemporaries. Geographically speaking, it might be said that the spirit of George Washington pervaded all of France.

The interest of the French people was greatly stimulated by the fact that France remembers, and "shall always remember," her own heroes of the American Revolution—Lafayette, Rochambeau, De Grasse, Chastellux, De Noailles, and the other French patriots who came to the aid of America in its hour of need.

Then, too, as was apparent on more than one occasion during the Bicentennial Celebrations in France, there was a deep feeling of gratitude, particularly among the higher officials, for America's aid in 1917 and 1918.

To further identify the French Government with the Bicentennial Celebration a George Washington medal by Lucien Bazor was struck. United States Ambassador Edge in a letter to the Secretary of State, referred to this medal as follows:

I have the honor to state . . . that a medal engraved by M. Bazor, commemorative of the Two Hundredth Anniversary of Washington's birth, has been struck by the French Mint. This medal, which bears the portrait of Washington on one face with the inscription—George Washington—1732-1799—and on the reverse a replica of Mount Vernon, may be obtained at the Mint.

COOPERATING ORGANIZATIONS

American organizations in France took a leading part in the bicentennial events. Those officially pledging themselves to cooperate were: The American Chamber of Commerce in France, the American Club, the American Aid Society, the American Legion, American Women's Club, Association of American Volunteers with the French Army, Daughters of the American Revolution, Order of the Cincinnati, Sons of the American Revolution, American Navy League, American Overseas Memorial Day Association, Military Order of Foreign Wars of the United States, Military Order of the World War, National Aeronautic Association of the United States, Veterans of Foreign Wars, and the American Hospital of Paris.

Bicentennial participation in the nature of banquets, balls, placing of wreaths on the tombs and monuments of French and American heroes, official and governmental functions, meetings of women's organizations, speeches, and historical plays and pageants was encouraged and entered into by these groups.

During a visit to Europe in 1930 for the purpose of perfecting the organization of special committees in European countries for the furtherance of bicentennial plans, Honorable Sol Bloom, Director of the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission, in an interview published in the NEW YORK HERALD, of Paris, on August 8, 1930, said:

It is unthinkable that this celebration should be held without the aid of France. Practically half of General Washington's victorious army at the Battle of Yorktown was composed of trained and gallant French troops under the command of the Comte de Rochambeau.

The young Marquis de Lafayette, a volunteer officer who looked upon General Washington as his foster father as well as his Commander-in-Chief, commanded the light infantry division of the American troops with the rank of Major General. He was given that rank by Congress when he was only twenty years old, and this position was next to that of Washington himself.

We Americans never forget that another Frenchman, not so frequently mentioned in history, the Comte de Grasse, Admiral of the French fleet in the West Indies, brought that squadron into Chesapeake Bay and surrounded Yorktown on the water side. This prevented the escape of our opponents and assured beyond question the victory that ended the war in favor of the United States.

Colonel William N. Taylor, then president of the American Chamber of Commerce in France, was made chairman of the George Washington Bicentennial Committee of Paris. Under his direction, with the full cooperation of Ambassador Edge and his associates in the American Embassy and the enthusiastic support of the above-mentioned organizations, the bicentennial celebration in France went forward.

CELEBRATION BEGINS IN 1931

Although the celebration did not open officially until February 22, 1932, there were many functions in honor of George Washington in France during 1931. As early as 1930 and throughout 1931 a great deal of publicity regarding the bicentennial appeared in the French and American press in France. Some of this was stimulated by the participation of the United States in the French International Colonial and Overseas Exposition at Paris in 1931, for which the American Government erected a full-sized reproduction of Mount Vernon.

The approaching bicentennial was also heralded by the activities of various French organizations, notably a company of prominent French and American dramatic and musical celebrities who produced a colonial pageant at the Théâtre des Champs Elysées. French and American scholars were also evidencing considerable interest in the historic anniversary year that was approaching by renewing their research into French archives of the 18th century.

Such then, in brief, were the activities in France in anticipation of the bicentennial celebration, and it was upon this foundation of genuine interest in the great American hero that there were conceived and carried out the splendid commemorations of his birth that occurred throughout France and especially in the city of Paris during 1932.

EVENTS IN PARIS

Paris, summoning all of her Old World traditions, culture and pride, and her New World ideals, democracy and patriotism, commemorated the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington in a manner that added glory to the name of France in the eyes of America. Through the national and municipal governments, schools, civic, military and religious bodies, and with the enthusiastic support of many American organizations, Paris expressed her friendship for the United States in a series of events that began prior to 1932 and extended through the termination of the bicentennial period, November 24, 1932.

Thorough organization of all forces and agencies made the bicentennial in Paris outstanding. On October 26, 1931, a communication went forward from the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission in Washington, D. C., to Colonel Taylor, from which the following excerpt is taken:

We feel that during the celebration next year in France all the organizations in Paris will be able to pay due honor to the memory of General Washington in a way that will bring to the attention of the world the great principles of liberty and orderly government for which the name of Washington stands. The close association of Washington with Lafayette, Rochambeau, and other Frenchmen makes the celebration in that country especially appropriate.

This letter asked Colonel Taylor to enlist the cooperation of the various American groups for the purpose of formulating plans for appropriate bicentennial activity in France.

Colonel Taylor in a letter of January 12, 1932, accepted this important responsibility and communicated the information to the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission that a meeting for the purpose of organizing the bicentennial celebration in France was held at the American Chamber of Commerce in Paris on December 29, 1931, which the leaders of all of the organizations mentioned heretofore in this report were invited to attend.

To give the greatest possible impetus to the bicentennial movement a general committee composed of the presidents of these organizations was formed. The American Ambassador, Hon. Walter E. Edge, accepted the honorary chairmanship of this committee, which at the outset adopted the following resolution:

Whereas, the Congress of the United States has created a Commission to arrange a fitting nation-wide observance of the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington in 1932, and

Whereas, the Commission so created, composed of the President of the United States, the Vice-President of the United States, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, four members of the United States Senate, four members of the House of Representatives, and eight citizens appointed by the President of the United States, is charged with the duty of planning and directing the celebration, and

Whereas, the high purpose of the event is to commemorate the life, character and achievements of the most illustrious citizen of our Republic and to give every man, woman and child living under the Stars and Stripes an opportunity to take part in the celebration which will be outstanding in the world's history, and desiring the full co-operation of the people of the United States has extended a cordial and urgent invitation to our organizations to participate in the celebration, therefore, be it

Resolved, that the Organized American Associations in France do hereby endorse the program of observance of the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington, to take place in 1932; accept with appreciation the invitation of the George Washington Bicentennial Commission, and pledge themselves to extend earnest co-operation to the United States Commission in all possible ways, so that future generations of American citizens may be inspired to live according to the example and precepts of Washington's exalted life and character, and thus perpetuate the American Republic, and be it further

Resolved, that this resolution be incorporated in the official proceedings of this meeting and that a copy thereof be transmitted to the George Washington Bicentennial Commission, Washington, D. C.

The CHICAGO DAILY TRIBUNE, European edition, said regarding the exercises of February 21 in France: "The first half of the crowded and preliminary celebration of the Washington Bicentennial here was accomplished and was featured by the closest cooperation of French officials and the American colony since the American Legion convention in 1927."

AMERICAN LEGION INAUGURATES CELEBRATION

It was the American Legion that officially inaugurated the celebration by the laying of a floral offering at the monument to Lafayette in the Cour du Carrousel, Louvre, at 10:00 o'clock Sunday morning, February 21. Leaving Pershing Hall at 9:30, the Color Guard and the members of the Post Auxiliary and the Forty and Eight proceeded to the statue of Lafayette. Representatives of French veteran societies were awaiting them there with flags, as well as a crowd of more than five hundred people. In the name of the American Legion and its Auxiliary, Henry W. Dunning, commander of the Paris Post, laid the first wreath. This impressive ceremony was marked with a spirit of solemnity that pervaded the whole proceedings.

The French veterans were then invited to join the Legionnaires and proceed to the former home of Rochambeau in the Rue du Cherche-Midi. From the balcony of this historic dwelling Mr. S. T. Bailey, local chief of the Forty and Eight, hung the second wreath and made a short memorial address, eulogizing Rochambeau, which was translated by Mrs. Donald R. MacAffe, president of the Legion Auxiliary. From the home of Rochambeau the Legionnaires proceeded to the Benjamin Franklin statue in the Place du Trocadero where Mrs. MacAffe placed a bouquet and delivered a short address in French in the name of the American Legion Auxiliary, honoring "this great American to whom the credit must go for allying France with the colonies in the Revolution." The speech was translated into English by Mrs. Sedley Peck.

At the appointed hour of 11:00 o'clock, the American Legion contingent reached the statue of Admiral De Grasse on the Avenue du President Wilson, and here Mrs. Sanva Seymour placed the flowers in the name of the Forty and Eight. The Daughters of the American Revolution were represented at this ceremony by the Comtesse de Chilly, who spoke as leader of her organization.

The wreath-laying ceremonies, which took the Legionnaires and the Auxiliary units, the French veterans, the Daughters of the American Revolution, and other organizations to the four different historic monuments mentioned above, culminated in the ceremony at the Washington Monument in the Place d'Iéna at high noon. As befitted the occasion, the largest gathering of the series was grouped around this splendid equestrian monument of the one in whose honor the day was set apart.

Among the notables assembled at the base of this statue were: Norman Armour, Chargé d'Affaires ad interim of the American Embassy; General Stanley H. Ford, American Military Attaché; Charles C. Loeb, president of the American Chamber of Commerce in France; James Donoghue, of the American Club of Paris; Charles Beaumont, commander of the Benjamin Franklin Post of the Veterans of Foreign Wars; and Commander Sedley Peck of the Department of France of the American Legion.

Upon Commander Peck was conferred the honor of placing the wreath at the Washington statue. THE CHICAGO DAILY TRIBUNE, European edition, of February 22, 1932, commented on this series of wreath-laying ceremonies by saying that "with the hearty cooperation of French officials and veterans and representatives of other local American organizations, the Paris societies and the American Legion and its Auxiliary carried out its share of the Washington Bicentennial Celebration with telling success."

The activities of the American Legion culminated during the afternoon with an "open house" to all veterans and their families at Pershing Hall, the American Legion headquarters in Paris, which was characterized by the CHICAGO TRIBUNE as "the scene of a lively activity with hundreds of veterans and their families, including many French coming to visit the ex-service exhibition and dance in the illustrious memorial room, or fraternize at the bar."

At 5:30 Admiral Guépratte performed the impressive ceremony of decorating Commander Peck with the insignia of the Legion of Honor. He used the sword of Mrs. Peck's father in giving the accolade and praised Commander Peck's volunteer service with the French Near-East Army in 1916 and 1917 and his subsequent work in furthering accord between the French and American veterans, for which he was inducted into the Legion of Honor.

Others attending this ceremony included General Niessel, General Mariaux, governor of the Invalides, and many outstanding figures of the American colony in Paris.

The American Legion was also represented by its commander at the banquet at 1:00 p. m. on Sunday, February 21, 1932, given by the Société de Croix de Guerre at the Cercle Militaire. By happy coincidence the first annual banquet of this famous organization was scheduled for that date and in honor of George Washington a goodly part of the banquet program was devoted to the theme of the Bicentennial Year. Admiral Guépratte presided and the honored guests were Commander and Mrs. Peck, and Henry W. Dunning. Charles Beaumont, of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, and Frank P. Lahm, Air Attaché of the American Embassy in Paris, represented the United States. In speeches following the banquet, Admiral Guépratte and General Niessel, members of the Superior War Council, paid homage to the memory of Washington.

SERVICES IN PARIS CHURCHES

The churches of Paris honored the memory of Washington on Sunday, February 21. At the American Cathedral Church of the Holy Trinity, Rev. Francis W. Beekman sharply denounced the recent biographers of George Washington "who seek to tarnish pure gold on the pretext of fidelity to truth by regard for cheap sensationalism."

"Today and tomorrow, wherever Americans are gathered," Dean Beekman averred, "Washington will be honored. Many think of the great leader as a man, others as a soldier, and still others as a statesman, but we shall think of him in relation to the church.

"George Washington was neither a saint nor a sinner, but a strong, self-respecting, Christian gentleman. Baptized in the Christian church, he was taught not only from the Bible, but also from the prayerbook. In the early days when he was besieged at Fort Mifflin, he drew up the soldiers in formation every day and read the service from the prayerbook."

The dean then traced Washington's career through the Revolutionary War when he gave his first general orders enjoining attendance at divine service, and when the freezing, discouraging days of Valley Forge found him still relying on prayer for aid and comfort. Then, too, in his Farewell Address, Washington emphasized the personal and national dependence on God, the dean pointed out.

"When I was in New York last summer," continued Dean Beekman, "I went into St. Paul's Chapel, on Lower Broadway, and saw Washington's square pew with the great seal of the United States on the wall above it. I pictured him after he had taken the oath of office as the new country's first President leading the whole assembly of notables on foot to that chapel. Would that the heads of all governments were men of like faith and like spirit!"

This service was attended by a throng of French and American churchgoers and was given an official atmosphere by the presence of members from the American diplomatic staff, including Mr. Normon Armour, Chargé d'Affaires ad interim; Secretaries Harold M. Williamson and Alan Rogers,

Brigadier General Stanley H. Ford, Military Attaché, and Consul General Leo J. Kenna.

At the American Church of Paris on the Quai d'Orsay, three Washington services were held during the day. At the Sunday school session in the morning, Mrs. Henri C. Bohle and John Pollock conducted a children's program which was built around the theme of George Washington. A pageant in which George and Martha Washington were the principal characters and in which the boy and girl scouts of the church participated was viewed with delight by the large Sunday school audience.

At the regular church services at 10:45 a. m., Dr. Joseph Wilson Cochran, pastor of the church, delivered a sermon on "George Washington, the Christian." He introduced his discourse with the text: "The righteous shall be in everlasting remembrance." He said in part:

One hundred years ago tomorrow night in the City of Washington a distinguished gathering was listening to the impassioned eloquence of America's greatest orator—Daniel Webster. It was the climax of the celebration of the Centenary of the birth of George Washington. Webster's concluding sentence framed a prophecy now aptly fulfilled. His eyes rested in far vision upon this very event which we with all our fellow countrymen throughout the world are entering—the Bicentenary of Washington.

These are his remarkable words:

A hundred years hence, other disciples of Washington will celebrate his birth with no less of sincere admiration than we now commemorate it. When they shall meet, as we now meet, to do themselves and him that honor, so surely as they shall see the blue summits of his native mountains rise in the horizon, so surely as they shall behold the river on whose banks he lived, and on whose banks he rests, still flowing on toward the sea, so surely may they see, as we now see, the flag of the Union floating on the top of the Capitol; and then, as now, may the sun in his course visit no land more free, more happy, more lovely than this our own country.

Dr. Cochran concluded his sermon by quoting extracts from Emerson, Lord Erskine, and Charles James Fox, citing the respect and honor with which they regarded General Washington.

In the evening at 8:40 o'clock in the American Church the Students Atelier Reunion celebrated the bicentenary by singing French and American patriotic songs and listening to a Washington address especially prepared for the meeting by the Rev. Clayton E. Williams, student director. French, British and American citizens attended this meeting en masse and by their enthusiasm gave evidence of the admiration of the people of the three nations for George Washington.

CEREMONY AT THE SORBONNE

The bicentennial events of February 21 were climaxed by a ceremony beginning at 9:30 p. m. at the Sorbonne under the auspices of the Université de Paris and the Comité-Amérique. Ambassador Edge, in an official communication to the Department of State, referred to this ceremony as "the principal French contribution to the memory of Washington."

Scholars, artists, statesmen, military leaders, students and laymen made the great amphitheater of the Sorbonne resound with "encores" when the name of Washington was mentioned. This celebration seems all the more significant when viewed in the light of the comment made in the February 22 edition of the NEW YORK HERALD, of Paris, that "this tribute came from a nation momentarily in the throes of political problems such as Washington often had to meet."

The President of the French Republic, His Excellency, M. Paul Doumer, and Premier Tardieu were prevented from attending because of the governmental situation in France, but were represented by M. Louis Rollin, Minister of Commerce, and Colonel Le Bigot, the former presiding at the event. An augmented orchestra brought the audience to its feet time and again with the strains of the French and American National Anthems.

The speakers and guests of honor, who included virtually the entire staffs of the American Embassy and Consulate, and the representatives of leading American organizations in Paris, were seated in the long rows of the estrade, facing the great hall. The uniforms and decorations, the capes of the academicians, the bright gowns of notables' wives blended in a colorful picture.

In the absence of M. Charléty, rector of the university, Dr. Charles Cestre, professor of American literature and civilization in the Faculty of Letters, presented the university's message as a "simple note in the immense concert of universal applause." The speaker affirmed that he saw in George Washington the strong character, the honest spirit, the calm intelligence of the general and the president, who worked in peace and in war to raise up the edifice of the American Republic. A translation of Dr. Cestre's speech follows in full:

The United States has the privilege of possessing George Washington, a national hero who is not too far off in time to be known and understood as an ancestor of yesterday, and who is not too far above human stature to be revered and loved as one would a grandparent held intimately in one's memory. He is not enthroned in a Valhalla bastioned with lightning; he is not surrounded by an aureole of mystery; he is not dressed in the splendor of legend. He is a man great through qualities and virtues that the masses can understand, though far beyond their reach. The obstacles and tests which dishearten common mortals aroused him to action at the moment in the history of his country when burning patriotism and prophetic vision—fuel for his valor—were united with a composure, a moral vigor and a calm unshaken by the assaults of adversity. There is no need to gild his glory with the borrowed worth with which the naive inventions of the sanctimonious Parson Weems clothed him at the end of the Puritan era. The American of today wishes to see the true face of George Washington: a man not infallible, but whose faults are submerged in supreme qualities at the sign of danger; a man liable to prejudice, but whose firm convictions became a rock of safety in the storm; a man of one age, of one class and one society, who yielded his personal ideas and aspirations to the commands of duty and the call of the future.

We who are voicing on behalf of the University of Paris, a simple note in the immense concert of acclamation which tonight is raised all over the civilized world, like, above all, to behold in George Washington the strong character, the honest spirit, the calm intelligence of the general and President who twice, in war and in peace, constructed, to last through the centuries, the enduring and majestic edifice of the American Republic.

Of great men of history, George Washington was least of all the favorite of destiny. If, at the end of his life, he knew triumph, it is because he snatched it from fate by the force of his will. Admirable for the breadth of his intelligence and the nobility of his conscience, he was not endowed with the brilliant qualities which make heroes shine. His genius did not spring into being full-fledged with one thrust of the wing, one lightning flight: he rose without prowess, in one continued ascent to the summit.

An English aristocrat in a far-off land, he submitted at first to the disdain of the British. A gentleman landowner, he found himself handicapped in the management of his domain, by the fiscal laws of England. A free citizen, he felt himself injured by the tyrannic pretensions of the London Parliament. Indignation nourished revolt in him. He yielded to it with regret. That which sustained him in the struggle was his faith in his own country.

Commander in Chief of the insurgent nation, he had an intuition of the splendid future reserved for America. The nation did not yet exist: he created it. Congress agitated itself in vain discussions; the states, jealous of each other, quarreled among themselves; the people rebelled against military duty. Washington fortified himself against the chaos. With inflexible resolution, during seven years, he rolled his stone of Sisyphus, which continually fell back upon him. The powerful aid of France permitted him at last to repulse the invader.

He would have desired, as he wrote to Lafayette, to end his days in the shadow of his vine and fig tree. Necessity constrained him to become a man of state. The greatest need of the hour was order. Aristocrat born, he organized the government of the masses. Patrician in temperament and conviction, he gave an example, at the head of the state, of a strong personality. But he renounced as an insult the offer of a dictatorship.

He retired from power, this republican patriot, content in the knowledge that he had merited the good wishes of the nation. During the last two years of his life he became in the eyes of his citizens the symbolic image of patriotism. He rejoiced in the peace of a wise man, conqueror of destiny; conscious of never having commanded except to serve.

We bow before this hero—by the right of history, the Father of the American Nation; by the right of moral greatness, one of the glories of humanity.

WASHINGTON EULOGIZED

In the words of the NEW YORK HERALD, of Paris, "the career which Dr. Cestre etched with a few incisive lines was painted on a large and brilliant canvas" in the official eulogy of Washington by M. Firmin Roz, representing the United States division of the Comité France-Amérique, who summed up his estimate of Washington in these words: "George Washington was the father of his country because he was first, to an exceptional degree, the son of his country." The complete text of M. Roz's eulogy follows:

"A man is found . . ."

Is one not tempted to borrow this famous phrase in order to apply it to the hero whom we commemorate this evening? There is not, perhaps, another man in history to whom it better applies.

When the thirteen English colonies in America were forced to separate themselves from the mother country—to establish thus, a new nation whose progress in a century and a half has not only astonished a world but has changed the face of it—a man also was found who truly appears, from the place where we can today, in this second century since his birth, consider his role and his deeds, as the very epitome of the predestined hero. The secret of his genius lies perhaps in the exceptional and almost miraculous accord between the character of the man and the circumstances of his time. Character and circumstances had a common origin, sprang from the same source, issued from the same historic course of events. George Washington was the father of his country, because he was first, to an exceptional degree, the son of his country. Everything occurred as though the country had prepared him to be the instrument of the metamorphosis which was to make it a nation, and what strikes us most today, in the deeds of this incomparable man, is the marvelous relation between all that served in the preparation and all that was accomplished.

Let us look at the preparation.

The man who most definitely helped to create a common consciousness in the American people and to found upon this consciousness a lasting government, was born in Virginia, the oldest of the thirteen colonies—the "Old Dominion" as it was called with affectionate respect. He belonged to that aristocracy of land owners which the conditions of the times and place had made the directing class impregnated with a sense of its rights and privileges although with public spirit as well, and famous for furnishing to the community leaders capable of defending, and worthy of directing it. Of this class Washington was the most eminent and the most illustrious representative, because all of these traits were assembled in him to a high degree, and if one may say it, ingrained by the circumstances of his own life, which helped to develop and accentuate them to bring forth all the qualities of the man, gentleman and leader.

Being bereft of his father at the age of eleven and a younger son of the family, he was not sent, as were many of his class and his two elder brothers, to England to finish his schooling, but remained in his native Virginia, occupying himself from the age of sixteen years in assuring his personal independence. He entered the service of his neighbors, the Fairfaxes, the first family of the aristocracy of the province, surveying their lands in the west, and thus coming into contact with that region from which was to come, to the colonists on the coast, the call of a continent. He was thus as strongly rooted as possible in the soil of America when the death of his elder brother, who left him Mount Vernon and its responsibilities, changed his situation. He became the administrator of a large estate, responsible for old and young, and adjutant general of the militia of his district. He was twenty years old. Heredity, complemented by circumstances, had made him a gentleman. Life was charged with making a man; it was also going to make that man a leader.

The gentleman prepared for the soldier, the leader. From the very first he showed the qualities and virtues which were to characterize his entire career: an astonishing endurance to fatigue, a bravery unequalled in battle, an unwavering firmness in a crisis. The colonial wars were waged in regions covered with forests, without roads, where the troops never advanced without having to clear the way, where the adversary was often invisible and, therefore, all the more dangerous, especially when the adversaries were Indians, used to hiding themselves and adept in all ruses.

When Washington carried out his first mission, he had to journey in the dead of winter eight hundred kilometers through unbroken solitudes and his first two campaigns ended in reverses. Neither the confidence of the citizens nor their admiration were in the least diminished. "Our Colonel," wrote one of his companions-in-arms, "is an example of the power of the spirit in danger and fatigue and by his example, his endurance, he has conquered not only the respect but also the affection of officers and soldiers." His bravery above all impressed his troops most vividly. He seemed to them invulnerable. . . .

An English colonist, he had fought for the mother country, but with a feeling of fighting for the colonies, for the free expansion of those communities which had organized their life in the western hemisphere on the shores of the Atlantic, and which, with an instinct keener than that of any of his fellow citizens, he envisioned a great future. In the service of England he had already shown himself an American leader. When, the crisis approaching, it seemed to these communities that they could not pursue the course of their destinies except in independence and that, for this independence, it would be necessary to conquer the armies of the mother country, Colonel Washington found himself the most widely known officer in America. He had been, for fifteen years, through marriage, the largest land owner in Virginia and by his attitude in the state House of Burgesses, one of the most respected among the representatives, one of the stoutest in sustaining the rights of the colonists against the pretensions of the British Parliament.

Of the young Virginia leader, the Continental Congress naturally made a national leader; the colonel of militia of a province had now become, by choice of the delegates of all the provinces, General Washington, commander-in-chief of the Continental troops.

His destiny was making him "first in war." And now comes the time of accomplishment. It was a good thing for all the country that such a man at such a time, was charged with directing the fight. The Revolution, directed by him, took on some of his nobility. It was not only that the calmness and dignity emanating from his person made itself felt when he took command of the army, but also a spiritual influence. Without doubt the people whose acclamations at that moment assumed (according to the beautiful expression of an American historian) "the accent of a hymn", felt in him that force, superior to all other human greatnesses because it has something of the Divine—a directing power which works on human society as Creation did on chaos. To direct—that was the need and that was his first care. Order in the army is discipline. Washington disciplined his troops, worked unceasingly to equip them, renewed his efforts time and again to keep them under arms, for they were composed of volunteers and enlisted for a short time and he was perpetually seeing them dwindle under his eyes. Perhaps no leader was ever before confronted with so many great and recurring difficulties. Perhaps no leader knew better than he how to meet them; to make use of the means at his disposal; to make these go as far as possible; to accept the defects of his troops when he could not correct them; to make use of their qualities and their merits; to explain with untiring patience his difficulties and his needs to those who alone could help him surmount or satisfy them. No one has ever shown himself stronger and greater than he in adversity. It is that which explains to us today his final victory.

Our ancestors, the men of the eighteenth century, saw in him, above all, a champion of liberty. Later, in the nineteenth century in proportion as the nation which he founded began to fill out the great frame formed for it by nature—one can admire even more the hero of national unity. Today what strikes us most of all is his strength in a crisis, his steadiness in trying days, his faculty of "holding on" and his determination to hope, his faith in the future of the people whose fortunes, he realized, had been entrusted to him.

After the capitulation of Yorktown on October 19, 1781, the young nation was far from seeing the end of its difficulties with the triumph of its armies. The Revolution, it is true, was over, but its accomplishment carried a more difficult task than that of war. There was no national government. The thirteen colonies had adopted during the war a sort of Federal Constitution under the name of the Articles of Confederation and Perpetual Union but it was concerned principally with safe-guarding the autonomy of each group; there was no central executive power and the authority of the Constitutional Congress was but a shadow. The states alone could tax the country to pay the army; their thirteen governments were the only civil authority, and this authority was so divided that it did not have enough force to be effective.

It was again the inestimable good fortune of the American people that at such a critical moment Washington was there, that he kept command and continued to hold affairs in the strong reign of his will. The only effective symbol of authority and of law, he upheld the legal forms of government even when they were scarcely more than shadows. He did not use his power and his prestige except to enforce respect for laws. He infused into them thus the little reality which they had. He tried to uphold them when it would have been so easy for him (and someone dared to suggest it to him) to substitute himself for them. A magnificent example of self-control, of prudence and of wisdom!

By this abnegation, by this high conception of civic duty, he who had been the first in war showed himself now first in peace.

After such prolonged efforts and such hard trials, Washington thought he would find freedom for himself again. He surrendered his command to Congress and delivered an admirable discourse, simple and noble; then he retired to Mount Vernon without any other desire than to become again a simple Virginian on his estate, a good neighbor and a good citizen. Victory meant no more to him; he was content merely that the objective had been obtained. But the hero of independence was mistaken when he thought he could return to his former life. He was now the foremost personage in the country, the most famous perhaps of his time. He was obliged, in spite of himself, to play a new role in affairs. His own lands linked him inevitably to his country, as his trip into the West in the autumn of 1784 to visit his properties beyond the Alleghenies, proved. What the eyes of this great American now saw was the vision "of a world arising". A new perspective opened in his mind, at the same time that he foresaw the problems of government of a great nation and conceived the plan—or the dream—of an empire.

At that moment, there did not exist even the possibility of a new state, of a young nation; there was no Constitution to make it live. So long as the thirteen states, jealous of each other, continued to show themselves incapable of united action, there would be nothing to resemble an American nation. The conference at Annapolis in 1785 made an attempt to get together on the question to which Washington attached so much importance—that of the opening of the west by navigable streams. It succeeded only in revealing the necessity for a more general alliance and was followed by the conference at Philadelphia, which produced the new Constitution, and with it, the organization of a national government.

Washington was elected, by unanimous vote, President of the convention. He accepted the office against his will and not without declaring openly the inquietude which his political inexperience caused him. We can understand today, infinitely better than he could himself, how much his presence and his influence meant to the stability of action and gravity in deliberation of that assembly, so uncertain, so divided and yet invested with such a great responsibility. He was among some remarkable men, more accustomed than he to discuss political principles and methods, but discussions were only a means to an end and the hero of independence, with only his prestige, stood out among all these others. Better still, he kept before them the idea of a goal, the imperious necessity of attaining that goal.

It was realized by the Constitution of 1787, which still governs the United States. Again the country called to Washington; to him alone could be confided the functions of President. "We cannot do without you, Sir, wrote the Governor of Maryland, and there are thousands who can explain to all except yourself why we cannot do without you." It took such appeals, repeated on all sides, to overcome his resistance and apprehensions. The vote of the electors was unanimous and Washington took up his new duties with courage. He had not been, up to now, a statesman, but if he did not have a trained outlook, he at least had a strong feeling of what the new government should be—strong enough to maintain international peace, and to make itself respected abroad; with powers limited to permit local government to exist in every part of the Union. The course of history has proved that the first President of the United States gave to the political life of his country the exact orientation that it needed. It was not always easy to maintain an equilibrium between the two divergent tendencies that disputed the right to rule; and a still greater difficulty came from abroad when the French Revolution placed at sword's point in old Europe beyond the seas the former adversaries of the young American nation and its former allies. Washington, who was re-elected for a second term, did not see how to escape mortal peril except by imposing neutrality at any price on the two factions which divided the country, and that is why, also, he insisted so strongly in his farewell message on the absolute necessity of this people, still weak and whose first steps were still uncertain, remaining apart from European complications.

The terrific effort which he had put forth, the difficulties that he had encountered, the unjust criticism especially, this time made unshakeable his resolution to return to private life. But private life no longer sufficed for a public personage who had been lifted out of himself for such a long time and who had identified his existence with that of his country. The last two years of his life at Mount Vernon were saddened by a sort of melancholic nostalgia. It is expressed in his letters with a singularly moving accent, the more pitiable because he could not discern the real origin of his "malaise". Too big for a day by day existence, he was out of harmony with it. His letters show us that he was obsessed with the idea of his approaching end. Instinctively he felt that the hour was coming for him to leave the world where he had held such a great place, played such a great role, fulfilled such a great destiny. Death came suddenly, and he regarded it with the same calm, the same strength of soul with which he had regarded life. After an illness of two days, he died December 14, 1799, master to his last breath of speech and action.

One of the greatest figures of humanity, the greatest figure that America has yet presented to the world, entered into history, but not into the past, for death did not exhaust his creative power. To George Washington was given the great privilege of collaborating with the forces of the future; the incomparable fortune was given to him of being "first in war, first in peace, first in the hearts of his countrymen," and in their remembrance. Fortunate above all—when so many heroes can do no better than to devote themselves to a doubtful or lost cause—was he who presided, as did the gentleman of Mount Vernon, over the birth of a nation! Fortunate are those who realize the fruits of their mortal days in the certain glory of their immortality.

SPEAKS IN NAME OF FRENCH GOVERNMENT

M. Rollin spoke next in the name of the French Government. He recalled the reasons why the name of Washington has always inspired sentiments of admiration and of gratitude. That which places Washington among the great, that which seems exceptional and rare in him, he declared, is his moral courage—"the elevation of his thoughts, the absence of all personal ambition."

M. Rollin continued:

For instance, when he no longer thought that his continuance as the head of the army was indispensable, he resigned and he would not consent to enter into political life and to assume its highest functions until he was firmly convinced that he could render greater service than another in assuring the union of his country.

The indignant refusal which he gave the proposition made in 1782 by his companions in arms that he organize a coup d'état and make himself king, illustrates the lofty conception which he had of his duties.

"Be assured, Sir," he wrote to Colonel Lewis Nicola, "no occurrence in the course of the war has given me more painful sensations, than your information of there being such ideas existing in the army, as you have expressed, and I must view with abhorrence and reprehend with severity . . . I am much at a loss to conceive what part of my conduct could have given encouragement to an address, which to me seems big with the greatest mischiefs, than can befall my Country. If I am not deceived in the knowledge of myself, you could not have found a person to whom your schemes are more disagreeable."

It is known that following this and in spite of his own disinclination he consented to become the First President of the Republic which he had founded. It is known also with what noble simplicity he retired to the shadow of his "vine and fig tree" far from the intrigues and the noise of the world.

What were his relations with France? If at the beginning they were far from friendly, Washington came little by little to modify his first impressions.

His correspondence with Rochambeau, d'Estaing, Chastellux, and, above all, with him for whom he had a particular affection, Lafayette, is a source of edification to us for the cordiality and the fidelity of the sentiments which they express toward us. At the conclusion of peace he expressed his gratitude for services rendered with a delicacy and loftiness of thought which is worth citing.

"The articles of the general treaty," he wrote to LaLuzerne, "do not appear so favorable to France, in point of territorial acquisitions, as they do to the other powers. But the magnanimous and disinterested scale of action, which that great nation has exhibited to the world during this war, and at the conclusion of peace, will insure to the King and nation that reputation, which will be of more consequence to them than every other consideration."

"As Washington has shown the virtues of magnanimity and disinterestedness which we have always recognized in him, this reciprocity of esteem and of gratitude has created and perpetuated between his country and our own 'bonds of the highest nature which on two occasions in history have proved their unbreakable solidarity.'"

General Gouraud, Military Governor of Paris, spoke in behalf of the French Army in the absence of General Weygand, Commander of the Army.

"As a symbol of Franco-American comradeship ship," he said, "it is significant that the two peoples have never crossed the Atlantic except to come to the aid of each other."

General Gouraud "showed us the courage of the great American forming itself from adolescence," commented the French newspaper A LA SORBONNE. "He evoked the memory of the log-cabin, where during the War of Independence Washington and Rochambeau met to support each other with the same confidence that Pershing and Foch did at Chaumont. Washington and Rochambeau by their close union saved the independence of America just as 137 years later the cooperation between America and France saved the independence of our country. One envies Washington for having left, when he died, a state of whose boundaries he was sure, while we, living in a country less well protected by destiny, are obliged to keep our frontier a 'solid barrier of protection and of good guardians.'"

GENERAL GOURAUD PRAISES WASHINGTON

General Gouraud's address in full follows:

On behalf of the Army, the honor of celebrating the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington, should go to Marshal Pétain, the companion of General Pershing in the year of the victory, or to General Weygand, his successor to the command of the French Army.

The Marshal is absent; General Weygand has been kept from these functions by sickness, but thank God he is now out of danger and will soon be among us again.

It is thus that there falls to me the honor of speaking this evening in the name of the Army. I feel the weight of this honor and yet the task seems easy inasmuch as the two great peoples, separated by an immensity of water, not only have never made war on each other, but have never crossed the Atlantic except to come to the aid of the other. And then, also, should I not be helped by the memory of the strength, courage, and faith in success which animated the compatriots of Washington, who in 1918 fought at Champagne; the brave men of the Forty-second, Second and Thirty-sixth Divisions?

George Washington was born in Virginia in 1732. It is said that in his childhood he amused himself by playing at war, grouping and commanding his comrades as did the student Bonaparte at Brienne.

He spent his youth in the rude life of the pioneer. He was inured to fatigue and his bravery may be already remarked, since in one engagement, when the English General Braddock died, he had two horses killed under him and his clothes torn by bullets.

The war over, he established himself at Mount Vernon and for some fifteen years was a model family man and good farmer.

But the revolt of the Colonies against the projects of taxation of the English Government beginning, he left his retreat for the good of his country.

The beginnings of the campaign are full of difficulties; the militia are undisciplined, uninstructed. He begins by organizing the troops into three divisions of two brigades and assuming command. The Declaration of Independence, July 4, 1776, arouses enthusiasm, but the enemy is none the less menacing, and the militia have a great deal of trouble in resisting the regular troops. It becomes necessary to evacuate New York and Long Island and go to the other side of the Delaware. During the winter of 1776 times are hard; the ground is covered with snow and ice; the ranks dwindle; morale is low.

Washington realizes that the destiny of his country lies entirely with him, that he has, at all costs, to remedy the situation.

He decides and executes the daring crossing of the Delaware on the ice, Christmas night, 1776, the picture of which is so justly popular in the United States.

The next day he fights three Hessian regiments at Trenton and achieves another success at Princeton some days afterwards. These two successful battles awaken new courage. Militiamen rejoin the army. Franklin, in France, benefits by this return of fortune. Meanwhile, Congress had made Washington military dictator.

However, the situation is still grave. Although the German-English forces, under the command of General Burgoyne, coming from the north down the valley of the Hudson, had ended by surrendering at Saratoga in October—in the south, Washington is forced, in spite of many days of battles, to abandon the defense of the Delaware and the Capital City of Philadelphia. At the end of 1777 his small army goes into winter quarters in wooden huts among the forests of Valley Forge.

The year 1778 brings great help to the insurgents. February 6, King Louis XVI, signs the treaty of alliance prepared by Vergennes and Franklin. France, which had been represented up to now only by Lafayette, ranges itself on the side of the United States. The first consequence is the evacuation of Philadelphia by the enemy which feels the need of concentrating; but the forces of the new belligerents were coming across the sea and Washington continues to fight against a lack of men, lack of money, and indifference.

The year 1779 ends without a decision. In July, 1780, Rochambeau's troops, four regiments of the regular French army, disembark at Newport. At the same time important helps in the form of money begin to remedy the situation of the American troops and permit them to continue the war.

Later, new anxieties. Washington wrote in his diary: "Instead of having everything in readiness to take the field, we have nothing and instead of having the prospect of a glorious offensive campaign before us, we have a bewildered and gloomy defensive one—unless we should receive a powerful aid of Ships—Land Troops—and Money from our generous allies. . . ." This triple wish is satisfied by France in the Spring of 1781.

Now the question before the allied command is: to deliver New York or the South? For during the operations in the North, the English forces had invaded the South and taken Charleston. Their chief, General Cornwallis, with the help of his fleet, had established himself near the mouth of the Chesapeake Bay at Yorktown.

One can still see to the north of New York, in Wethersfield, Connecticut, an old wooden house. Here, and later before New York, Washington and Rochambeau held discussions. The arguments in favor of the South were strong, above all if the help of the French fleet of Admiral de Grasse could be counted on. But would it not return to the Antilles? To begin with, it would be necessary for the land forces to traverse twelve hundred kilometers in order to get to Yorktown, to cross large rivers and to get by the English troops in New York. With all of this, the decision whence sprang the independence of the United States was taken with a mutual confidence that united the two chiefs.

The same confidence reigned in 1918 in the conferences at Chaumont between Marshal Pétain and General Pershing and from it was born Victory. Memorable examples!

On September 5, 1781, the French division having joined the American forces, Washington, ordinarily so reserved, took Rochambeau in his arms when the latter announced to him the great news: The fleet of Admiral de Grasse has arrived and is blocking the mouth of the Chesapeake.

After six weeks of siege and a vigorous assault led by the Americans and Frenchmen, side by side, the town capitulated on October 19. The war was over. Through the action of the Americans and Frenchmen together the independence of the United States was established, just as, 137 years later, the independence of France was saved.

The great figure of Washington dominated the War of Independence: as a young man, inured to the fatigue, to the discomforts, to the dangers of war; as an older man, consecrated to founding a nation. When it was a question of right and of the independence of his country he did not hesitate; he gave up everything, although he wrote to a friend:

"Unhappy it is, though, to reflect, that a brother's sword has been sheathed in a brother's breast, and that the once happy and peaceful plains of America are either to be drenched with blood or inhabited by slaves. Sad alternative! But can a virtuous man hesitate in his choice?"

Are not the sentiments of this letter those which animated the people of France when they arose in 1914 to stop the invader?

The task of Washington was gigantic; an enormous country, no army, a troop of brave men, but without instruction or discipline. He wrote to Congress: "Men who have been free and subject to no control, can not be reduced to order in an instant."

For six years he had to fight not only against the enemy, but also against a lack of supplies, munitions, clothing, weapons, against discouragement. On certain nights during that winter at Valley Forge, others gave themselves up to despair, but Washington had a calm, unshakeable character, a resolute and sage spirit, a profound faith in his country, in the justice of its cause—and in God.

His military qualities are those of a magnificent soldier and a great leader; his decisions to cross the Delaware in the winter of 1776 and to march on Yorktown, revealed as much foresight as energy, and call forth our admiration.

His end attained, the man of war who had held the destiny of his country in his hands, resigned his command, and after having the honor of being the First President of the newly-born United States, retired to his home, the beautiful and simple residence of Mount Vernon, which we have so much admired at the Exposition. He could live there, at ease as to the future of his great country, protected against all danger by two wide oceans.

There is another country which nature has situated less securely. It has seen its frontiers beaten down too often not to be obliged to fortify them and to place its confidence in solid barriers and good guardians.

WASHINGTON'S LETTERS READ

A diverting interlude in the series of Washington's eulogies was furnished by M. Jacques Copeau, noted French author, who read with marked effect some of Washington's letters to Lafayette. Then, rising to sonorous heights, he described how Napoleon Bonaparte, as First Consul, had ordered that the man who "struggled against tyranny and consolidated the liberty of his country," should be mourned publicly for ten days, causing the audience to break into a furore of applause.

Senhor de Souza-Dantas, Ambassador of Brazil and dean of the American diplomatic corps in France, delivered a brief eulogy of Washington, citing these words of Chateaubriand: "Washington has not created a country, but a world. His name lives always in the hearts of free men."

Mr. Norman Armour, Chargé d'Affaires ad interim of the American Embassy, then delivered an address which has since been described by Ambassador Edge in a report to the Department of State as "distinctly the most eloquent of the evening, an opinion which seems to be borne out by the circumstance that FIGARO printed his remarks in full, a rare tribute from a French paper."

Mr. Armour, in his address, reminded the distinguished audience that in celebrating the memory of George Washington, those present should keep in mind the fact that the principles for which he fought are basically the same as those upon which the new France was founded.

"It is a source of keen regret to my Ambassador," began Mr. Armour, "that the delay in the arrival of his boat makes it impossible for him to be present with us tonight. He has, however, sent a radiogram which he has asked me to read to you:

"I AM DEEPLY SORRY NOT TO BE PRESENT TONIGHT AT THE CELEBRATION IN HONOR OF THE TWO-HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY OF WASHINGTON'S BIRTH, HELD UNDER THE AUSPICES OF THE COMITÉ FRANCE-AMÉRIQUE AND THE UNIVERSITY OF PARIS. THE AMERICAN PEOPLE WILL BE DEEPLY APPRECIATIVE OF THIS COURTEOUS COMPLIMENT TO OUR NATIONAL HERO, PARTICULARLY SO AS THE PRESIDENT OF THE REPUBLIC AND OTHER DISTINGUISHED OFFICIALS OF THE FRENCH GOVERNMENT HAVE SIGNIFIED THEIR INTENTION OF BEING PRESENT.

"WALTER E. EDGE."

Mr. Armour's address in full follows:

Mr. President, Ladies and Gentlemen: On February 6th last in New York, a banquet was given by the Comité France-Amérique upon the date which marked the 154th anniversary of the Treaty of Alliance between France and the United States of America, one of the most important and significant dates in American history, for on that date the French Government decided to lend its official support to the American colonies. On that occasion, Mr. President, you despatched a telegram to the Comité France-Amérique in New York, calling attention to the significance of that date. Tonight the Comité France-Amérique and the University of Paris have brought us together here to commemorate the fact that tomorrow marks the 200th anniversary of the birth of George Washington. Your presence here lends a special significance to the occasion. We like to feel that in your presence, as head of the French State, we meet once more to pledge our friendship and to renew those bonds which have remained unbroken through the intervening 154 years.

Mr. Ambassador (addressing the Brazilian Ambassador): It seems like a happy stroke of genius that this ceremony should have been held under the joint auspices of the Comité France-Amérique and the Sorbonne, for in our Western Hemisphere, in considering the results achieved by Washington and the significance of his work, we must inescapably think of the far reaching effects that the victory secured by his arms eventually had in bringing freedom to other peoples in our New World. At the name of Washington, there instinctively comes to our mind that great roll of liberators—San Martín, Artigas, Bolívar, Don Pedro, Sucre, and others,—who, like Washington, enabled those principles of republican freedom to be put into effect in the various colonies of the two Americas with the result that today we find ourselves a group of sister republics, bound together by common interest and understanding.

General Gouraud (turning toward the Military Governor of Paris): When Lafayette paid his last memorable visit to the United States in 1824, he was greeted on all sides by veterans of the Revolution who had served under him as "Mon General." Since the Armistice, you have three times visited the United States, and like Lafayette you have been greeted on all sides by the American officers and men who served under you, as "Mon General." The intimate relations which you held with these men have bound you to all sections of our country.

I like to think how happy Washington would have been to receive you at Mount Vernon as he received Lafayette after the war was over, when they talked over the campaign in which they had participated together, and so to have talked over with you those battles in which French and American troops participated in a common effort under your command.

I know also that no praise, no words of appreciation from anyone could have meant more than the words you have spoken about Washington tonight, coming as they do from another soldier, who like himself, has deserved well of his country.

It is a source of regret to all of us that the Rector of the University, M. Charléty, is not here tonight, but we realize that his absence is due to the very event which we are here celebrating, for we understand that he has gone to the United States to attend the inauguration of the statue of Lafayette in the Hall of Fame in New York and to participate in the celebrations attendant on the Washington bicentennial and Franco-American cooperation.

I can think of no more fitting surroundings in which to celebrate the birth of Washington than within these historic walls. It was here at the Sorbonne in 1750,—twenty-six years before the declaration of our Independence,—that the illustrious Turgot, in a striking passage of a great speech, prophesied that America would some day detach herself from the parent tree.

But a few months ago a distinguished delegation, headed by Marshal Pétain and of which the Vice-President of our Society—joint host tonight—the Duke of Broblie, was a member, left France to participate in the celebration of the 150th anniversary of the victory at Yorktown. At that time, the American Government and people sought to demonstrate to our French friends how deep is the gratitude, how fresh in our minds is the memory, of the material aid brought to us by France,—not only at the decisive victory at Yorktown, but throughout the Revolution. There is no need for me to mention that great list of names. They are as familiar to every American boy and girl as those of our own heroes, and their names are being pronounced tonight throughout our land with that of Washington.

At Yorktown we brought our thanks for the material aid extended us by France, but here, in this historic institution of learning, which has throughout so many centuries kept burning the flame of culture and of thought, we Americans would not forget the assistance, the impulsion, brought to our cause in those early days through French thought, through the influence of that group of philosophers,—Montesquieu, Voltaire, Rousseau, Diderot, d'Alembert, and the rest,—who in the eighteenth century gave to the world new ideas as to the rights of man, political equality and liberty. There would scarcely seem to be need for me to point out the influence of these writers upon our early patriots. There are, it is true, two schools of thought: those who claim that the American patriots were more influenced by the British school of philosophers, notably Locke, and those who stress the French influence. But I think it may certainly be said without fear of contradiction that the writings of the French group which I have mentioned had a very decided effect in America. Certainly Jefferson was influenced by Rousseau; in fact, there are passages of the Declaration of Independence which show clearly the effect exerted by the French writers; and Franklin was undeniably influenced by them. When in 1789 the drafters of the Constitution of the United States desired to make sure of perfect political liberty, they established a tripartite division according to Montesquieu's theory of the division of power into the executive, the legislative and the judicial elements, ensuring an equilibrium and adjustment.

The result was the absolute differentiation between President, Congress and Supreme Court. Less specifically, but none the less real, was the influence upon contemporary educated thought of the scepticism of Voltaire, the encyclopaedic knowledge of Diderot, and the passionate humanism of Rousseau. Surely it is not too much to say that French thought brought about in a large degree a situation in the solution to which French arms later so materially assisted.

In the study of natural science there exist two principal divisions: pure science and applied science. The latter is impossible without the former; the former—so long as a discovery remains merely in terms of formulae,—incapable of application in the lives of men, while none the less remarkable per se, yet of little benefit as a contribution to civilization. So in political science, the thoughts of men striving to better humanity, no matter how eloquently set forth nor how practical the philosophy may seem to be,—one instinctively thinks of the Republic of Plato,—are after all of little practical benefit to mankind if those ideal conceptions are not translated into action or not put to a practical application. One of the sources of French genius is the way in which the ideal is combined with the practical,—lofty conceptions of thought joined to the execution and application of such thoughts and ideas to practical life.

So a group of young Frenchmen, impressed by these new thoughts, their imaginations fired by the new world conjured up by the conceptions of these philosophers, were quick to see in the struggle of the American colonies the possibility of putting into practical effect, of planting in virgin soil, these new ideas and hopes and dreams.

That Lafayette himself appreciated the far-reaching significance of the issues at stake, and the possible effect of a successful termination of the struggle in putting into execution elsewhere the principles involved, is shown in a letter to his wife, written after receiving the news of the loss of his young daughter: "If the sad news that I received had arrived immediately, I should have left on the spot to join you; but the campaign which was opening did not permit me to leave; besides, my heart has always been convinced that in serving the cause of humanity and that of America, I am fighting for the interests of France."

Renan, in his Speech of Reception at the French Academy, April 3, 1879, said to the academicians: "Wherein lies your unity, Gentlemen? It is in the love of truth." One may say that the unity that existed from the first between Washington and the early statesmen of America and Lafayette, Rochambeau, and that gallant band of Frenchmen, was the love of liberty. It burned like a fire to warm them through that terrible winter at Valley Forge; it carried them along irresistibly when naught seemed left to them but their own indomitable courage,—the will to believe; the refusal to doubt.

Had they failed, what would the effect of such failure have been upon the world, upon the cause of liberty, upon those ideas and conceptions for the betterment of humanity for the practical application of which they were fighting? Would the disillusionment caused by such failure have postponed the successful proclamation of democratic doctrines in France, as was so soon to follow,—and not only in France but later in those other colonies of the Western Hemisphere which were later to become our sister republics?

So I like to think that in this celebration tonight you are celebrating not only the birth two hundred years ago of one who is to us Americans the Father of our Country, our greatest patriot, our first statesman, but that you are celebrating the birth of one who, by setting claim to and successfully defending the principles in the development of which French thought played so important a part, contributed towards the carrying into execution of those principles in France, as well as in the remaining colonies of the New World.

MUSIC BY GARDE REPUBLICAINE BAND

Not the least effective part of the Sorbonne celebration was the last half of the program, devoted to music of the two republics from the time of George Washington. The band of the Garde Républicaine played several of these old airs, especially thrilling the assembly with a rendition of "Yankee Doodle." Roger Bourdin of the Opéra-Comique charmed the assemblage with two 18th century songs, "Dans Quel Canton Est L'Huronie!" and "Lafayette en Amérique." Mlle. Mignon Nevada, of the Opéra, sang Benjamin Carr's "Willow, Willow," with lyrics from Shakespeare, and "Cupid and the Shepherd." She was accompanied by Irving Scherke, music critic of THE TRIBUNE.

Among the prominent persons present besides those already mentioned were Mrs. Walter E. Edge, Mrs. Norman Armour, Mr. and Mrs. Laurence V. Benét, Consul General and Mrs. Leo J. Keena, Mr. and Mrs. Homer Gage, Dr. and Mrs. Edmund L. Gros, Mr. and Mrs. T. Bentley Mott, Commander and Mrs. Calvin Cobb, Mr. and Mrs. Sedley Peck, Dean and Mrs. Frederick W. Beekman, Mr. and Mrs. Benjamin H. MANIFESTATION OF FRANCO-AMERICAN GOOD WILL

The enthusiasm for the Bicentennial Celebration in France, stimulated by Sunday's observance, had not abated on Monday, February 22, but had gained tremendous momentum. The entire American colony of Paris and thousands of Frenchmen joined in a series of ceremonies and banquets on the two hundredth birthday of George Washington, which the NEW YORK HERALD, of Paris, on February 23, 1932, described as "the greatest manifestation of Franco-American good will ever celebrated on an American national holiday here."

The American Veterans of Foreign Wars, Benjamin Franklin Post 605, had the honor of opening this day's ceremonies. Led by a color guard of ten members of the Veterans of Foreign Wars and ten French non-commissioned officers, carrying twenty American Revolutionary War flags loaned by the Invalides Museum and supported by a firing squad and more than fifty members of the Veterans' organization, the contingent proceeded to the equestrian monument of George Washington in the Place d'Iéna.

At the monument a large gathering awaited the veterans, including the following dignitaries and military officials: Francois Latour, President of the Municipal Council, who spoke in eulogy of Washington; General Gouraud, Military Governor of Paris; General Mariaux, Governor of the Invalides; M. Faillot, Vice-President of the Municipal Council; M. Renard, Prefect of the Seine; the blind Deputy Scapini; Colonel Raynal, defender of Fort de Vaux; Comte de Chambrun, descendant of Lafayette, who also spoke; M. de Neveu, Vice-President of the Sons of the American Revolution; Comtesse de Chilly, State Regent of the Daughters of the American Revolution, who also addressed the veterans; Norman Armour, American Chargé d'Affaires ad interim; other members of the American Embassy and consular staffs, including Consul General Leo J. Keena, and representatives of the Médaille Militaire, Croix de Guerre, Grands Invalides and other French veterans' organizations.

The flags of these societies, massed about the statue of Washington and intermingling with the various uniforms created a pageantic scene. While the assembled hosts stood in reverential silence, three wreaths were placed upon the flower-bedecked base of the statue: One by Charles Beaumont, Paris Commander of the Veterans of Foreign Wars; one by the Comtesse de Chilly on behalf of the Daughters of the American Revolution, and the third by M. de Neveu for the Sons of the American Revolution. Each spoke briefly of the significance of the day, lauding the good will between France and America resulting from the friendship of Washington and the French officers who contributed to America's victory in the Revolution.

Immediately after this ceremony the veterans and their flag-bearers motored to the tomb of Lafayette, in the Picpus Cemetery, where four garlands were placed in the name of the national and local Veterans of Foreign Wars organizations, the Daughters of the American Revolution and the Sons of the American Revolution.

Commander Beaumont, standing at the grave of Lafayette, rendered a tribute to Washington in which he said in part:

During his seven years as General and his eight years as President, he never lifted a finger for his own advancement or profit. In all the human chronicle, there is not another man who did so much for his people and asked so little of them. Of all creators of nations he was the meekest, most modest servant of the public welfare, and therefore the most majestic.

And so we owe Washington multitudinous debts that we cannot pay and of which most of us never heard. But our greatest debts to him are the creation of our Republic, the salvation of it from foreign attack, and from disruption and destruction through domestic discord, but above all, for the establishment of a sublime ideal of patriotism.

Let us remember one of Washington's sentences, "The game is yet in our own hands; to play it well is all we have to do. . . . Nothing but harmony, honesty, truthfulness to our friends and frugality are necessary to make us a great and happy nation."

M. de Neveu spoke of the amicable relations between France and America at the time of the Revolution, the significance of the continuance of this good will to the present and the assurance of its perpetuation in the infinite future.

During the afternoon, as a manifestation of the American ideals held in common by the Veterans of Foreign Wars and the Daughters of the American Revolution, the Veterans presented the Daughters with an autographed copy of "The American's Creed." Comtesse de Chilly received the gift and presented each of the bearers with an ivy leaf from the home of Washington's ancestors in England, Sulgrave Manor.

On behalf of Mrs. Hugh Reid Griffin, of London, framed portraits of George Washington and pictures of the celebrated manor were presented to the Daughters of the American Revolution by the Comtesse de Chilly. The new regent, Mrs. Frederic Shearer, read an excerpt from Lincoln's biography, stating that it was the custom of the Daughters of the American Revolution to honor Lincoln as well as Washington at the February meeting of the chapter.

The veterans concluded their Bicentennial activities of the 22nd with a dance and buffet supper in the evening at the Bohy-Lafayette Hotel. More than two hundred Americans and Frenchmen attended this social climax to a day of tribute to America's First President.

One of the pleasant bicentennial social interludes in Paris on February 22 was a luncheon at the American Women's Club. The national emblems on the tables and the general patriotic atmosphere of this gathering symbolized the feeling of American women residents abroad for the institutions founded by George Washington.

Mrs. Walter V. Cotchett, president of the club, introduced General Stanley H. Ford, Military Attaché of the American Embassy in Paris, who gave a short talk on George Washington's qualifications as a leader, emphasizing the fact that the First President was not only a great patriot and statesman, but also a great soldier. Mrs. Walter E. Edge and Comtesse de Chilly had places of honor. The singing of "La Marseillaise" and the "Star Spangled Banner" by Mme. d'Argel brought the luncheon to a close.

AMERICAN NATIONS JOIN IN CELEBRATION

The United States invited Canada and the Latin American republics of the Western Hemisphere to join in celebrating the Bicentennial of George Washington in Paris at an official Embassy luncheon on February 22, at which Canadian and American diplomats in Paris were the honor guests.

The importance of fraternal cooperation and solidarity between the nations of North, South and Central America and the hope of adoption by all these nations of an identical goal were voiced in the principal address on this occasion, written by United States Ambassador Edge and read in his absence by Mr. Armour, Chargé d'Affaires ad interim, who acted as host.

Mr. Armour pointed out that the annual presence of these diplomats at the Washington Birthday luncheon afforded striking evidence of the fact that the great liberators of the Western Hemisphere, widely separated as they were by time and distance, belonged by virtue of their common ideal not to one people alone but to the American nations as a whole.

The full text of Ambassador Edge's address is as follows:

Year by year, you, my Colleagues of the Western Hemisphere, join in the commemoration of Washington's birthday. In so doing, you not only pay a gracious compliment to my country and my country's First President but give striking evidence that the great liberators of our continents, widely as they were separated by time and distance, belonged by virtue of their common ideal not to one people alone but to the collectivity of American Republics.

Under these circumstances I am confident that as we foregather again today you will share with me the solemnity attached to the present occasion. It is not an ordinary observance but the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington. In fact, as we in this room recall the significance of that statesman's life, we are joining our thoughts and action to those of a hundred and twenty million of my fellow countrymen who are inaugurating a period of celebration of some nine months which my Government has designated for the commemoration of its national liberator.

There is something inspiring in the realization that so many millions are uniting to render homage to a man who was of the 18th century but who belongs to all time. No rhetorical tribute need be paid George Washington—the observance of this bicentennial celebration is in itself at once an epitaph and a talisman for the future. In unmistakable terms it proclaims that Washington so wrought that the passage of two hundred years has not dimmed the gratitude of his country nor altered the principles for which he stood.

At the present moment of passing discouragement—for the past year has not been a kind one to any of our nations—there is comfort for us in the knowledge that convictions and institutions can stand firm through the centuries. It teaches us that, while we should scrutinize the year's mistakes for their lessons, if we view the march of affairs with sufficient perspective we may have confidence in ultimate stability. There is comfort, too, in the thought that in the larger sense our fatherlands have conceived an identical goal and that this very year, the representatives of all our Republics plan to convene at Montevideo in the Seventh Pan-American Conference in a cooperative effort to solve our mutual problems.

Let us therefore raise our glasses, not to the past and its adversity, save as it gave us great leaders such as Washington, but to the future which, if we are guided by the common sense, the courage and the spiritual insight of our founders, holds forth the promise of material and moral progress and a closer unity of nations.

Senhor de Souza-Dantas, Brazilian Ambassador to France, voiced the sentiments of his country in response to the address of the American Ambassador, declaring that Washington's name is glorified in all free countries as an example of civic virtue and patriotism.

Senhor de Souza-Dantas' speech follows in full:

It is a great pleasure to my Colleagues and myself to be assembled here once again according to a beautiful and fraternal tradition. We are particularly happy today, due to the fact that we are commemorating and celebrating the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington.

I am confident that it coincides with the desire of all my Colleagues to turn our thoughts affectionately toward the great ambassador whose guests we have so often been at this same table: Ambassador Myron T. Herrick, whose loss we so deeply regret, and always will.

North Americans call George Washington the Father of their Country. But George Washington does not belong only to the glorious country he founded: he belongs to the whole world. He is one of the greatest citizens of Humanity. For that reason his name is glorified not only in America, but in all free countries, as an example of virtue, civism and patriotism. Jefferson said of him that he enjoyed the confidence of all, and that if his companions were party leaders he had the authority of a national chief; and Chateaubriand declared: George Washington did not create a nation, he created a world.

Let us drink, my dear Colleagues, to the immortal glory of George Washington, to the prosperity of the great and mighty nation he founded, to our dear Colleague and friend Ambassador Walter E. Edge—and let us pay our most gracious respects to his beautiful and virtuous spouse.

The Minister of Uruguay, Señor Guani, delivered a plea for unity of spirit among the American peoples. He said:

The gathering to which we are so kindly convoked by the Ambassador of the United States upon the occasion of the anniversary of the birth of George Washington, takes on, this year, a very particular significance, since it coincides with the bicentenary of that memorable date.

Just two hundred years ago, there was born in the State of Virginia, a great Republican hero, one of the most illustrious men of the 18th century, that great epoch of struggle and of creation, exceptionally fecund in glorious figures in the domain of philosophy and arts as well as in political and military life.

"Washington," said Chateaubriand, who did not lightly eulogize, "was the representative of necessities, of ideas, of the enlightenment and the opinions of his time; he seconded, rather than opposed, the movement of great minds; he wanted that which he ought to have wanted, the very thing for which he was called: the coherence and the perpetuity of his work. This man, who was so little striking because he was of just proportions, merged his existence with that of his country: his glory is the patrimony of civilization; his renown rises like one of those sanctuaries wherein flows a copious and inexhaustible spring for the people.

All of the young American democracies represented here are happy, I am sure, to render the most fervent homage to the enlightened precursor of our liberties and of our destinies in the contemporaneous world.

I also believe that the other democracies of the world will join us, remembering that Lafayette, that other great apostle of the liberty of the peoples, conceived the idea of sending to General Washington a key to the Bastille, saying: "American principles have opened this bastion of despotism; with you the key will be in its right place."

All this, my dear colleagues, is the history of the past, but notwithstanding, it is very necessary that we frequently turn toward it, in order to draw therefrom lessons for the present and the future.

The hours through which the world is now passing, as the Ambassador has just said in his discourse, are above all, hours of discouragement and of waiting.

Let us not insist too much upon the errors committed, nor upon the faults certainly attributable to events which often are beyond human foresight. But let us have an optimistic confidence, soundly based upon the great and fertile lessons bequeathed by the past.

Let us wish that above the interests, above the passions, or the egoisms, there shall soar in the world the spirit of confraternity and international solidarity which has always prevailed in the relations of the peoples of the occidental hemisphere. This year, Montevideo will have the honor and the joy of bringing together the delegates to the Seventh Pan-American Conference, and I am happy in foreseeing and in desiring that in the course of this important international manifestation, the great principles of collaboration which we wish to see dominate throughout the entire world, directed towards peace and universal happiness, shall crystallize and blossom among the States represented.

I drink to the health of the Chief of State of North America, of his illustrious Ambassador in Paris, Mr. Walter Edge, and to all the countries of Latin America, to France, that dear and gentle France, whose great examples of political liberty and of social equality have nourished our hearts and which has always illumined our road with its powerful spiritual light.

Among those present were: Sr. Alfredo Vasquez Cobo, Minister of Colombia; Hon. Philippe Roy, Minister of Canada; Sr. Caballero de Bedoya, Minister of Paraguay; Dr. Garcia Mella, Minister of the Dominican Republic; Sr. Francisco Garcia Calderón, Minister of Peru; Sr. Manuel Amunategui, Minister of Chile; Sr. Carlos Manuel de Céspedes, Minister of Cuba; Sr. Eduardo Perez Quesada, Chargé d'Affaires of Argentina; Sr. Moreno Canas, Chargé d'Affaires of Costa Rica; Sr. Joaquin Paredes, Chargé d'Affaires a. i. of Salvador; Sr. Raoul A. Amador, Chargé d'Affaires of Panama; Sr. Alejandro Alonso-Rochi, Chargé d'Affaires a. i. of Nicaragua; M. Henri Laraque, Counselor of the Haitian Legation; Sr. Costa du Rels, Chargé d'Affaires of Bolivia; Sr. Luis Quintanilla, First Secretary of the Mexican Legation; Sr. Raoul Capriles, Secretary of the Venezuelan Legation; Sr. Luis A. Dillon, Special Counselor of the Ecuadorian Legation; Leo J. Keena, United States Consul General; Captain David Le Breton, Naval Attaché of the American Embassy; Fayette W. Allport, Commercial Attaché; Harold L. Williamson, Second Secretary; Colonel Frank P. Lahm, Assistant Military Attaché, and Alan Rogers, Third Secretary of the American Embassy.

AMERICAN CLUB BANQUET

More than two days of impressive Franco-American ceremonies in commemoration of the George Washington Bicentennial culminated in Paris on the evening of February 22 with a brilliant banquet at the Hôtel Palais d'Orsay. Led by the President of the French Republic, Paul Doumer, more than 300 French and American notables convened at the banquet which was held under the auspices of the American Club of Paris in collaboration with the Association Amicale des Anciens Officiers de Liaison près l'Armée Américaine and the Military Order of Foreign Wars.

Republican Guards with drawn sabres lined the long staircase leading up to the banquet hall. Their famous band played "La Marseillaise" and "The Star Spangled Banner" as the guests entered and later enlivened the dinner with favorite American airs, among which "Dixie" and "Yankee Doodle" were the most applauded.

President Doumer occupied the chair of honor beside Mr. Norman Armour, American Chargé d'Affaires, who represented the United States Government in the absence of Ambassador Edge. Above them were the flags of the United States and France and a rare original portrait of George Washington by Gilbert Stuart from the Lewis collection hung among the tri-colored folds. Marshals Pétain and Franchet d'Espéray, Champetier de Ribes, Minister of Pensions, and Pierre-Etienne Flandin, Minister of Finance, were also seated at the table of honor, representing the French Government and Army.

Radio carried the program of the banquet to the United States and millions of Americans on the western side of the Atlantic during the afternoon of February 22 heard President Doumer in far-off Paris pay "patriotic and fervent homage" on behalf of the entire French nation to the memory of the First President of the United States.

BICENTENNIAL BANQUET OF THE AMERICAN CLUB IN PARIS. VIEW OF THE SPEAKERS' TABLE. THIS NOTABLE FUNCTION AT THE HOTEL DU PALAIS D'ORSAY WAS ATTENDED BY PRESIDENT DOUMER, OF THE FRENCH REPUBLIC.

The short-wave radio broadcast lasted more than an hour. The impressive scene at the Hotel Palais d'Orsay was described to the countless listeners in the United States and elsewhere by Leland Stowe, and four notable speeches in French and English interspersed with patriotic airs played by the Garde Republicaine Band, were broadcast.

It was the first time a President of France had spoken at a George Washington Birthday Celebration, and, as reported by Ambassador Edge in a letter to the Department of State, "only the second occasion upon which the President of France has deviated from the general practice of not talking over the radio, both instances, incidentally, being at American gatherings."

President Doumer's brief but memorable address made a deep impression upon the notable assembly at the Hôtel Palais d'Orsay, while Americans at home heard with gratitude this tribute to the Founder of the American Republic broadcast to the world by the official spokesman of the French people.

"On this day," said the President of France, "when beyond the ocean the United States of America are commemorating the ever-living personality of that great citizen, Washington, I am happy to associate the unanimous French nation with this patriotic and fervent homage.

"George Washington holds a great place in the history of the world. In our eyes he symbolizes the noble and generous aspirations that are common to our two peoples and which carry them forward towards an ever more elevated, more human ideal of civilization, through justice and through liberty."

On behalf of the Government and people of the United States, Mr. Armour, the American Chargé d'Affaires, thanked the President of France for the friendship he evidenced in attending this banquet in observance of the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington and recalled amid enthusiastic applause that national mourning throughout France was decreed by Napoleon Bonaparte when the news of George Washington's death was received.

MESSAGE FROM THE AMBASSADOR

Mr. Laurence Hills, president of the American Club, who presided at the banquet, introduced Mr. Armour, first reading a radio message from Ambassador Edge aboard the steamship Ile de France, expressing keen disappointment and regret at his inability to be present.

Turning to the President of France, Mr. Armour said:

Mr. President: Allow me to say a few words personally.

Twice during the past twenty-four hours you have associated yourself directly with ceremonies organized in Paris in honor of the Bicentennary of the birth of Washington: yesterday evening in being represented at the ceremony organized by our French friends, today by coming in person to this essentially American meeting. These two gestures on the part of the Chief of the French State are an honor, as well as a gracious testimonial of friendship by which all Americans are deeply touched, those in France and those in the United States.

So far as I know, once only up to the present time has the Chief of the French State taken part in ceremonies of so imposing a nature in honor of Washington. When the news of his death on December 14, 1799, reached France, the Republic declared national mourning. For ten days, officers of the French army wore crepe and flags were placed at half mast. A ceremony of unparalleled splendor was held at the Temple of Mars—as the Invalides was then called—where Fontanes, the greatest orator of the day, delivered a funeral oration in the presence of the Chief of the French State. That Chief of State was the young Bonaparte.

When the applause which greeted this brief personal response to the President of France had died down, Mr. Armour proceeded with the principal address of the evening which had been composed by Ambassador Edge and was delivered by Mr. Armour in his behalf.

Departing from the tradition of mere eulogy customary on such occasions, the Ambassador's address, as the CHICAGO DAILY TRIBUNE (European Edition) declared next day, "struck a grave and sincere note in outlining America's foreign policy as derived from George Washington's historic farewell address."

The full text of Ambassador Edge's speech, as read by Mr. Armour, follows:

Mr. President, Gentlemen: On behalf of my fellow countrymen, I desire to thank the President of the French Republic for joining tonight in our national tribute to George Washington. We are beholden to M. Doumer for the high honor which he has bestowed on the Americans of Paris by attending this banquet. We are deeply indebted to him for the gracious compliment which he has paid Americans everywhere by associating himself with the celebration of the 200th anniversary of the birth of our country's patriot, founder and first President.

M. Doumer, who has so frequently, so practically, so stir-ringly demonstrated his understanding of America and the American people, will readily fathom the respect and recognition which animate us tonight as we look back across the years at the towering figure of Washington, who more than anyone has come to personify the American Republic. He will appreciate the extent of the obligation of the American people to the inspiring leader who exemplified, in war and in peace, the qualities of patience, fair dealing and harmony with neighbor and nation which make for domestic welfare and international tranquility.

For Washington, to all who love balanced liberty, is, and will forever be, a shaft of strength and a pillar of stability in our Republic. Our freedom, our ordered democracy, our national power are monuments to his inspiring genius. We admire him as a man. We revere him as a master. We seek to emulate his wise example and to profit from the breadth and soundness of his constructive statesmanship.

To commemorate his place in American history, the Congress has set apart the year 1932, the Bicentennial of his birth, for the celebration of his achievements and the comprehensive study of his career. The George Washington Bicentennial Commission, with a stimulating devotion to its patriotic task, has promoted the commemoration; states, cities, public-spirited societies and citizens have cooperated in organizing the program. In Paris, we are particularly fortunate in having a committee which is set up for the purpose of bringing together Americans living abroad in a brotherhood of reverence for "the pioneer, the soldier, the statesman, the husbandman, the exemplar of American citizenship—George Washington."

In carrying out the program of Congress, many Americans during this year of commemoration will seek a better understanding of the Founder. Some will devote their attention to his youth or to his first public appearance as a resolute young officer. Doubtless, others will describe him as frontiersman, surveyor, administrator and colonial proprietor. Many more will portray him as Commander in Chief, patriot, statesman and president.

But as Americans resident abroad, all more or less actively and all directly, interested in the foreign policy of our country, it would seem peculiarly appropriate for us here in Paris to weigh the sage counsel of George Washington in the matter of American foreign doctrine and to consider its practical application to the outstanding problems of our day.

Two quotations from Washington's Farewell Address immediately come to mind. The first that "... nothing is more essential than that permanent, inveterate antipathies against particular nations and passionate attachments for others, should be excluded; and that in place of them, just and amicable feeling towards all should be cultivated."

The second, that "The great rule of conduct for us in regard to foreign nations is, in extending our commercial relations, to have with them as little political connection as possible."

In other words, American policy as conceived by Washington should, briefly, consist, first, in an impartial, independent attitude toward all nations and, second, in no political alliances—no meddling which tends to involve us as a nation needlessly in other people's affairs and is apt to prove thankless and inconclusive, in the end tending to make enemies rather than friends.

The corollary of these conceptions has come to be that the United States is willing to associate itself temporarily for a given purpose with another Power or group of Powers—the cooperation ceasing when the limited end is fulfilled.

From the time of Washington to the present day, these concepts and the corollary have remained the fundamental, traditional bases of American policy. They were evolved out of our national character and confirmed by our national experience. It is under their protection that we have become what we are. Born with our Republic, they are of the essence of America. Reinforced in 150 years and consolidated, they constitute the keystone of the arch of American doctrine.

To ignore, or to forget, the basic principles which have preserved American independence and safeguarded our growth to a sturdy maturity, is to pave the way for malice and misunderstanding.

Indeed, too often in the war and post-war years, a misconception of the aims and objects of American policy has led to indictment and criticism of the American Government and even of the American people. Despite the efforts of American leaders and spokesmen to clarify our position, some of our friends have failed to understand the spirit in which we entered the war, our efforts to prosecute it and the resumption afterwards of our traditional impartial attitude. From this lacuna has arisen the tendency to misjudge our attitude toward some of the most pressing of our contemporary problems.

Unflinching, the United States converted itself from a peaceful industrial community into a mighty war machine, a nation in arms in which no one was exempt, in which every man, woman and child had his and her part to play, in which the sinews of war, men, maintenance, and money were mobilized to help bring about victory.

The American Government at the close of the war asked neither for territorial aggrandizement nor for political advantages. It specifically relinquished all claims to reparations and thereafter consistently refused to be drawn into a position where the American taxpayer could be shown to be the direct or indirect recipient of sums due or paid to the Allied Governments. This attitude may be said to be in keeping with the historic policy of the United States which is traced back to Washington.

Looking upon war debts as engagements freely entered into, and subscribed to by the American people with that understanding, the American Government, after the war, examined individually with each of the nations which was obligated to the United States the funding of its debts and reached a separate and distinct agreement with each as to the amount of repayment which would be required. Much of this was actually loaned after hostilities had ceased.

In this process, the individual debts were very materially scaled down.

Today, the financial and economic depression, which has reached every corner of the world, in which, it is needless for me to point out, the United States is a conspicuous sufferer, has developed a situation which has brought new burdens and has greatly disturbed and shaken the economic equilibrium. As a result our European neighbors are reviewing just what this will require of them in the way of possible readjustments between themselves. While these conversations and negotiations are taking place, it would be improper for me to discuss the future in any of its possible phases. Suffice it for me to reiterate that the United States will not make commitments in advance as to future policies.

However, the United States, while adhering to its historic Washingtonian policy of dissociation and detachment, has very clearly manifested its willingness to cooperate, where cooperation may be productive of constructive results, and to concede where concession may be conducive to progress and stability. Without interfering in other nations' affairs, it has sought to establish its own interests in a loyal and effective manner.

As history well records, this does not mean that the United States is unwilling to shoulder its responsibilities or desires to shirk its part in endeavoring to help solve the many problems confronting the world today. A review of American participation in various conferences of an international nature during the years succeeding the war would disprove that. The Washington Conference of 1921-22, which was called on the direct initiative of the American Government to discuss limitation of naval armaments as well as problems arising out of the Far East, is but one example. The unselfish policy adopted by my country at that time cannot be successfully challenged. The Naval Conference at London is another. We have also participated in innumerable meetings of an international nature held under the auspices of the League of Nations, notably, the Preparatory Disarmament Conference at which our delegates did their best to help in solving problems, even those in which American interests were not directly concerned. Finally, we are at the present moment participating in a conference taking place at Geneva, the significance of which in influencing the future of our international relations can scarcely be overestimated.

In short, in its recent history the United States has demonstrated that, when a cause is just, it can be counted upon to do its share with resolution, foresight and courage.

But when the goal is reached, the United States can equally be counted upon, in fulfillment of the injunctions of George Washington, to resume the normal course of its impartial activity.

ADDRESS OF LAURENCE HILLS

One of the many eloquent addresses during the Bicentennial Celebration in France was the brief speech of Mr. Hills at this banquet. Referring to the President of France, he said M. Doumer emphasized in his character "those qualities of which Washington set an example as the founder and first head of our Republic." The United States and France, said Mr. Hills, have a sentimental association deep in the hearts of the people that "burns like a beacon in every school room." His address follows:

Our purpose in assembling here tonight is to commemorate one of those events in human history which, unsignalled at the time, changed the face of our civilization and deeply affected the destiny of mankind. Our beloved country which this great man, our immortal Washington, made into a nation, was not the only consequence of that event two centuries ago. Destiny decreed that this American, who never crossed the seas, should by his character and his deeds so stir the minds of men as to advance the cause of human liberty and democratic government throughout the world and lead other races and other lands to attempt to change their form of government and be free. Of these, France was the first. Uniting with us in the darkest days of the American struggle for liberty, France not only made possible for us the victory of Yorktown, but insured for herself her own freedom as a democratic republic.

As we meet here in this country to which the thoughts of Washington turned so anxiously in the desperate days of Valley Forge, we are impressed not alone by the significance for both America and France of the birth of Washington which we are celebrating today, but also by the outstanding importance, in the fulfillment of his destiny and for future civilization, of that alliance contracted here at the lowest moment of his fortunes. It is appropriate that collaborating with us in this celebration should be the Association of the French Liaison Officers with the American Army of the World War and also the Military Order of Foreign Wars.

We, Americans, salute the President of the French Republic who, in the simplicity of his life, in the loftiness of his patriotism, may be said to emphasize those qualities of which Washington set an example as the founder and first head of our Republic.

In the march of human events the permanence of those principles for which Washington contended has become increasingly manifested until today, the republican form of government has spread throughout Europe and around the world. Despite the floodlight of modern critical research thrown upon the character of him who created the American nation, his extraordinary fame stands undiminished, his noble figure still remains to spread its splendor through the ages and to stimulate those who struggle in the cause of real democracy—"one of the noblest lives," said Talleyrand, "that ever honored human history."

Force, resolution and calm were among his astonishing qualities. For the problems of the present day what an example for our statesmen! We are proud that America gave this great man to the world. We are grateful for the recognition given his efforts by France. We are grateful for the military aid which made possible the accomplishment of his mission. In the example of that great republican soul our two countries, America and France, have a common heritage. Difficulties of the moment may seem to obscure this sentimental association symbolized in our common veneration of Washington, but deep in American hearts it exists; it burns like a beacon in every schoolroom of our land where our future citizens are moulded.

It is recorded that when the anniversary of the French alliance was celebrated in 1783, Washington himself gave the motto of the day to his army as "America and France," and the countersigns ordered by him were the two words "united" and "forever." In the spirit of these two words, may our two nations ever go forward in the cause of liberty and justice.

WASHINGTON STANDS FOR GOOD WILL

M. Delsol, Member of the French Chamber of Deputies and President of the Association Amicale des Anciens Officiers de Liaison près de l'Armée Américaine, delivered an impressive speech, declaring that the name of George Washington stands as a symbol of the good will long existing between the Republics of France and the United States of America.

"We who have seen the American Army in the field," said M. Delsol, "know how greatly it contributed to victory. Between America's veterans and us there can be no cloud of misunderstanding, but only an indestructible friendship."

The ceremonies were brought to a close with an eloquent tribute to George Washington and the United States by M. Champetier de Ribes, Minister of Pensions, speaking for the French Government, who recalled the story of Franco-American friendship in war and peace from Yorktown to Verdun. He said:

It is eminently fitting that the French Government should be represented in ceremonies which, on the occasion of the Washington Bicentennial, testify to the firm friendship between our two countries, sealed by common endeavor in war and unchanged by the difficulties of peace.

The pilgrimages made yesterday to the home of Rochambeau, to the monuments to Lafayette, Washington, Franklin, and De Grasse, recalled to us the ties which through nearly two centuries have bound our two histories together.

The presence tonight of the President of the Republic and our great military chiefs, happy to respond to the invitation of the American Club and the French and American associations of liaison officers, bear testimony to the continuance of our sentiments of mutual confidence and friendly collaboration in the causes which we have always defended together.

Permit me, in my pleasure in recognition of the affectionate comradeship between the former soldiers of the American Legion and our national confederation of war veterans, to express the confidence I have in their effective collaboration in the work of peace which we are accomplishing side by side.

On February 1, 1784, Washington wrote to Rochambeau: "I will remember with pleasure that we have been companions in the work of war in the cause of liberty, and that we have lived together like brothers, in harmony and friendship."

That is what the soldier of Verdun, 148 years later, wrote to the soldier of Saint-Mihiel. As in 1781, at Yorktown, so it was that Americans and Frenchmen on the Marne or on the Meuse, in 1918, fought for liberty. Like Washington and Rochambeau they lived together "like brothers, in harmony and friendship." They suffered the same trials, shared the same hopes and the same glories. They learned to love one another in learning to know one another.

Our generation has suffered cruelly. We do not regret it. The only causes that die are those for which men will not die. We have had the glorious privilege of sacrificing ourselves so that liberty should not die.

We gave our whole strength to this noble ideal, in the belief that we had a duty to accomplish, but what reward did we find in the fraternity which united us? We alone who knew the comradeship of the trenches know what the fullness of friendship can be.

We desire today that this friendship may serve in the organization of peace, for we know that our task was not finished with the demobilization of troops.

The work of the liaison officers of wartime is being carried on in peacetime by war veterans, who are serving as liaison agents between the peoples of the world.

Ambassador Edge summed up the impression made in France by the remarkable series of George Washington Bicentennial Celebrations that ended with the banquet at the Hôtel Palais d'Orsay in the glowing report already quoted at the beginning of this article. His opinion that these ceremonies in honor of the First President of the United States "could hardly be surpassed in a foreign country" was shared by the newspapers of Paris.

The American and French press of the capital seemed unanimous in believing that the far-reaching influence for good of these George Washington Bicentennial observances in France could not be over-estimated.

"WEEK OF AMERICAN NATIONS"

France later in the year participated again in the worldwide celebration of the George Washington Bicentennial during the observance of "The Week of American Nations." This is an annual festival in Paris in honor of all the countries of North, Central and South America. "Further emphasis" was given to this occasion in 1932, the United States Embassy reported, because it fell within the period set aside for observing the two hundredth anniversary of Washington's birth.

A large group of French and American officials convened on the afternoon of June 30 at the Maison des Nations Américaines and took part in the unveiling of busts of George Washington and Simón Bolívar, famous South American liberator. The busts were presented to the Comité France-Amérique by the French Government. They are of marble, the work of the famous French sculptor, Aronson.

At this function the French Government was represented by M. Paul Léon, Director-General of Fine Arts, who made the official presentation. M. Gabriel Hanotaux, president of the Comité France-Amérique, and General Vasquez Cobo, the Colombian Minister, spoke briefly, accepting the gifts, both emphasizing the similarity in the characters and achievements of Washington and Bolívar and praising them for their undying devotion to the cause of liberty.

The United States Government was again represented by Mr. Armour, Chargé d'Affaires of the American Embassy, who spoke of the hardships suffered by Washington and Bolívar in their struggles to bring liberty to their peoples, and referred particularly to the fact that Bolívar was inspired to fight for the freedom of South Americans by the success of George Washington and of the French Revolution.

Mr. Armour spoke as follows:

M. le Président [Gabriel Hanotaux], MM. les Ministres: On February the twenty-second the Government and people of France paid gracious and moving tribute to the founder of my country upon the occasion of the two hundredth anniversary of his birth. What was then so eloquently said in homage of George Washington is today being given concrete form in the dedication of the bust by that distinguished French sculptor, M. Aronson. May we not conclude that this bust, which lends permanency to the recent celebration of the birth of the first President of the United States, symbolizes the enduring character of the confraternity of those Republics which are represented at the Maison des Nations Américaines, both as between themselves and with that sister nation which houses us at this moment?

To me it seems a most happy coincidence that the statues of Washington and Bolívar should be simultaneously inaugurated, since their names must forever be coupled in the inspiring movement which at length made possible the putting into effect of those principles of republican freedom which are the birthright of all the countries of the Western Hemisphere. Nor does the analogy end there. While for six years Washington fought for his country's independence, hampered by lack of arms and men and by the poverty of the colonies in the north, Bolívar struggled for thirteen years through similar discouragements and hardships at last to liberate what is now Venezuela, Colombia, Bolivia, and Peru, and to contribute to the enfranchisement of Ecuador. Both men, when peace was won, became the first presidents of their respective homelands and both, in laying aside their swords, knew how to lay the cornerstone of the enlightened constitutional government which today and for the future supports the structures of our democratic systems.

Those early statesmen who dreamed of independence on the North American continent were undoubtedly influenced by the group of 18th century French philosophers, and it was Washington who, by his indomitable courage and his refusal to admit defeat was finally to bring to a practical reality those principles which, up to that time, had been ideal conceptions. And once success had crowned his efforts, the principles that had found expression in the New World returned to take root in the Old.

But destiny was not yet satisfied with its accomplishments in France and the United States; the movement commenced in the eighteenth century had not yet run its course. It would seem indeed that some guiding force directed the steps of Simón Bolívar to France where he witnessed some of the last stirring scenes of the Revolution. Later in 1809 he visited the United States where he had the opportunity of studying the functioning of free institutions. Significantly, it was the following year that he definitely identified himself with the cause of independence in South America.

It is an encouraging manifestation this—that the thought of the Old World should have contributed to the liberty of the New World and that the echo of independence in America should have sounded back across the ocean to inspire the French people to achieve that social progress which they had so long enunciated. Surely a movement which has emanated from the same fountain of thought must, like a subterranean stream, have its influence in linking together our republics which it has fed. To the busts of Washington and Bolívar before us, would it not be a happy thought some day to see the images of those other liberators of the South American continent as well as of one of the great statesmen of France in order that those of us who enter here may not forget either our mutual debt of the past or our common obligation for the future.

PUBLIC SQUARE RENAMED

Three days later, on July 3, the City of Paris again honored the memory of Washington and the American and French soldiers of his army by renaming the square at the intersection of Franklin and Vineuse streets, calling it the Square de Yorktown. This is one of the principal intersections in the city, near both the famous French Trocadéro and the one-time residence of Benjamin Franklin and other distinguished Americans.

At the inaugural ceremony, when the new name was officially bestowed on the square, the Municipality of Paris was represented by M. de Fontenay, President of the Municipal Council, who delivered the following address:

The great American Week which Paris never fails to celebrate with enthusiasm takes on, this year, a particular significance.

It is not only that we celebrate a day of the year which saw expanding under the July sun those great movements destined to bring the people to independence and liberty. The two hundredth anniversary of the birth of Washington, which the city will celebrate tomorrow at the Hôtel de Ville, moves us, besides, to acts whereby may be expressed our desire to perpetuate the lessons given to their descendants by our valiant ancestors.

In compliance with this desire, the City Council has decided to name a square in memory of the event which recalls the name of Yorktown, the decisive victory of the combined forces of the two allied countries.

It has seemed to the Assembly that no place is better suited than this little garden in a section where, from the time of Franklin, our friends from across the Atlantic during their sojourn among us, have always selected, with marked predilection, as a domicile. Henceforth, in the shadow of the statue of the diplomat-philosopher, principal author of the negotiations from which came victory, the flowers of the Parisian soil will always flourish in honor of the brave men to whom fortune gave success under the folds of the starry banner and the lilies of France.

There is no battle which has exercised on the fortunes of the young Republic an influence comparable with that of Yorktown. It demonstrated beyond question the triumphant value of union: union between the combined forces of earth and sea accomplishing a siege and blockade with a precision outstanding in the annals of strategy; union between Washington and Lafayette, between the militiamen of the New World, the soldiers of Rochambeau and the sailors of the fleet of Admiral de Grasse.

If even today, the precision of the maneuvers conceived by the chiefs remains an object of admiration by military critics, if in spite of changes in armament, the orders of Washington are still considered the finest of models, comparable to the commentaries of Caesar and to the proclamations of Napoleon, we know also the role of the master of the sea.

It pleases us today to turn a thought to the conqueror of that naval battle of the Chesapeake to whom Washington rendered homage as to one of the principal instruments in the surrender of Yorktown and whose monument, recently unveiled, stands not far from here in the garden of the Trocadéro. Our communal pride doubles our patriotic pride. It recalls the vessel which was flying the flag of the chief of the naval army at the moment when the enemy ship, The London, hoisted the signal of retreat. The name which shone in letters of gold on the poop in testimony to the donors of the most beautiful unit of the fleet was none other than The City of Paris.

It is now from the geography of the New World that we borrow the name engraved on this plaque. One cannot ignore the symbolic significance used in the decoration of this corner of Passy. In the future a new road, thanks to the lengthening of Muette Avenue, will open into this place. Then the traveler who comes into the city by its newest and most monumental routes will find affirmation of the historic communion which has always united the United States and France, Paris, and America.

WASHINGTON HONORED ON JULY 4

American Independence Day, always publicly observed in Paris, was made a special occasion in 1932 for honoring the memory of George Washington. In its decorations, patriotic exercises and bicentennial social functions, Paris on July 4 rivaled many a large city of the United States.

"The spirit that united America and France in the War of Independence," stated the NEW YORK HERALD, of Paris, next day, "was manifested in a series of July 4 ceremonies. Throughout the day the Stars and Stripes fluttered with the Tricolor on public buildings and Franco-American shrines, and the deeds of Lafayette and the courage of Washington were recalled."

Lafayette's tomb in Picpus Cemetery was the focal point of patriotic rites at 10:00 A. M. under the auspices of the Comité France-Amérique. The ceremonies included addresses by Edward H. de Neveu, Vice-President of the Sons of the American Revolution, and the American Chargé d'Affaires, Mr. Armour, who read the last two letters exchanged by Washington and Lafayette.

Albert Lebrun, President of France, was represented by Captain Le Bigot. Other notables present were General Gouraud, Military Governor of Paris; General de Trentinian, of the Order of Cincinnati; members of the Daughters of the American Revolution and the Colonial Dames of America; the American Military and Naval Attachés, Brigadier-General Stanley H. Ford and Captain David M. Le Breton; the Marquis de Rochambeau; the Marquis de Grasse and Dr. Maurice Hanotte.

The American Legion Color Guard, Paris Post, led by Sergeant Ralph H. Garner, conducted a formal salute before the tomb.

Following the ceremonies at the tomb of Lafayette, the officials repaired to the statue to the American Volunteers in the French Army, Place des États-Unis, where they were joined by the Baron de Fontenay, President of the Municipal Council; Jules Jusserand, former Ambassador to the United States, and members of the Association of French Liaison Officers with the American Army. Here again the American Legion Color Guard saluted, and William S. Davenport, General de Trentinian and Baron de Fontenay voiced tributes to the American war dead, extolling Franco-American relations. This ceremony was under the direction of the American Volunteers in the French Army, 1914-1917.

The address of the Baron de Fontenay follows:

Ladies and Gentlemen:

In coming to affirm, once more, before this monument dedicated to the American volunteers who died for France, her gratitude and emotion, Paris obeys a sacred dictate of her heart. In rendering the homage due these heroes who, for the triumph of an ideal, freely made the sacrifice of their lives, we hear the voices that arise from the tombs where repose the bodies of these brave men. They exhort us in these troubled hours to remain united by sentiment and by reason; to give to the problems of the moment, to passing difficulties, the secondary rank which they deserve among human values and to maintain intact the sacred patrimony of our joys and sorrows.

The memory of the friendship of Washington and of Lafayette was lodged deep in the souls of these brave and robust youths who in 1917 left their western shores with their populous cities to come to the aid of a wounded France.

In our turn, we relied on a past still vibrant with shared sufferings, with common hopes, for the continuance of our indissoluble ties.

From the fronts of our public edifices, from the tower of our Hôtel de Ville (City Hall), fly at this moment the folds of the proud standard of the United States together with our own tricolor. We cultivate as a precious thing this friendship between our peoples, sanctified twice by the blood of our sons.

The circumstances that bring about this pilgrimage, which this year takes place during the many celebrations organized by the Comité France-Amérique to recall the bonds between our two countries, offer a symbolic and spiritual significance which can escape no one.

HONOR PAID TO AMERICANS

A signal tribute was paid to prominent members of the American colony at a Fourth of July Bicentennial reception at the Palace of the Legion of Honor, when General Dubail, Grand Chancellor of the Legion, pinned an officer's rosette on the breast of Charles G. Loeb, president of the American Chamber of Commerce in France, who took a prominent part in planning the bicentennial celebrations in Paris. Mr. Loeb was described by General Dubail as "a child of Paris and faithful friend of France."

The American Women's Club of Paris gave a George Washington luncheon on July 4 with the American Chargé d'Affaires, Mr. Armour, as the guest of honor. Mrs. Benjamin H. Connor presided and those present included the Comtesse de Chilly and Mrs. Frederic Shearer, national and Paris regents of the Daughters of the American Revolution.

Mr. Armour said in part:

"This is the time when the American woman can play her most important role, when she can make her influence most felt. If she stands firm and insists that in spite of everything there shall be no deviation from the patriotic path of American citizenship; that regardless of what is happening, she stands by the side of her husband, father or brother, for the support and defense of the Constitution versus all enemies foreign and domestic, for the upholding of our laws and the honor of our flag, then she is performing the duty of citizenship as it should be performed.

"It behooves us as patriotic Americans on this double anniversary—the 156th anniversary of our Independence and the 200th anniversary of the birth of Washington—to pause to consider for a moment our position in the world today, to make in army parlance 'an estimate of the situation,' and having made it, to resolve that if our country needs our help we stand ready for the call."

The American University Women's Club held a reception during the afternoon of July 4 in Reid Hall, at which William L. Finger, American Trade Commissioner, addressed more than one hundred and fifty members and guests.

STUDENTS LAY CORNERSTONE

American students in Paris seized upon this occasion of honor to George Washington and the celebration of American Independence to lay the cornerstone for their new social center at 261 Boulevard Raspail. Here again the officials of the Municipality of Paris rendered the occasion historic by their presence and were paid a high compliment for their interest in American projects by the American Chargé d'Affaires.

OTHER CEREMONIES ON JULY 4

At the same time that the laying of the cornerstone of the American Students Social Center was taking place, there were assembled at Dun-sur-Meuse, a town on the Meuse River not far from Paris, a group of French and American notables who had journeyed thither to dedicate a memorial to the Fifth Division of the American Army. The memorial was built into a new bridge across the Meuse River, along which some of the crucial battles of the World War were fought.

Captain Peter P. Zion presented the officials of the town with a special copy of the history of the gallant Fifth, and recalled what General Pershing described as "one of the most brilliant feats of the A. E. F."

Ever since the Unknown Soldier of France was interred in the magnificent tomb at the Etoile in Paris there has been burning there an "eternal flame." On the evening of July 4 the color guard of the American Legion, Paris Post, marched to this famous sarcophagus, placed a wreath, saluted the departed hero and "attended to the re-kindling of the eternal flame." Commander Henry W. Dunning and R. L. Miles officiated.

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE BANQUET

With President Lebrun occupying the chair of honor beneath a cluster of French and American flags and more than 300 French and American notables as guests, the annual banquet of the American Chamber of Commerce in France—dedicated this year to the theme of the George Washington Bicentennial—was held on the evening of July 4 at the Hôtel Palais d'Orsay. Among the guests were General John J. Pershing; Hon. Frank B. Kellogg, former Secretary of State; M. René Renoult, Vice President of the French Council of Ministers; Mr. Armour, American Chargé d'Affaires; and Charles G. Loeb, president of the Chamber of Commerce.

"Distinguished military and civil leaders of France sat in an aura of historic good-will with a gathering of Americans, pledging anew faith in the work of the two sister republics for war's end," said the European edition of THE NEW YORK HERALD next morning. "The banquet was one of the greatest demonstrations of Franco-American good-will ever witnessed in Paris."

Special importance was given to the event by the presence of President Lebrun, who in accepting the invitation of the American Chamber of Commerce, followed the precedent of attendance of the French Chief of State at American Fourth of July banquets established by the late President Doumer. Before his assassination in May, President Doumer had signified his intention of attending this function in honor of George Washington.

Mr. Loeb, presiding at the banquet, called upon the President of France to say a few words as "an additional sign of international friendship." The President's short address was enthusiastically applauded.

Thanking the American Chamber of Commerce for its invitation and for thus associating, in accordance with tradition, the Chief of the French State with the manifestation of Franco-American amity, President Lebrun expressed the hope that the two sister republics, following their destinies on opposite sides of the Atlantic, "always shall be able to evolve from memories justly evoked and from their long confraternity the means of solving their problems and settling their respective interests according to full justice, bearing in mind the sacrifices they made for the sacred cause in the great conflict a few years ago."

The President concluded his speech with these words:

"Gentlemen, it is in such a spirit that I in turn ask you to raise your glasses in honor of the Franco-American friendship of today and for its fruitful periods to come. May that friendship serve to bind still more closely and more profoundly the mutual relations of our two great nations."

Premier Edouard Herriot had declared his intention of being present, but found it necessary to leave that same evening for Lausanne. He was represented by M. Renoult, who spoke in behalf of his government, confirming the hope for peaceful adjustment of all problems expressed by President Lebrun. The following is a translation of M. Renoult's address:

George Washington believed in the world's great moral forces, and the heroes of the war of independence were victorious because they knew that the ideal always would vanquish force. . . .

Magnificent history, which continues to bear fruit, for from that epopee was created the Franco-American friendship which we are celebrating today! It has resisted all tests during more than two centuries, for the very reason that it was founded upon mutual moral bases, superior to those of interest. At the present time the necessity of such friendship is greater than ever, for it finds its justification in the actual interest of all nations.

As strongly attached as is the United States to the Pact of Paris and to the principles of arbitration and the pacific settlement of conflicts, France never has ceased to prepare the work of organization of peace. France adhered to the facultative clause of obligatory jurisdiction of the Permanent Court of Justice, the scope of which Mr. Kellogg himself is best placed to appreciate, and to the General Act of Arbitration by which all disputes, judicial and political, are assured of judicial or arbitral settlement.

Even though (as Mr. Kellogg himself has recognized) the particular situation in which she finds herself, past experience and legitimate care of her interests justify on her part the greatest degree of prudence, France did not wait for the conditions of her security to be entirely realized before entering into the way of a limitation of her national armaments—she reduced her military service to one year and collaborated actively in the elaboration at Geneva of the limitation and reduction of armaments.

TOAST TO FRENCH PRESIDENT

Mr. Loeb proposed the health of the President of the French Republic, with the music of the "Marseillaise," and that of the President of the United States, with the music of "Stars and Stripes." Speaking in French, he then emphasized the special importance of this year's July 4 celebration because of its association with the observance of the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington. He paid tribute to the memory of the eminent Frenchmen, Marshal Joffre, Marshal Foch, Aristide Briand and President Doumer, who at repeated Fourth of July Celebrations had honored the Americans in Paris with their presence.

Among the sentiments expressed by Mr. Loeb and most warmly applauded was: "I am convinced personally that if ever the territory of France was again invaded, her security endangered, or her national life threatened, the Americans would rise up and hasten to fight at her side."

Translated, Mr. Loeb's address was, in part, as follows:

The anniversary of the independence of the United States of America is treated as a national holiday in France, and on this day the American flag floats at the side of the French flag on French public buildings and monuments. Therefore, I need not say to the Frenchmen who are here what the Fourth of July means, but only to thank them to have collaborated so closely not only in celebrating our independence, but in creating it.

The American Government decided to give to the celebration of the two hundredth anniversary of Washington's birthday an exceptional character—for the event to be celebrated not only in one fête but to cover the entire year of 1932. Naturally, the culminating point of these celebrations is the Fourth of July, the anniversary of the declaration of the independence of the United States of America for which George Washington fought victoriously, and to the maintenance of which he consecrated himself in war and peace. . . .

In my opinion, the most beautiful homage to George Washington, the most magnificent synthesis of his work and of his life, was made by Napoleon Bonaparte in the order of the day addressed to the French army on the occasion of the death of Washington:

"Washington is dead. This great man fought against tyranny. He consolidated the liberty of his country. His memory will always be dear to the French people as to all the free men of the two worlds and especially to the Frenchmen who, like him and the American soldiers, fight for equality and liberty. Consequently the First Consul orders that during ten days black crepes shall be attached to all flags and standards of the Republic."

We cannot think of Washington without thinking of Lafayette, and their friendship symbolizes the unalterable friendship between France and the United States. It is certain that, in spite of financial questions, economic and tariff problems, and in spite of the agitations of internal politics in America, the friendship of the United States for France has remained as intact and sincere as was that of Washington and of Lafayette.

Although the Franco-American friendship, from a standpoint of sentiment, is established beyond discussion and so deeply rooted in our country that this friendship has resisted the most poisonous campaigns, we must nevertheless admit that our cooperation is far from being perfect. People may love each other without really helping each other sufficiently, and the main effort of the American Chamber of Commerce in France has been, and always will be, directed toward creating a closer solidarity and a more intimate collaboration between the United States and France in the economic, financial and commercial fields.

The American Chamber of Commerce is particularly happy to state that two agreements have been signed recently between our two countries which constitute milestones on the road to Franco-American collaboration—the convention which was signed during the month of April abolishing the double taxation of American corporations and the convention signed during the month of May relating to the quotas,—constituting the important progress in our hope that our two countries will settle all differences and solve all their problems at one time by a general treaty of commerce. . . .

I know that all Frenchmen will be happy to see that American politics point toward the revision of the Prohibition Law. There is in America a great movement of public opinion against the application which is being made at present of the Eighteenth Amendment of the Constitution, and it appears possible that France may soon see the doors reopen in America to one of its important commerces.

It is from the intimate collaboration and close cooperation of our two countries that a return of prosperity can be expected, and I trust that, in accordance with the words of Viviani, our two nations will know how to rise in every way above the narrow furrows of egotism.

AMERICAN MELODIES PLAYED

A pleasant deviation from the speechmaking at the banquet was furnished by the Garde Republicaine Band, which under the baton of M. Pierre Dupont played such favorites as "Dixie," "Over There," "Songs From the Old Folks," "Campus Melodies," and music from American Civil War and World War collections.

General Pershing, dressed in mufti and wearing the Legion grand cordon, and General Gouraud, Military Governor of Paris, were the subjects of stirring demonstrations whenever their names were mentioned.

The Government of the United States was represented by Mr. Armour who referred to the bonds uniting France and America through Lafayette and praised the Kellogg-Briand Treaty as leading the way to peace. He said:

We all regret the absence of our Ambassador tonight. However, it is needless for me to assure you that it is a great privilege and pleasure to me to be here with you all.

These dinners on the Fourth of July have become a tradition in our life in France, particularly because of the opportunity that they afford for an expression of Franco-American friendship and understanding. The dinner this year possesses a particular significance, marking as it does not only the 156th year of our independence as a nation, but the 200th anniversary of the birth of George Washington. We are therefore particularly honored to have with us as our guests of honor tonight the President of the Republic, the Vice-President of the Council of Ministers, and so many distinguished representatives of French life and thought. We are also happy to greet our former Secretary of State, Mr. Kellogg, now judge on the International Court of Justice at The Hague.

Mr. Secretary, for that is the name that comes most naturally to my lips in addressing you, our former chief,—it is with something akin to emotion that we greet you here tonight. Your name, together with that of the great Frenchman [Briand] whom you saw borne to his final resting place at Cocherel yesterday, is forever associated with the pact, which although officially bearing the name of Paris, is and will always be more familiarly known to us as the Briand-Kellogg Pact. Almost four years have passed since you came to Paris to attend the solemn ceremony connected with the signature of that pact. Since that time you have left the office of Secretary of State, but you have continued on in the cause of international justice, giving the benefit of your ripe experience to the great court now functioning at The Hague. I like to think that it is more than a coincidence that our last two Secretaries of State both went from that office to two of the highest courts of justice—Mr. Hughes to become Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, and yourself to be the American Representative on the Permanent Court of International Justice at The Hague. Is this not evidence of the fact that it is the will of our country that the post of Secretary of State—that the handling of our international relations—be put in the hands of men who bring to their work the impartiality of the bench; the finest and highest traditions of the law. The fact that the present Secretary of State was also a lawyer of distinction before assuming his present office, is further evidence of this fact.

Less than six months ago, it was my high privilege to be seated at this very table, in fact, in this very place, beside the President of the Republic. He came to do honor to Washington and I had the pleasure to recall to him on that occasion that he was the second Chief of State of France to render by his presence such homage to our first President—the other having been the young Napoleon Bonaparte as First Consul. Three months later, America mourned with France the terrible act that removed this great and kind figure from her public life.

Mr. President of the Republic, we are deeply honored by your presence here tonight. Like your predecessor, you have always shown yourself to be a true friend of my country and we like to interpret your presence here tonight as further evidence of that fact. With my Ambassador I had the pleasure to accompany General Pershing when you received him recently at the Elysée and I had the privilege then of hearing you describe your visit, as Minister of the Liberated Regions, when you accompanied President Poincaré into Saint Mihiel just after it had been occupied by American forces.

Mr. President, you come from that portion of France that has given so many of your countrymen to the service not only of France but of the world. We Americans shall never forget that it was from Lorraine that Père Marquette came to discover the inner wildernesses of our country.

It is a great source of pride to all of us Americans here tonight, as I know it will be to our compatriots across the sea, that the head of the French State should honor us with his presence on this particularly significant occasion, and on behalf of my Government and of our people, I wish to express our deep appreciation for this gesture of friendship.

Mr. Vice President of the Council, it is a cause of regret to us all that the President of the Council who had hoped in spite of his many and onerous duties to have been with us tonight should at the last moment have been called away, but we appreciate the reasons which have made it impossible for him to be here and we are happy to greet you in his place as representing the French Government. You have many friends among the members of the American colony in Paris, all of whom are delighted to welcome you here tonight. We are particularly gratified, Mr. Vice President of the Council, that you should have taken this time to join in our celebration tonight and we beg you to accept our thanks.

I should be grateful to Your Excellency if you would be kind enough in my behalf to transmit the following message to M. Herriot, which had he been here tonight I had expected to address him personally. Would you tell him that, since taking over the high office which he now holds, we realize that he has had charge of delicate and difficult international negotiations which we all hope will lead to the solution to questions of an importance that have perhaps never before confronted the world. Upon the solution to those questions will perhaps depend whether or not our civilization as we have conceived it is to continue. Would you tell him that his breadth of vision and the sympathetic understanding which he has shown in approaching these questions have been deeply appreciated by the Government and people of the United States and that we feel sure that in this spirit, and with the desire prompting us all to reach a solution to these problems, an issue satisfactory to all will eventually be found.

I raise my glass to our two Republics and to the friendship which, unbroken through 156 years, will unite them forever.

NOTABLE ADDRESS BY MR. KELLOGG

The candor with which the problems confronting the United States and France were discussed during the bicentennial celebrations in Paris is illustrated by the principal address at the Chamber of Commerce banquet. It was delivered by Mr. Kellogg, former American Secretary of State and co-author of the Pact of Paris.

Mr. Kellogg referred freely to international policies, war memories, economic conditions and President Hoover's disarmament plan which, he said, had kindled anew the peace hopes of mankind. There follows the full text of Mr. Kellogg's speech:

Since the last celebration of the Fourth of July, France has lost two of her great statesmen. The tragic death of President Doumer has stirred the world with horror and has awakened in the minds of the peoples of all nations a sense of deep sorrow and sympathy for France and the members of his family. Stricken at the height of his fame, he was a man beloved of all, and I know that all Americans join with France in paying tribute to his memory. Another French statesman, M. Briand, of whom I speak with a sense of personal loss, has gone. For him I had a deep affection and admiration. He was the greatest influence for peace in this troubled post-war period. His death was an irreparable loss and all lovers of peace will bow their heads in sorrow.

And yet, we must live our lives, fulfill our destiny, visit our national shrines and celebrate our national holidays.

There is a peculiar significance in the celebration of the Fourth of July this year as it is the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington, whose name is honored in every land. And how appropriate that we should celebrate in Paris—the capital of the nation which rendered such signal assistance in the establishment of the independence of a new nation—an event which has been fraught with the most far-reaching influence in the world's civilization!

I can say nothing new about the relations of France and the United States, but often it is useful to say over and over again the things that all know, so that we may not forget the lessons that history teaches, or fail to view the future in the proper perspective. In all the years that have passed since the breaking of the dawn on that memorable Fourth of July, 1776, France and the United States have never been at war and I have faith they never will be. The two nations have had their differences—sometimes serious ones—but those differences have never brought our countries into armed conflict. This is an example worthy of emulation by the nations of the world.

If our countries, originators of the only world-wide declaration against war, cannot settle their disputes by negotiation or arbitration, I should despair of the outlook for peace. Do not let us be disturbed by the clashes of opinions—serious as they seem at times. Do not let us be disturbed by speeches of some of our public men—often made for local consumption—nor by the press which occasionally may stir the passions of the people. These incidents can probably not be prevented, but they can be minimized. I know that in the end the calm influence of reason will prevail and that the statesmen, who, from time to time, may hold the destinies of these nations in their hands, will not lightly take any step which might ultimately lead to world disaster.

It was with the background of this history, and looking confidently to the future, that France's great statesman and apostle of peace proposed to the United States a perpetual and unalterable covenant that France and the United States should renounce war and should settle all their differences by pacific means. It was with this grand conception and from this beginning that the Pact of Paris grew, whereby sixty nations have solemnly pledged themselves to peace. I often wonder if we fully realize the responsibility these two nations have assumed to the rest of the world. I sometimes doubt, and yet I know that deep in our national consciousness we must realize the appalling consequences if France and America, whose peoples are devoted to peace, should forget their solemn pledges and fail to exert to the utmost their influence as the world's greatest republics to prevent another conflict.

The question foremost in the public mind today is: How are we to maintain peace?

We are still in the shadow of the great war. The minds of the people and of their leaders in public life are still oppressed by the fear of war, and statesmen are groping, as it were, in the dark for some means of prevention. It would seem impossible that the recollection of the greatest cataclysm the world ever knew can have faded from the minds of men. Who can describe the horrors of that war? Imagination is baffled when we think of the millions of men and women sacrificed, of the appalling destruction, of ruined lands and desolate homes, and of the trail of poverty and misery which has followed in its wake. One can hardly believe that men contemplate the possibility of the clash of nations which would produce another such catastrophe. When we consider the awful devastation of that conflict and the development of science in the improvement of the instruments of destruction, we cannot conceive the result of another war. I doubt if our boasted Western civilization would survive it. And yet, we hear today influential men predicting a war as inevitable, and advocating the building of great navies and the increase of armament as a means of defense.

I do not believe that the present political unrest in the world indicates another war. In my opinion, the cause of the unrest, the agitation and the disturbances, which have shaken many nations to their foundations, is economic rather than the growth of the war spirit. It is the natural consequence of the great upheaval through which we passed.

Now—what are the remedies? Some advocate alliances of the great nations armed to police the world; some, the arming of a super-state, and some, military sanctions. I do not believe in the efficacy of any of these remedies. War has never been prevented by armed alliances; they have only broadened and deepened and intensified the conflict when it came. If you cannot trust individual nations in their dealings with one another to settle their difficulties by pacific means, you cannot trust them banded or held together by alliances to maintain peace by arming to the teeth. We know that many wars have been brought on through an exaggerated chauvinism, jealousy, racial hatreds and the personal ambitions of rulers. But can anyone say that the great and powerful nations are less liable to aggression or to the abuse of power than the smaller nations? I do not, for a moment minimize the fears of peoples and their longing for security, but I do not believe that security can be had by alliance, balance of power and armament. For centuries Europe has depended upon these primitive methods to maintain peace. They have been dangers rather than safeguards. In the last great war, the then existing alliances prevented localizing the conflict and this fact, with the competition in armament was undoubtedly to a large extent, if not entirely, responsible for what happened.

What does the history of the last war teach us? It was started by a crime, a murder in Sarajevo, which of course, should have been and was punished under domestic law. Shocking as the crime was, it was not an adequate cause for plunging most of Europe into a desperate struggle from which our civilization will not recover for generations. It started as a feeble flame and spread like a mighty conflagration until it involved in its cometary sweep the whole continent—in fact, most of the world. The murder was the excuse for the war and not the real cause. The real cause lay deep in the political system. National jealousies and aspirations, racial hatreds, distrust and fear had divided Europe into armed camps. Her statesmen had attempted to prevent war by military alliances and ententes calculated to maintain the balance of power and entailing inevitably a competitive increase in armament. As a result, peace was not maintained but most of the nations of the world were involved in a conflict in the direct cause of which many of them had no interest.

One of the most cynical doctrines in the whole political armory is that which passes under the title of "balance of power." It means nothing more nor less than the building up and setting off of one armed force against another through alliances and counter-alliances. It is the direct negation of disarmament. This vicious system was one of the first fruits of the intense militant nationalism which emerged from feudalism uncontrolled by any recognized law of nations; it reached its highest development on the continent of Europe during the eighteenth century; and, to the disgrace of mankind, it has lingered on to our day. It cannot be reconciled with the enlightened conception of a world governed by law, and it has been thoroughly discredited by its results. Indeed, history records no failure so conspicuous, so complete, and so disastrous.

The way to security and peace is through disarmament; and the way to disarm is to disarm. Does any rational human being doubt the verdict of a universal plebiscite on this subject if such a thing were possible? Do you and I know anybody who actually wants another war? Where is the man in any civilized community who cares to pay his earnings over to his Government to buy guns and build battleships? And yet this overwhelming sentiment against armaments has thus far succeeded in producing little more than pious declarations of principle.

Thirteen years ago in circumstances of utmost solemnity, the Covenant of the League of Nations was framed with a clause laying down the basic principle that

The maintenance of peace requires the reduction of national armaments to the lowest point consistent with national safety.

Today, land and naval armaments are greater than ever in times of peace and are increasing at an alarming rate. The nearest approach to a definite accomplishment has been the Washington Treaty of 1922 in which five Powers fixed a limit for battleships—much higher than was really justified by their needs. The London Conference of 1930 made little progress in real disarmament. It failed to produce agreement among all of the big Powers and fixed the limits of permissible naval tonnage so high in certain categories as to allow increases instead of decreases.

How long will the patience of the waiting masses hold out in the face of these discouragements? Hope is a good breakfast but a bad supper.

In speaking today, however, I am profoundly moved by the conviction that another great advance on the road to world peace, political appeasement and economic relief is under way. The suggestion of President Hoover for a reduction by approximately one-third of the armaments of the world has re-kindled new hope. There is not a nation whose people are not breathing more freely at the thought of the relief from the crushing burden which the universal acceptance of some such plan might bring to them. The general acceptance of a project of this nature is naturally very near to my own heart since it is the logical working out of those ideas which animated the conclusion of that Treaty which forever proscribed wars of aggression and made defense the only legitimate use for arms. Therefore each step which tends to decrease the forces apt for aggression and consequently makes possible a decrease of those maintained for defense, hastens the day when war shall exist only as a word in our histories. A striking program of this nature is a further indication, if any is needed, of the fact that America is desirous, heart and soul, of co-operating in the solution of the world's problems. Moreover, in the conclusion of such a Treaty now lies real security, since it would reduce the means of aggression, unite the world in a joint undertaking to maintain that reduced level, and give all nations of the world a common interest in the solution of any difficulties that might disturb this equilibrium.

In these times of ruinous cost of Government, with the crushing burden of taxation which is sapping the economic life blood of peoples and blocking the return to prosperity, the expenditure for armament is not only responsible to a large degree for this taxation, but it is a menace to the peace of the world.

I realize that the United States is more fortunately situated than many of the nations of Europe and that we should not assume to measure the actions of all countries by the standards of our public opinion. I am not, therefore, criticizing the statesmen of any nation, whose fears for the safety of their respective countries lead them to advocate what I believe to be a worn-out policy of past generations.

Peace will come to the family of nations when the people, their leaders and the publicists have finally come to the conclusion that there are better means of settling international disputes than the bloody arbitrament of war. People must be educated to appreciate that war is a crime against the law of nations and the law of nature. It cannot be expected that the abolition of war will be accomplished in a day, when war has been considered the legal and justified prerogative of nations from time immemorial. But war is a different thing today from what it was centuries ago. It has ceased to be a mere clash between two or three nations from which the rest of the world is immune. A conflict today in any part of the world is a menace to the peace of all the rest of the world.

I believe that greater steps have been taken in the last decade to maintain peace than in any period of the world's history and it has come through mutual understanding, conferences, conciliation, arbitration and judicial settlement of disputes. Time does not permit me to discuss in detail those measures which have occupied the attention of statesmen. Hundreds of treaties of conciliation and arbitration have been made; the League of Nations is constantly engaged in the adjustment of international disputes; the Locarno Treaties went far towards the stabilization of Central Europe; and the Pact of Paris was the first broad declaration of all nations for renunciation of war and for the peaceful settlement of international disputes. It is the unconditional solemn pledge of more than sixty nations backed by the united voice of all the peoples of the world not to resort to war for the settlement of disputes. It is a declaration of principles, a reversal of the policy of nations, a foundation stone on which can be built the temple of peace. I know it is said by many that it is nothing but a treaty which may be broken as many others which have gone before it, and that it did not prevent the conflict between China and Japan. M. Briand, the author of this great conception, did not claim for it absolute prevention of war, but he never lost faith in its efficacy. I desire to point out that neither China nor Japan has been willing to admit they were at war, and twenty years ago what has occurred there would probably have involved all of the East in the flame of war. Who knows the restraining influence this treaty has had? We know of the strenuous efforts of all the nations to settle this conflict and to preserve peace, how by concerted action the public opinion of the world was focused upon the two nations who were threatening the violation of their treaties. When, in any crisis, in the past has this been done? Had it been done in 1914 the great conflict might have been averted. Had the opinions of all nations been mobilized and brought to bear, how different might have been the result. But at that time, as during all ages, war was considered the private affair of the belligerents with which neutral nations had no right to interfere.

It is true there were statesmen in Europe who foresaw, at least dimly, the consequences of a European conflict, but the world at large was not only ignorant of it, but passive. I am a great believer in the ultimate force of public opinion. It is the ruling factor in our national as well as international life. I am, therefore, of the unalterable opinion that permanent peace will not come until the public mind is trained to think in terms of peace. Every conference to avert war and every treaty for conciliation, arbitration or judicial settlement of disputes adds to the weight of public opinion which will outlaw a nation which violates its treaties.

I am reminded of an incident which happened before the signing of the Peace Pact. I was received at Havre by a delegation consisting of the Mayor and the officials of the city, who presented me with a pen and on the case were inscribed the words: "Si vis pacem para pacem"—if you wish peace prepare for peace. How much wiser than the old saying "If you wish peace prepare for war." Through all the ages nations have staked their security and safety upon building armaments. How futile has been the result! I believe there is nothing today more dangerous to our peace than the competition in armament.

I know there are scoffers who say that these views are idealistic and that we must follow the old practice of armaments limited only by the resources of a nation. That was not the view of one of France's greatest statesmen, who saw the horror and perils of war and whose foresight visioned a better day. I would remind my hearers that all the reforms of the world have been started by idealists like Briand.

RECEPTION AT HOTEL DE VILLE

One of the most brilliant events of the Bicentennial Celebration in Paris was a gala soirée at the Hôtel de Ville during the late evening of July 4, when Paris played host to American and South American diplomats, residents and visitors. The hall was ablaze with lights; a detachment of Republican Guards in full and colorful attire took its stand before the historic building; and shortly after nine p. m. a long line of motor cars driving through great throngs of cheering spectators brought top-hatted men and brilliantly gowned women to the reception.

The notables who had attended the American Chamber of Commerce banquet repaired to the Hôtel de Ville and were there greeted, with the other guests, by Baron de Fontenay, President of the Municipal Council of Paris, who with M. Edouard Renard, Prefect of the Seine, was at the head of the receiving line. The guests assembled first in the ornate reception hall where Baron de Fontenay delivered the following address of welcome:

I have as my first duty to salute our hosts of this evening and more particularly the Ambassadors and Ministers of North and South America, who do us the great honor of assisting at this celebration.

A strong bond of friendship exists between France and the States that they represent. Equally dear are the bonds which unite Paris and a great number of cities of those countries. I address myself to the Ambassadors and Ministers at the same time that I thank them for the kindness with which they have accepted the invitation.

Permit me also to salute and to thank General Pershing, the great Commander in Chief of the American Armies, whom we have had with us here during the past year and whose name is borne by one of the streets of the capital, as well as Mr. Kellogg, whom we had equal pleasure, after the war, in receiving at the Hôtel de Ville in connection with the ceremony celebrating the peace pact which bears his name.

I wish to express the sentiments of pleasure which we have in their presence.

In this year of 1932, marked by the 200th anniversary of the birth of Washington, the Hôtel de Ville owes it to itself to take part in the commemorative celebrations. While on the other side of the ocean an entire nation turns to the cradle of the founder of its independence, our capital, recalling the veneration which our ancestors had for him, joins in rendering homage to him as one of the greatest figures of his time and of all time.

To be sure, our city possesses no building which a sojourn of the great man has dedicated specially to his memory. Franklin, the philosopher, visited France and was one of the glories of Passy. The conqueror in one of the most decisive wars in history held on the immense theatre of the New World, never left the shores of his native land. But, though he never came to Paris, our common habitation, where the memory of the dearest of our companions in arms is always vivid, is not this city well chosen as an assemblage place today for the compatriots of Washington and the fellow-citizens of Lafayette?

It is in order that we may unite in the same outburst of enthusiasm and fidelity that we have invited you this evening. We are conscious of exalting in this way a patriotic and humane ideal.

In an epoch when society too often seems to be uncertain which route to follow, the respect, knowledge and—in the fullest sense of the noble word—the Example of great men are an encouragement and a sacrament. Pioneer, surveyor, military chief, premier civil magistrate, Washington was a guide of the people because he was the perfect model of that which his century called “an honest man.”

This hero of a time when political emotion was so rife, was the incarnation of the calmest and most resolute reason and a lover of the simple life. When he retired to Mount Vernon, it was not through fatigue, vexation, nor even to imitate Cincinnatus—with whom he is so often compared—it was in order to get in touch again with his home, with his land, with those inexhaustible sources of virtue and strength which make vigorous individuals and healthy races. The solid formation of his personality, his taste for family life, his devotion to his native land and to public interest, composed in him an harmonious whole from which educators cannot too often draw inspiration and hold up to the admiration of future generations.

As for us, Parisians and Frenchmen, we cannot evoke the lasting work that he accomplished, in conjunction with our ancestors, without a tender pride. It is gratifying to us to recall that this collaboration was not only made practical by the intermediary of Lafayette, but, moreover, it was rendered morally possible by the sympathy which united, immediately they saw each other, the two representatives of the two countries.

One of Washington's biographers has defined as miraculous the transformation brought about in Washington's soul—so little prepared by former events for an intimate and total alliance—by his first contact with the delegate of France. The accord sealed at the critical hour for the common good has never ceased since that time and these private affections have contributed to direct the course of history, for all time, towards un hoped-for realizations. May the nations not forget the teaching of these heroes! May France and the United States find in the confidence which bound Washington and Lafayette to each other the golden rule for their relations, and in the multiplicity of their prodigious acts, sure guarantees for the future promised to their entente.

Our capital will not fail in the duty dictated to it by its past. Complying with the wish of the Parisian population and in response to the gesture of the State of Virginia—which had ordered a bust of Lafayette so as to offer it to the City Hall—Houdon went to the other side of the Ocean in order to reproduce in a pure chef-d'oeuvre the features of the father of the American republic.

In 1791, Pilon was entrusted with the same task by our municipality which wished to transmit to the General of its national guard the gift by which he would be most deeply touched.

Today, in our turn, we have the joy of giving the house of Mount Vernon a picture due to the painter of the marine, Gaston Alaux, representing the three-decked vessel, La Ville de Paris (The City of Paris), which was built in the second half of the 18th century at the expense of the Parisian aldermen in order to reinforce the French fleet and which covered itself with glory before Yorktown.

Thus the exchange of relics and souvenirs, which revivifies the trials and spendors of old, continues. Thus marble and canvas, talent and art, perpetuate the great men and the remarkable events; our populations, for their part will continue to assure for these heroes a more touching and extensive immortality by ceaselessly reanimating in their hearts their gratitude, love and their infinite admiration.

STIRRING EXPRESSION OF FRIENDSHIP

The applause during Baron de Fontenay's speech created the atmosphere for one of the most stirring scenes of Franco-American good will ever witnessed in Europe.

M. Renard, speaking after the Baron, addressed the enthusiastic audience as follows:

We are happy to celebrate this evening the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington and to offer to the founder of the United States of America the homage of our admiration.

When in 1732, in the rich colony of Virginia, George Washington was born, Europe was still plunged in dissensions as obscure as they were without grandeur. International events occurred and were settled according to processes or forms of outworn laws that did not even have the value of a pretext. The people were beginning to feel vaguely the offenses to their national ideals of such conception of politics.

Washington, meanwhile, was growing up in that pioneer and strong America where the love of independence had led so many English subjects. The loyalty which it manifested for such a long time toward the mother country struggled in its heart with the sentiments of honor and justice. Its revolt was but an expression of its offended moral decency. The wound was so vital that it served to break old and honored bonds—bonds which were not more deep than a respect for contracts.

France, which its illustrious thinkers had been preparing for a long time to understand this gesture of liberty, recognized with joy in the American insurrection the exercising of a right which was already deeply rooted in all free consciences. The glory of Washington reached its height in our country with its first blow.

Washington was forty-five years old when there came to him the enthusiastic Marquis de Lafayette, that French officer who was only twenty years old and who exposed himself voluntarily to the worst dangers simply for the glory of being a soldier of liberty. He [Washington] found himself filled with a deep admiration and affection for this young hero.

Unforgettable hours, in the course of which all the champions of the most sacred of causes—nobles and plebians, old and young—realized that the welfare of America as well as that of France was intimately linked with the welfare of humanity!

While the young American Republic was organizing itself under the direction of Washington, the French Revolution was spreading its generous doctrine to the four corners of Europe.

Thus was founded, on common principles, on the respect for law and international honor, the invincible spiritual union of America and of France, which one hundred and thirty years later was to balance in decisive manner the destinies of the world.

These memories are present in the remembrance of all French citizens who find in the noble figure of Washington an exceptional model of the two virtues which are dear to them: a chivalrous generosity and a republican simplicity dignified of old. The figure of the great American patriot has its place in the pediment of every institution founded on reason and equity.

In 1784, during the celebrated scene of the farewells of Lafayette and Washington, it was truly the soul of the two nations which found expression in the thoughts of the two illustrious companions in arms. "In taking leave of you," Washington, who had difficulty in hiding his emotions, might have said, "I seem to see departing from me the image of that generous France that we have loved so much and which I have loved in loving you."

May the intimate union of France and of America, symbolized by the brotherly love of Washington and Lafayette, by the intimate association of the soldiers of Pershing and of Foch in the War, and in the peace of Briand and Kellogg, be perpetuated forever throughout the ages.

PAINTING OF DE GRASSE FLAGSHIP

As a tribute from the City of Paris to the memory of George Washington, a painting of the Ville de Paris, flagship of Admiral de Grasse, the French officer who brought his fleet to the aid of Washington's army at Yorktown, was presented by Baron de Fontenay to Mr. Armour, American Chargé d'Affaires, to be forwarded to the Mount Vernon Ladies' Association. The painting is the work of the French artist, Gaston Alaux.

Accepting the painting for the association, Mr. Armour assured the Municipality of Paris that it would be placed at Mount Vernon as intended. He said:

Mr. President: This tribute from the City of Paris to the memory of Washington on this two hundredth anniversary of his birth will go straight to the heart of every American. The painting which is so graciously offered to Mount Vernon and which will be handed by our Government to the ladies of the Mount Vernon Association, will be received by them as a very precious souvenir and given a place of honor in the shrine of Washington. In the choice of this beautiful painting by the distinguished French artist, Gaston Alaux, I see a happy symbol. On the arms of the City of Paris, we see a ship in full sail. When my country was in need this great city plucked from its arms its symbol, and creating it into a living ship, despatched it to our aid.

We all remember the part played by the Ville de Paris in the battle of Yorktown—worthy of the great city whose echevins had built and contributed her to the cause of liberty. We know what were the feelings of Washington when word was brought to him that De Grasse had arrived. We can imagine the scene when the Ville de Paris, bearing the brave admiral, rounded the point and victory at last seemed to be within the realm of possibility. To you and to the descendants here tonight of those heroes whom France sent to us, we bring our thanks.

When Washington heard the happy news, accompanied by Rochambeau, Lafayette, de Broglie, Chastellux and du Portail he at once boarded the Ville de Paris, where, after an exchange of affectionate greetings, he spent the afternoon planning with the chief of the French fleet the siege of Yorktown. While it is true that Washington never crossed the Atlantic to visit your country, it cannot be said that he never put foot on French soil. And while it is true that he was never able to gratify his desire some day to come to Paris to thank the people of France for their great help rendered in the hour of need, and to greet once more his dear friend the Marquis de Lafayette, nevertheless, he preserved to his dying day the memory of the hours spent on the French ship as well as a grateful souvenir of the city which had been so gracious in its reception of Franklin and Jefferson.

Today we accept this picture as another noble gesture that truly symbolizes the friendship and affection between our two peoples.

M. Gabriel Hanotaux, president of the French-American Committee, next addressed the gathering as follows:

Mr. President; Mr. Prefect; Excellencies; My General: Permit me to associate the French-American Committee with the words that you have just addressed to our American friends and to thank with all my heart, in the name of the Committee, the Municipality of Paris which has received us as crowning the Week of American Nations in this magnificent hall where all the great commemorations of France are wont to assemble.

On hearing evoked the bonds which bind the United States and France there comes to me the words of Washington saying to de Grasse, "You are the arbiter of the war." He was in effect the arbiter of the war not only through assistance rendered to a common victory but also through the wisdom, the care for detail, and the attention wholly worthy of a great leader with which he applied himself in order to know to the minute when to arrive and to take part at the critical hour, according to instructions.

These are characteristics of a great leader and it was these qualities which made Washington, himself so competent, say to de Grasse whose help at exactly the right hour was so important: "You are the arbiter of the war."

But in going over the circumstances in which was born the movement that carried French armies to American territory, at a time when voyages took a little longer than in the time of Lindbergh, I recall also those words that Louis XVI addressed to de Grasse: "France asks nothing, absolutely nothing, not even Canada, which was for so long a French colony and which was taken by that same common adversary that we have today. France asks nothing except that between our two peoples there be a friendship that nothing will ever affect, that no cause will ever break."

Such were the very words spoken by Louis XVI. The years that have passed since then have been a happy confirmation.

I do not know whether you will permit me to add a simple anecdote which the presence of Mr. Kellogg recalls to me. Tradition tells it as a story on the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and, like all traditions, it is subject to caution and demands, perhaps, to be interpreted. I reserve to myself the right to make the interpretation.

Mr. Kellogg, you discussed and signed the pact of Paris with M. Briand on the Quai d'Orsay. But between you there was a table and this table is always there. It is the table before which Vergennes received Franklin. Here is the story; pardon me for reciting it:

Franklin was a little embarrassed in the beautiful court of Louis XVI (called then the greatest king in Europe), which had the extremely beautiful Louis XVI furniture. He hesitated a little in approaching M. Vergennes. He knew that the French are nimble-witted and somewhat given to long conversations and that in consequence it was more prudent to let the Frenchman speak first: "You speak, Gentleman of France." He advanced to the table and seated himself. He was received politely by M. Vergennes; he was silent a moment. Vergennes waited as well. At any moment it seemed that a sort of delicate coolness might be produced, but gentlemen of the time of Louis XVI were resourceful. Vergennes took his tobacco pouch from his pocket and offered some to Mr. Franklin. Mr. Franklin took some. M. Vergennes also. He saluted Mr. Franklin politely. Mr. Franklin saluted M. Vergennes politely. And they separated without having exchanged a word. The next day the alliance was made.

I should like to point out the moral, because without a moral my anecdote would be a little inappropriate.

We Frenchmen have the reputation of being talkers, but what is less well-known is that we are talkers who know how to be silent. It is said that in Germany we are called "Monsieur Immediately". Well, "Monsieur Immediately", knows how to take his time in order to get where he proposes to go.

M. Vergennes represents one of the traits of our national character: that of a man who knows how to wait and reflect in order not to decide too soon and then have to compromise.

That is my moral. I wish that France could be better known on the least known side of her character and that it be realized that in her, "reasoning does not forget reason", as our great poet has said.

Gentlemen: I thank you for having listened to me during perhaps too long a discourse, but in memory of Franklin and of Washington, the great Americans who are with us, the great friends of France who have sustained us as we have sustained them in our hearts, I know you will pardon me.

OPERA STARS SING IN CONCERT

After the addresses a concert was given under the direction of M. Henri Busser, chef d'orchestre de l'Opéra, consisting of vocal selections by several members of the Parisian Grand Opera, a series of luminous ballets by the famous French danseuse, Mlle. BICENTENNIAL HELPFUL IN WORLD CRISIS

That the series of brilliant events in France in celebration of the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington, beginning in February and reaching a high point in the summer during "The Week of American Nations," made a deeply favorable impression on the French people is evidenced in the numerous speeches by French officials and articles in the French press. The bicentennial celebrations afforded many opportunities, which were seized upon by the representatives of both republics, to renew their pledges of mutual friendship and esteem.

In addition to the newspaper references heretofore quoted, LE TEMPS on July 6 published an editorial, headed "Franco-American Friendship," a translation of which was sent to the Department of State by the American Chargé d'Affaires with this comment:

"An editorial from LE TEMPS of July 6 merits special attention. LE TEMPS, after voicing gratification at the expressions of Franco-American friendship, comments on the mutually existing misunderstanding between the United States and Europe which prevents effective use being made of the inherently cordial relations. The paper, nevertheless, believes that with the present world crisis confronting the two continents they must inevitably strive to comprehend one another and through common sacrifice reach an accord on pressing problems, which will contribute to the solution of these problems and place Franco-American amity on a fruitful basis."

The editorial from LE TEMPS follows:

FRANCO-AMERICAN FRIENDSHIP

There was celebrated yesterday with much brilliance the national fête of "Independence Day": One knows, too, that the American people have consecrated the whole of the year 1932 to the commemoration of the second centenary of the birth of George Washington.

At the banquet organized at Paris on this occasion by the American Chamber of Commerce—which was honored by the presence of M. Albert Lebrun, President of the Republic—speeches were made by Mr. Albert Loeb, President of the Chamber of Commerce, Mr. Norman Armour, Chargé d'Affaires of the United States, Mr. Frank B. Kellogg, former Secretary of State (whose name, with that of Briand, is inseparable from the general pact against war) and by Mr. René Renoult, Keeper of the Seals and Vice-President of the Council, all of whom eloquently expressed the sentiments that the traditional Franco-American friendship, born of two epopees gone through together, inspires on both sides of the Atlantic. As the President of the Republic—who was enthusiastically greeted by our American friends—said yesterday evening, the sister republics must know how to find in their common souvenirs the solution and just settlement of their present interests by recalling equitably the sacrifices which they made in the sacred cause of the liberty of the world during the great tempest which passed over it a few years ago.

In reality, it is these souvenirs which prescribe that the duty of both nations is to live in friendly and trusting collaboration. The conception of the great problems of the hour may not be the same on both sides of the ocean; interests may diverge, but the aspirations of both nations towards greater dignity, with liberty, increased moral grandeur, with prosperity, are identical and hence their efforts must be co-ordinated so that they may tend more efficaciously towards the common aim. In this connection there are some interesting remarks in the speech given yesterday evening by Mr. Frank B. Kellogg, in particular, the words by which the former Secretary of State expressed his conviction that the political uneasiness from which the world is at present suffering does not presage a new war and that, in reality, great progress has been made in the direction of general peace, improvement of the political situation, and economic recovery. In the same way, when the Chargé d'Affaires of the United States, Mr. Norman Armour, made it known how the Government and the American people appreciate the breadth of view and the desire to comprehend of which the President of the French Council, M. Herriot, is giving proof in the difficult negotiations he is engaged in at Lausanne, French opinion could not fail to be touched by this delicate attention. As M. René Renoult said, at the present time the necessity of Franco-American friendship is making itself felt more strongly than ever, for it finds its justification in the common interests of all nations.

These are the ideas on which stress should be laid and which one should strive to propagate on both sides of the Atlantic. The task of statesmen who assume the heavy responsibility of the settlements which impose themselves at the present time is often rendered difficult by the reciprocal incomprehension of the American and European peoples of their respective needs. On this side of the ocean, one generally forms a wrong idea of the politics of the United States, which are dominated by preoccupations of a domestic order from which no American Government can free itself entirely on account of the very special structure of the Union and of the fundamental principles on which a very great power has been constituted—which has not, properly speaking, national unity such as we conceive it in our countries where races, owing to the diversity of their origin, their characters, their languages and their moral and intellectual formation, are absolutely distinct. On their side, the Americans find it difficult to understand the opposed tendencies, the passions which run counter to each other, the clash of the mentalities which we possess by reason of struggles sustained for many centuries, during which political Europe, such as we see it today, has been slowly and painfully formed. Having, on account of their geographical position, no menace to their independent existence, the Americans do not know the anxieties which the safeguarding of our security creates for us, and they do not understand—or they do not understand well—why we should subordinate everything to what is, however, for us a prime necessity. They deplore our differences and sometimes imagine that our greatest disputes are only about words; they affect to be no longer interested in a Europe which, they consider, does not want to make the effort which is indispensable for its own salvation. But these are only outbursts of ill humor, to which one should not attach the importance which is too often given them in international controversies and polemics, since however definite the positions taken on either side may be on certain questions, an hour must come when the rapprochement of the theses is necessary, where compromise is enjoined by the force of circumstances as it is a question of saving the whole world from catastrophe, of preventing the death of our civilization.

This hour has come for the American as well as for the European nations. Either we must work together in complete solidarity for the salvation of civilization, or perish together in the political disorder and economic chaos—there is no half-way. Peace can only be organized by the common effort of all nations. Now political peace is not possible without economic peace and the latter can only find a solid foundation in a return to confidence, which is the supreme remedy for all the evils from which we are suffering today. The United States can no longer disinterest themselves from this work—any more than any other power—and it is precisely because the American nation is a great nation, because it has an immense future before it, that it has imperative duties towards a civilization which has made its own prodigious progress possible. When Lausanne has drawn up the plan of European settlement which will testify to the will of old Europe to work sincerely for its own salvation, young America, in its turn, will have to take its responsibilities with a view to the universal settlement, without which all that one might attempt in favor of general recovery would be in vain. In accomplishing this duty, with the full consciousness imposed by the tragic circumstances of the present hour, the American nation, freely associated with other nations for the common good, will mark its real place in the general evolution and its increased moral, political and material grandeur will be evident to all the nations as well as to itself. It is in this decisive test that Franco-American friendship should produce its best effects.

THANKSGIVING DAY IN PARIS

A Thanksgiving Day service in the American Church and a commemorative ceremony conducted by the Veterans of Foreign Wars, Benjamin Franklin Post, before the statue of George Washington in the Place d'Iéna brought the celebration of the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington in Paris to an impressive conclusion on November 24, 1932.

Reverend Joseph Wilson Cochran summoned his congregation to devotion in the American Church at 10:45 a. m. to observe the annual American festival of Thanksgiving and to pay honor to the memory of George Washington on the occasion of the official termination of the Bicentennial.

With bowed heads and hearts filled with gratitude and the spirit of brotherhood, the assembled American and their French friends voiced a solemn amen to the following invocation:

Almighty God, who of all didst raise up leaders of Thy people and captains of Thy host, and didst not withhold the same good providence from our fathers in their need; we gratefully call to remembrance the virtues and excellencies of Thy Servant George Washington. We cherish for ourselves and hand down to our children the memory of this great and good man. We thank Thee for the noble ideals of civil and religious liberty conceived by him. We pledge ourselves to maintain and preserve them. We pray that so long as our nation endures its citizens may revere his courage and faith, and that the principles for which he served our nation in its youth be the possession of its maturer years. Let his trust in Thee as Ruler and Judge of the nations control the hearts of all who are set in authority, to the end that righteousness, justice and peace shall illumine all our ways; and Thine shall be the glory and the praise and the thanksgiving from generation to generation. Amen.

The 1932 Thanksgiving Proclamation of the President of the United States, in which was embodied the first Thanksgiving Proclamation, issued by President Washington, was read by Leo J. Keena, American Consul General. Theodore J. Marriner, Chargé d'Affaires of the United States, extended an official greeting to the large audience. The scriptural readings, anthems, hymns and organ music were all chosen with special reference to the occasion; and an attractive program, bearing excerpts from Washington's writings, was issued.

Dr. Cochran's Thanksgiving Day address, entitled "The Genius of Washington," was as follows:

On this particular Thanksgiving day, whatever else constrains the American people to give thanks to Almighty God, it is appropriate that we should celebrate our nation's inestimable heritage—the memory of Washington. Two hundred years ago was born the man to whom above all others our country owes its existence.

So wise a leader, so exalted a patriot had he become when inaugurated the First President of the Republic, that the men of that time bestowed upon him the title of Father of His Country. And thus he remains and will remain as long as human history is written.

It was an inspired thought that brought into being through act of Congress the Bicentennial Commission, which has labored so faithfully and successfully to bring to fresh remembrance the heroic stature of this man wherever American citizens and American ideals play their part in the world of affairs.

Mediocre minds have sought to dim the lustre of his name and drag him from his pedestal. The so-called "debunkers of history", with pens dipped in the muck of their own foul imaginings, have ransacked every nook and cranny of the Washington legend to discover low motives, sordid actions and compromising situations. But their work will soon be forgotten while the character of this illustrious man will shine ever brighter through the ages.

Washington, it must be said, has suffered at the hands of over-zealous biographers, who robbed him of warm and human qualities, carving him into a figure stiff, glacial and apart from life.

The sentimental adulation of our first President began by the ridiculous Parson Weems and others was bound to suffer reaction in the light of historical criticism and it came to pass that Washington was reduced in stature and denied a place in the front rank of the world's greatest men. It was declared that he was not a genius, but simply a person of excellent common sense, admirable virtues and rare judgment.

But what is genius? Is it a fair appraisal to award the distinction to one who discourses eloquently on liberty and to deny it to one who achieves it for a whole people? Shall we call Napoleon a genius because of his superlative military strategy which plunged a continent in a sea of blood, and withhold it from Washington who never had an army of more than 18,000 ill-equipped men in the field yet won independence from the strongest nation of that day? Is brilliancy of mental gifts genius while superlative strength of moral qualities is but a commonplace affair? Is great art alone sublime and ineffable, but not so great, ideas issuing in great acts?

No, my fellow-countrymen, the great philosophers, the great poets, the great musicians, the great painters, the great warriors cannot claim a monopoly of genius. Too often their god-like qualities fail to prevent their fall from high heaven like Lucifer, son of the morning.

The greatness of Washington did not lie in the mastery of a special technique, or the dazzling qualities of a prodigy. Had he been that sort of a genius he would have failed. Hamilton was a better financier, Franklin a better diplomat, Samuel Adams a better politician, Jefferson a better writer. Washington towers above them all because he combined in admirable proportions all those qualities of mind, and heart and soul which produced a character so symmetrical, so balanced between the practical and the ideal that men instinctively turned to him as their leader.

The genius of Washington was the genius of character, and what genius is greater than that, measured by the test of service to humanity—character raised to its highest level?

Permit me briefly to analyze the marks of his genius, as they afford us of this generation shining examples and needed lessons for our guidance.

A great painter was once asked why he had on his easel a row of shining jewels—rubies, sapphires, emeralds.

"Those are the true colors," he answered. "They keep my eye from losing the color value I need for my work."

The qualities of Washington are like those jewels. They keep the eye of patriotism true to the essential values of citizenship.

First of all the I. VISION of Washington stands out against the murky background of conflicting interests and selfish compromises. Without his clear foresight of national unity as against the pretensions of thirteen small sovereignties, our infant republic would have perished in its cradle. Amidst all the assaults of passion, suspicion and intrigue, he stood like a rock in defence of the Union of the States. "It is only in our united character," he declared, "that our independence can be acknowledged, our power regarded, or our credit supported among foreign powers."

The ratification of the Constitution by the States was a tense and bitter struggle, but when achieved Monroe wrote to Jefferson: "The conduct of Washington has been right and meritorious . . . Be assured his interest carried this Government."

Would that this stern foe of sectionalism might speak again to those who make the halls of Congress a cock pit for the display of local jealousies and partisan interests. May his lofty patriotism rebuke the spirit which divides East from West and North from South. Let the soul of Washington reanimate the whole body politic, destroying that base conception of National Government as a feeding trough for special privilege.

Washington's genius embraced the rare quality of II. DISINTERESTEDNESS. He scorned power for its own sake. He despised personal glory. He accepted the high office of President with unconcealed reluctance. And when compelled to face the call of duty he went as a free man. "Should it be my fate to administer the Government, I will go to the chair under no preengagement of any kind or nature whatever," he wrote to an office seeker.

It would be too much to hope that the United States could ever again have a President with such a record. The forces that determine who shall be our leaders, the ideas that control our party system are too "practical", too tainted with vulgar trickery and corrupt bargaining to warrant much expectation of a return to that unpurchasable integrity, that austere virtue which characterized the administration of our first President. We sing of "the faith of our fathers", but it would be well for our future as a nation were we to show that faith by cleaner political works!

Once again Washington rises above our time in his III. PURE CONCEPTION OF LIBERTY. He believed in the inalienable rights of the individual, of which no government could deprive him unless those rights had been forfeited by criminal conduct. He recognized the limitations of the civil power when the supremacy of conscience was at stake. He would never have thought of making Congress the supreme arbiter of a man's duty to his God, as has been done in various decisions since his day.

"If I could now conceive that the general government might ever be so administered as to render the liberty of conscience insecure, no one would be more zealous than myself to establish effectual barriers against such horrors," he wrote.

To Quakers who refused to bear arms he wrote that liberty of conscience belonged to them as a right which rulers were bound to respect.

He was unalterably opposed to making religion a test for eligibility to public office.

We are quite familiar with Washington's wise warnings against "entangling alliances," in the struggle for the preservation of our liberties, menaced as they were at that time by powerful European states. But even more pertinent to our times are the warnings he uttered against the invasions of personal liberty, civil and religious within the bonds of our own commonwealth. The inherent danger was, as he said, "the love of power and proneness to abuse it."

And that danger is as acute in our day as in his, but a danger largely concealed to the common eye.

But Washington's moral genius rose to sublime heights in IV. SERENITY OF SOUL. While fighting the enemies of his country with tragically unequal forces, meeting internal dissensions, treachery and open treason, establishing stable government out of unstable elements; through all the stirring, critical years in which he had to play the varied parts of engineer, military strategist, financier, statesman, governmental administrator, and prophet, this man possessed his soul in patience and fortitude, giving to the world the example of serene wisdom and exalted strength. Out of that terrible maelstrom of conflicting passions he emerged bearing no scars, unembittered in his patriotism, unchilled in his enthusiasm for humanity. As Whipple says: "In him America has produced at least one man whose free soul was fit to be Liberty's chosen home."

But it would ill become this day were we to omit that characteristic which animated all his thinking, his willing, his acting. This was

V. THE FAITH of Washington.

Almost every letter and every state paper contains his acknowledgement of his belief in the directing and sustaining hand of God. Religion was not a formal thing with him. It was his life. To his soldiers he said: "To the distinguished character of Patriot it should be our highest glory to add the more distinguished character of Christian."

All honor, then, to Washington! We as Americans honor ourselves when we honor him. As yonder wreath will be laid in all reverence at the foot of his statue in the Place d'Iena may we lay the tribute of our love and devotion before his great achievements and his lofty principles, pledging ourselves to a fresh dedication to the country he loved, the cause he served and the God he worshipped.

The GOLD STRIPER, official publication of the Benjamin Franklin Post No. 605, Veterans of Foreign Wars, issue of December, 1932, described the Thanksgiving Day ceremony at the Washington statue and subsequent events as follows:

"After the services held at the American Church of Paris on the Quai d'Orsay, the uniformed Color Guard of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, Post 605, accompanied by Commander Charles A. Beaumont and Dr. Joseph W. Cochran and a delegation, marched to the statue of George Washington in the Place d'Iena where wreaths were placed to commemorate the Two Hundredth Anniversary of George Washington. In the evening a dinner dance was given by the V. F. W. at the Hotel Bohy-Lafayette where entertainment was given by the V. F. W. Broadcast Artists. Commander Charles Beaumont spoke in memory of the occasion, as did Commander-elect Colonel Bernard A. Flood, who arrived in Paris Thanksgiving Day from the Sacramento Encampment, and who entertained with a snappy talk. Comrades Maigret and Gaillon were our guests of honor."

CELEBRATIONS IN OTHER FRENCH CITIES

Although the focal point of the Bicentennial in France was Paris, the French Capital was by no means the only place where the people of France and America conjoined to do honor to George Washington.

Reports that are admittedly incomplete indicate that wherever a group of Americans was located in France there was a Washington celebration and that in many cities and towns the people of France themselves undertook to celebrate on their own initiative.

NICE

Every Winter hundreds of American tourists flock to the French Riviera and hundreds of other Americans make this a temporary or permanent residence. For that reason in Nice, Cannes, and Monte Carlo—those glittering resorts on the Mediterranean—the spirit of America is not altogether foreign. When the Frenchman celebrates, the American gives him a hand; when the American celebrates the Frenchman comes to the party.

It was in this spirit that the George Washington Bicentennial was celebrated in Nice and the other Mediterranean watering places. Informal social functions were devoted to the Washington theme; women's clubs heard lectures about George Washington; churches and schools made him the subject of sermons, studies, and eulogies; fraternal organizations honored his memory.

Of special interest was the Washington's Birthday dinner on the evening of February 22, 1932, in the Palais de la Méditerranée in Nice, the largest casino in this famous French port. The American Consul, Robertson Honey, reported that this dinner was attended "by several hundred American visitors and others." American national anthems, military airs and Sousa's marches enlivened the dinner and "the third phase of a play competition, 'La Semaine de la Femme,' kept the audience attentive until a late hour.

During the afternoon the Municipal Band of Nice played a concert in the public park composed entirely of American music. A large audience attended, and Americans and French joined in enthusiastic demands for encores, particularly for such tunes as "Yankee Doodle," "Dixie," and "The Star Spangled Banner." Everyone present joined in singing "La Marseillaise."

STRASBOURG

In Alsace, whose chief city is Strasbourg, a regiment of French soldiers was recruited to cross the sea with Count de Rochambeau and fight under General Washington for American Independence. This regiment figured conspicuously in the American-French victory at Yorktown. John Q. Wood, American Consul at Strasbourg, called attention to this fact when reporting upon the Bicentennial activities in that part of France, and also pointed out that for almost a century Alsace has been a large emigration center for the United States, and that the people of Strasbourg and other nearby cities of the province are naturally America-conscious.

This, he said, is particularly true of the great university settlement in Strasbourg, where many American students are enrolled and where political science and international affairs, with particular reference to the history of the United States, are emphasized.

Although no formal George Washington Bicentennial celebrations were held in Strasbourg, the consul reported that many social and semi-social functions were devoted to the memory of Washington.

Two copies of the Atheneum portrait of George Washington were sent to the consulate by the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission. One of these was hung in the reception room of the consulate and the other was framed and placed with due recognition in the American Library at the University of Strasbourg.

Mr. Wood also reported that a French wall-paper concern resumed in 1932 the manufacture of a wall-paper, first made in 1897, depicting scenes from American history reproduced from paintings executed by a French artist in 1834. One scene illustrates the capture of a British redoubt on Weehawken Heights by American volunteers, assisted by French troops, and shows Lafayette personally seizing a cannon. The skyline of New York City is shown in the background. Another scene shows the triumphant entry of General Washington into Boston. The artist's evident desire to include America's natural wonders is manifested, with a fine disregard of geography and history, in the picture of an imaginary battle between Hessians and American forces beneath the Natural Bridge in Virginia with Niagara Falls in the background.

CALAIS

From the thriving little French port of Calais on the English Channel the chalk cliffs of Dover can be seen in the distance and it was against the background of these cliffs that the French people beheld in 1917 and 1918 transports carrying American troops across the channel from England to France, repaying the debt of honor the United States owed to France for having sent Lafayette, Rochambeau and De Grasse to aid General Washington in the War of Independence.

Few Americans now live in this French city and no definite Franco-American Bicentennial Celebration was held there, but one of the well known organizations of the city, the Groupe d'Interprètes Bénévoles (Group of Benevolent Interpreters), requested the American Consul, James G. Carter, to speak on the subject of George Washington.

This organization, which is typical of many such groups in France, meets regularly for the purpose of self-improvement, particularly to study other languages and happenings in other nations. The members also undertake voluntarily to assist foreigners arriving in France to make themselves understood at hotels, stores and other places.

Mr. Carter addressed a meeting of the Groupe d'Interprètes Bénévoles the evening of March 2. The leading newspaper of Calais, LE PHARE, reported that the audience listened with rapt attention while the American consul told the story of the life and work of George Washington and the winning of American independence. Mr. Carter sent the following outline of his speech to the Department of State:

I expressed pleasure for the opportunity of being associated with this group on the occasion of its weekly meeting and, even though somewhat tardy, I desired to take advantage of that occasion to express the wish that its members had reason to feel satisfied for the progress made during the year, 1931, and had reason already in 1932 to feel encouraged for the work undertaken during this year.

I stated that I felt particularly pleased to be able to accept their invitation for that evening and desired to take advantage of the occasion for mentioning an event which was held dear to all Americans at home and abroad: That I referred to the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington; that I might have said "The First President of the United States," but because of the high esteem in which Americans generally had been brought to regard George Washington as a man, even before he became President of the United States, he was generally referred to as "George Washington" and loved and appreciated as such, as well as the First President of the United States; that in consideration of a joint resolution of the two Houses, that is to say, the Senate and the House of Representatives, on the Second of December, 1924, it had been decided that the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington, "The Father of His Country," would be celebrated for a period of about nine months, beginning with Washington's birthday on the Twenty-second of February and ending on Thanksgiving Day, the last Thursday in November of this year; that not only Americans of all walks of life were called upon and were joining in the celebration, but that peoples of all nations were very sympathetically regarding this occasion and were taking part in the celebration which was participated in at Paris on the Twenty-second of February by the President of France, Monsieur Doumer, as well as other prominent French officials; that while revering Washington for his character and the inspiration that he had wrought throughout the United States, Americans were also appreciative of the friendship and assistance rendered by the sons of other nations during its struggle for independence; that France sent its own Lafayette and Rochambeau and their soldiers, and that reference may be made to Carroll and those Irishmen, and Pulaski and Kosciuszko and other Poles, Von Steuben and de Kalk from Germany, and others.

I mentioned that the celebration of the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington was not being undertaken for the purpose of commemorating the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the First President of the United States, but is to commemorate the two hundredth anniversary of one who had accomplished so much good and whose inspiration had not only been felt and appreciated in the United States, but, I might venture to say, throughout the world.

It was mentioned that Washington was industrious; that his early profession was that of a surveyor, and that he was a farmer, business man and shipper as well as a soldier and a statesman; that his large estate was Mount Vernon, which had doubtless come to the attention of most of the persons present during their visit to the Colonial Exposition in Paris; that he was beloved and appreciated by all men and that all classes of people, all religious and civic organizations in the United States were endeavoring to show reverence for him during this present celebration; that in connection with the participation of churches and religious organizations in this celebration, it might be mentioned that Washington was a vestryman in the Church and a Master of Masons; that in May, Masons in the United States were going to dedicate a shrine to his memory, valued at five million dollars; that Richmond, Virginia, perhaps possessed the most valuable souvenir of Washington in the famous Houdon statue, for which that state has refused the sum of five million dollars.

Finally, the desire was expressed that the persons to whom I was speaking would not only in their capacity as interpreters of words and languages endeavor to explain whenever the occasion would present itself, who George Washington was, but that they might endeavor to learn to study and inculcate as many as possible of the principles lived by Washington and be able to interpret through their own lives some of these principles for their own good and for the good of others with whom they might come into contact.

NANTES

The name of Washington was recalled on February 22, 1932, not only on his native River Potomac but in far off France on the River Loire. In the thriving French seaport of Nantes, up the river from the Bay of Biscay, an organization known as the "Amitiés Internationales" sponsored a fitting tribute to Washington on the two hundredth anniversary of his birth.

Mr. W. J. Yerby, the American Consul, reported that members of the organization and practically the whole of the American colony, including the staff of the Consulate, were present. The Prefect and the Mayor sent to represent them M. F. Miqueau and M. Soil.

The meeting hall was draped in French and American colors and a large portrait of George Washington hung in a conspicuous place of honor.

Professor R. W. Craven, an American student-teacher at the Ecole Normale de Savenay, had the principal part on the program. He gave an account of the life of Washington and of his association with Lafayette, and styled the friendship of these two patriots as the "origin of one hundred and fifty years of Franco-American friendship which small misunderstandings must not tarnish."

Another feature of the program, as reported by LE PHARE, a Nantes newspaper, was an address by M. Maitre, manager of the Etablissemments J. J. Carnaud and Forges de Basse-Indre, who "related with much spirit his impressions of recent trips made in the United States and criticized remarks about our American friends made by Georges Duhamel [a French author] in his famous book."

BORDEAUX

Under the joint auspices of the American Consulate and Bordeaux Post No. 2, American Legion, a reception was held at Bordeaux on February 22 to honor the memory of George Washington. Among those present were many American dough-boys who remained behind when their buddies sailed for home after the World War. They had married French girls and made homes for themselves and their families in and near Bordeaux.

John G. Erhardt, the American Consul, who acted as host, reported that "the members of the American colony of Bordeaux and the surrounding region" attended the reception. The program included French and American patriotic music, several short addresses and toasts to the memory of George Washington.

DRAMATIC PANORAMA BY SACHA GUITRY

Popular interest in the George Washington Bicentennial was aroused in France, as it was in America, long before the Bicentennial Year officially opened on February 22, 1932, and was not confined to organized groups whose activities have been recorded. French writers, artists and historians devoted a large part of their time to activities inspired by the memory of George Washington.

Appreciating the dramatic possibilities in the life of Washington, Sacha Guitry, the famous French playwright and actor, composed, directed and acted in a dramatic panorama of the life of the First President of the United States.

SCENE FROM GEORGE WASHINGTON PAGEANT IN PARIS. GEORGE WASHINGTON, PLAYED BY SACHA GUITRY, WELCOMING LAFAYETTE TO MOUNT VERNON.

Before a brilliant audience in the Théâtre des Champs-Élysées, the pageant was performed on the evening of March 12, 1930. To further exemplify the Washington spirit, the entire proceeds of the performance were devoted to the Accueil Social Franco-Américain, which cares for the poor children in several of the arrondissements of the capital of France. Commenting on the pageant, the LONDON DAILY MAIL, Paris edition, March 13, 1930, said that "Franco-American amity was seldom better exemplified than last night at the brilliant charity fete at the Théâtre des Champs-Élysées."

A review of this impressive dramatic event was printed in the CHICAGO TRIBUNE, Paris edition, March 13, 1930, from which the following account is taken:

It would be impossible to imagine any considerable public gathering of Franco-American interest in which the names of Washington and Lafayette were not invoked. But it is safe to bet that, at the charity affair last night in the Théâtre des Champs-Élysées, these great personalities were woven, as never before, into a vital and moving symbol. The brilliant and representative audience came with high expectations, and they were more than fulfilled. The spectators themselves formed a striking picture in the ample auditorium, with so many officers and diplomatists wearing their decorations and gold braid, while the women were positively resplendent. When President Doumergue's representative arrived, the Garde Républicaine band played the Marseillaise as only they can play it; there was a scamper from the foyer to the boxes; and in an atmosphere of almost painfully tense anticipation, the curtain rose, after an orchestral prelude, on Sacha Guitry's much-heralded evocation of a reception given by General Washington at Mount Vernon to Lafayette and a group of his French comrades.

It is no exaggeration, but sober fact, to say that Guitry, both as playwright and actor, quite surpassed himself. A lesser dramatist might have made the occasion too stodgy; but he infused it not only with high and moving eloquence, born of the situation, but with rich wit and humor. His device for making Washington speak French was much appreciated; and then when Guitry himself, who impersonated the General so magnificently, endowed his French with a Franco-American accent, the result was an Accueil de tout premier ordre, as they say in Brooklyn—sometimes, or perhaps. The piece oscillated, in masterly fashion, from grave to gay.

An underlying note of sadness marked the occasion. Everyone was thinking of the terrible calamity which had just befallen the towns in the South of France. For this reason President Doumergue did not appear in person, while Ambassador Edge, in mourning for the late American President and Chief Justice, sent a representative. He also communicated a message of sympathy for the French disasters, which was read from the stage.

Immediately after the close of this striking play depicting the reception, with a moving finale recalling the days of 1917, money was raised for the relief of the flood sufferers. Programs signed by Maréchal Joffre and General Gouraud brought, one seven thousand, and the other five thousand francs. Sacha Guitry volunteered the manuscript of his piece, which brought nine thousand francs, for the Accueil, while Paul Morand turned over the manuscript of his latest work, "New York," which brought ten thousand, to the flood relief.

The entertainment provided by Washington for his French guest included several divertissements which were received with great applause. The Pickaninny dance began the fête, followed by the youthful cellist, Michelin, and then two dancers, M. Alexis Dolinoff and Mlle. Trevania, the daughter of the American Consul General. Os-Ke-Non-Ton, the Mohawk Chief, gave two songs, accompanying himself on his water-drum; one was a kind of religious chant, the other a hunting song; both of them created a deep impression, with the chief in his full tribal costume. The Virginia Reel was cleverly executed by a number of young women of the American colony. Mme. Wanda Landowska, wearing a dress of colonial times, played the clavecin with her unique talent. She was followed by two dancers from the Opéra. The crowning number of this divertissement was entrusted to Mlle. Yvonne Printemps, and she sang, in a French version, Scotch ballads, with the orchestra playing a harp-like accompaniment to recreate the eighteenth century atmosphere. Her costume, especially devised for her by Mme. Lanvin, with its delicate mauve tint and blue sash and her Leghorn hat trimmed with pink roses made a dainty picture. While the auctioneer was presiding, Sacha Guitry and Yvonne Printemps paid their respects to Maréchal Joffre in his loge.

In the loge of honor with Maréchal and Mme. Joffre were General Gouraud and several French officers. General and Mme. Taufflieb and Mr. and Mrs. John Ridgley Carter shared a loge, having as their guests Mrs. George Munroe and the Duc de Montmorency. In the next box were Mr. and Mrs. Bernard Carter, the Comte and Comtesse Wachtmeister, Mrs.

William G. Sharp, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Downe, Comtesse de Ganay and Comte and Comtesse de Marenches. Mrs. Dwight W. Morrow and her daughter Elizabeth and their guests occupied a loge; in another were Mrs. Henry Symes Lehr, Marquis and Marquise de Chambrun, Mrs. Lawrence Paul and Mr. Herbert Howland; M. and Mme. Maurice Boyer were hosts in a loge as were the Comte and Comtesse Costantini entertaining Admiral and Vicomtesse de Faramond and several others.

Also in the audience were Baron and Baroness Robert de Rothschild, M. and Mme. Ernest Mallet, Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Carter, Mrs. Wayne Cuyler, Mrs. Legrand Benedict and her daughter; Mr. and Mrs. Pitt Duffield, Mrs. Benjamin Thaw, Mrs. Frederic Jennings Parsons, Mr. and Mrs. John B. Robinson, Mr. and Mrs. W. V. Cotchett, Mr. and Mrs. L. V. Benét, Mrs. Charles Cushman, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Webner, Mr. and Mrs. Tarn McGrew, Mrs. William Harts, Princesse de Faucigny-Lucinge, Mrs. Honoré Palmer, Mrs. Dudley Olcott, Dean and Mrs. F. W. Beekman, Mrs. Elisha Dyer, Mrs. Lee Childe, Baron and Baronne de Villiers Terrage.

PAGEANT IS PRAISED

The United States Ambassador, in a dispatch to the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission, commented on the Pageant:

Historical details were faithfully reproduced, and Guitry for the occasion was at his dramatic best. He was also inclined to be dramatic when permission was asked to take pictures, still and moving, since it is not his usual custom to be photographed by any one except by first-class commercial photographers of his own choice and never by movie operators. When, however, it was explained that the pictures were to be taken for the George Washington Bicentennial Commission, he very gracefully consented to have photographers admitted to the Théâtre.

FRENCH ARCHIVES YIELD HISTORICAL DATA

As a result of the new interest in the life of Washington and the history of the American Revolution aroused by the Bicentennial Celebration, the French Government granted permission to French and American historians, and others interested in the history of that period, to search the government archives for unpublished material relating to George Washington and his contemporaries. Among those who took advantage of this opportunity was Mr. Warrington Dawson, Special Assistant to the United States Embassy at Paris.

In an official report to the Department of State Mr. Dawson wrote:

In the course of my researches among the hitherto unexplored records of the Paris Ministry of War, I have found some biographical facts concerning a French officer of the Royal Engineers Corps who played a prominent part at Yorktown and has left a famous manuscript journal, and yet concerning whose personal record nothing had yet been discovered.

This officer was the Chevalier d'Ancteville, whose name has hitherto been given erroneously even by Viscount de Noailles as "d'Aucteville." The records attributing to him his pension and reporting upon his death would appear to leave no doubt as to the correct spelling with an "n" and not a "u."

It may be mentioned that there was only one d'Aucteville recorded among French officers at the time, and he spelled it d'Octeville and was never in America. The officer of the Royal Engineers Corps who accompanied Saint-Simon to America was named Louis Flexel de Cantel, Sieur d'Ancteville.

His application for a pension, and the grant made, as well as his death certificate, enable me to give for the first time a few details about this interesting historical character.

Born at Turteville-en-Boscage, in the diocese of Coutances in Lower Normandy, on December 5, 1737, he became Lord of the estate of Beaugrand, Clerbeg "and other places," Chevalier or Knight of the Order of Saint Louis, Seigneur de la Bretonniere, Major in the Royal Engineers' Corps, and Director General appointed by the King for the fortifications of Santo Domingo.

His pension, amounting to four hundred francs per year, was granted to him on December 5, 1782, "in consideration of his services during the last war, in the Colonies, as well as of the conduct by which he distinguished himself at the Siege of Yorck Town in Virginia."

The only further fact I have been able to ascertain about the Chevalier d'Ancteville is that he died on January 14, 1785, in Paris, in what was then the fashionable diocese of Saint Eustache, near the Central Halles or Markets.

Another of Mr. Dawson's historical delvings led him to the correspondence between Rochambeau and Washington. He stated as a reason for this research that the original letters should reveal any errors of translation that might have led to "misconception in the matters of policy."

Dr. Worthington Chauncey Ford, head of the European Mission of the Library of Congress, Washington, D. C., asked Mr. Dawson for a complete inventory of the original letters in the Archives of the Chateau de Rochambeau, specifying those which were entirely in Washington's hand and those which were written by a secretary but signed by Washington. The discovery was made that several of the letters investigated by Mr. Dawson were not in the records of the Library of Congress, and photostat copies of these letters were made to complete the Library's collection.

Mr. Dawson stated in his report to the Department of State that the editors of the newspaper FIGARO, of Paris, requested him to contribute an article, and, profiting by this opportunity, he wrote an article to discuss the friendship between Washington and Rochambeau, as revealed by these letters, "and also to strike a note of a nature to promote friendly relations between the United States and France in this paper which has been so bitterly anti-American."

FIGARO published his article in full, said Mr. Dawson, even to an excerpt quoted from Washington's letter of welcome of July 16, 1780: "These lines, addressed by a great American to a great Frenchman, bring evidence of the friendship and the confidence which serve as basis for a fraternity between peoples the like of which the world has certainly never seen, and deprived of which our poor world would become a very sad dwelling place for humanity."

Mr. Dawson also contributed an article to LE GÉNÉRAL D'HONNEUR, published by the American Society of the French Legion of Honor, July, 1932 edition, entitled "New Washingtonia, Unpublished Letters Discovered in the Rochambeau Archives," which was in part as follows:

The "Rochambeau Papers" at the Congressional Library in Washington are so famous and they cover the period of his American activities so thoroughly that it seemed as if nothing new could be found by historical research workers from a study of these papers, or from an examination of the documents preserved in the historic Château de Rochambeau, at Thoire, near Vendôme, where Marshal de Rochambeau lived and where his personal relics are still kept.

And yet, it was among these Rochambeau archives that I found, in September 1930, an unknown plan of Williamsburg, Virginia, which gave details existing on no other plan concerning the quarter situated beyond the Capitol. And it is among these archives, in the correspondence addressed by George Washington to Rochambeau between 1780 and 1784, numbering approximately a hundred letters in all, that I have just found what would appear to be totally new documents, some entirely in Washington's hand, and hitherto unknown to historians.

These documents, no other record of which seems to exist in France, and which do not figure in available lists of the papers at the Congressional Library, consist of seven letters and three memoranda of conferences.

Three of Washington's letters are autograph, all three being dated from New Windsor, respectively February 27, April 8, and April 30, 1781. The others, in the hand of a secretary but signed by Washington, are dated Lebanon, March 16, 1781; Hartford, 18 March, 1781; New Windsor, 7 April, 1781; and New Windsor, April 30, 1781.

For the most part, they deal with military and naval plans, and they are interesting as showing Washington's firm desire to go to the rescue of Virginia while ever considering New York as the main objective.

But in the autograph letter dated April 30, 1781, on which day he furthermore sent to Rochambeau a letter drafted by his secretary, Washington gives Rochambeau a very dignified and courageous explanation of the intercepted letter which, published by the British, caused such harsh feeling at the time among the French. While suggesting that the language had been deliberately altered in some respects, Washington says that he had kept no copy of it, but admits frankly that the published text was true in tenor to what he had written of Rochambeau, arguing merely that it was a private letter addressed to one of the Washington's in Virginia, and declaring that he had not so expressed himself to any public body.

The three memoranda, signed by both Washington and Rochambeau, and written partly in the hands of both, with an appended letter and annotations by Barras, are dated respectively Newport, May 16, 1781; Dobbs Ferry, July 18, 1781; and Philadelphia, July 19, 1782.

These also show Washington's wish to pursue an energetic campaign in Virginia with the help of the French army, as well as his plans for the use of the fleet of Admiral de Grasse, and for attacking Canada in the autumn of 1782.

Only a thorough examination of the photostats of these new documents, by comparison with the complete set of Rochambeau Papers at the Congressional Library, can reveal exactly how much of this material has remained so far unknown. But it already seems safe to say that of the ten letters and memoranda, at least seven are new.

Mr. Dawson informed the State Department that he had prepared several articles which were printed by French journals, notably an article in LE CORRESPONDENT of January 25, 1932, clarifying certain portions of a recent widely read book, "George Washington," by the French author Bernard Fäy. Of Mr. Fäy's book he wrote:

This book will not only arouse in France a far greater interest in George Washington, but it should be excellent for Franco-American relations, because of the fairness shown by the great author. He has the courage to state Washington's side of the case in the unfortunate death of Jumonville, and it is a particular relief to know that he attributes to Washington his due share in the victory of Yorktown, whereas the tendency of the French writers has been to relegate him to a wholly unimportant position.

AMERICAN COLLEGE GIVEN STONE FROM PASTEUR'S BIRTHPLACE

Visitors to one of the world's most sacred shrines of science, the birthplace of Louis Pasteur, in the town of Dole, France, may now read the following notice on one of the walls of the house:

La Pierre Ici Manquante A Eté Extraite

Le 22 Février 1932

Et Offerté A Cette Date Anniversaire

Du 2^e Centenaire De La Naissance De Washington

Au Rollins College De Winter Park

En Floride (U. S. A.).

Pour Son Allée De La Gloire

The translation of this inscription reads: "The stone missing from this spot was removed on February 22, 1932, and offered on this Bicentenary Anniversary of the Birth of Washington to Rollins College of Winter Park, Florida, U. S. A., for its walk of fame."

It was a happy thought on the part of the Rollins College, Winter Park, Florida, to couple the securing of a stone from this famous house with the George Washington Bicentennial Celebration. The facts connected with the presentation of the stone are set forth in the following letter to Ambassador Edge by M. A. Ventard, president of the Société Des Amis De La Maison Natale De Pasteur (Society of the Friends of the House Where Pasteur Was Born):

Dole (Jura) April 28, 1932.

To His Excellency Mr. Walter Edge,
Ambassador of the United States to France.

The sympathetic attention with which you follow all the events of our country, the large part that you take in all manifestations at which the sentiments of esteem and affection of our two countries are consolidated, permits me to think that you will be interested in a recent event which is significant in its simplicity.

A short time ago, the Director of Rollins College of Winter Park, Florida, solicited the town of Dole, cradle of Pasteur, to send a stone from the house where the illustrious scientist was born for its Walk of Fame. Immediately this desire was communicated to me. I hastened to satisfy it.

A very fortunate coincidence enabled the inhabitants of the little town of Dole, and the friends of the "Maison Natale" of Pasteur, to offer this precious relic to the young American students on the very day on which they were enthusiastically rendering homage to Washington, hero of the independence of your noble country.

In our province, far from official ceremonies, we discreetly participated in your enthusiasm and we thus associated ourselves with you in respectful homage to the great man whom you venerate. The attached communication, which appeared in the local and regional papers, will bring you the simple echo of our homage. In the space left by the removal of the stone from the "Maison Natale" of Pasteur, an inscription has been placed, of which I also send you a copy.

My colleagues of the Board of Directors of the Society have thought, as I do, that you would be sensible to this proof of friendship, from a little French town, for your compatriots. Many of the inhabitants of Dole fought side by side with your valiant friends during the sanguinary days of the horrible war. We guard, and shall always guard, the souvenir of your generous aid to our wounded, to all who suffered. We therefore gave wholeheartedly this very humble, though eloquent pledge, of our fidelity and gratitude.

After having despatched the stone destined for Rollins College, it seemed to me I ought to inform you of this exchange of friendship.

Kindly appreciate it in all its sincerity, and believe, Mr. Ambassador, in the assurance of my very respectful sentiments.

NOTABLE FRANCO-AMERICAN RADIO PROGRAM

One of the most important features of the world-wide celebration of the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington was an international radio program sponsored as a joint activity by the Governments of France and the United States on the two hundred and tenth anniversary of the birth of Comte de Grasse. Notable addresses were delivered by Mr. Jules Henry, Chargé d'Affaires ad interim of France, and the Honorable Sol Bloom, Director of the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission.

The program was broadcast from Washington, D. C., September 13, 1932, over an international hook-up arranged by the National Broadcasting Company.

The radio program consisted of an opening number "The Stars and Stripes Forever," by the United States Marine Band, followed by Director Bloom's address and the playing of "The Mar-seillaise." Mr. Henry's address was followed by the playing of "The Star Spangled Banner" by the United States Marine Band.

Mr. Bloom, as Director of the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission and representing the United States Government as host, spoke first in presentation of the distinguished French diplomat, Mr. Henry. Mr. Bloom said:

Since February 22, 1932, the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission has marked for special honor various anniversaries of those patriots who helped George Washington to win the War of the Revolution. We have now come to a date of special significance, the 210th anniversary of the birth of the man whose timely action made possible the final blow which brought victory to our arms.

It is well known among students of history that many great men of foreign birth came to America to join George Washington and his patriot army in a glorious but discouraged cause.

Without detracting in the least from the honors due to those other patriots of foreign birth, we may well pause today to give a thought to the man whose unselfish and patriotic impulses, whose prompt and vigorous cooperation, brought victory to the allied armies upon the American continent and forever sealed the liberties of the American people.

Comte de Grasse, a nobleman of France, brought his men and ships to our coast at the extreme of our necessity, and it is well to remember that this great French Commander not only placed his fighting forces at Washington's service, but brought with him a large sum of much needed money which he offered as a free gift to the American cause.

We must also remember that the Revolutionary War had dragged six years of its course, during which time Washington's patriot army was almost continuously awaiting the uncertainties of British movements. That army lacked practically everything that an army needed, except courage.

Rochambeau with his French troops had landed on American shores and was cooperating in an attempt at organizing more energetic operations, but George Washington realized the hopelessness of an effort to defeat the pick of British troops upon American soil unless he struck a great decisive blow.

Therefore, in the Spring of 1781, Washington and Rochambeau were cooperating in planning a movement against New York which was held by the British. What would have been the outcome of a determined attack such as they seemed to contemplate we will never know, but it was quite evident that George Washington did not have great faith that such an action would provide the decisive victory to American arms which was necessary to final success.

What must have been the exaltation in the heart of George Washington during these dark hours and after all those long years of war and almost fruitless maneuvering, when there was placed in his hands a letter written by the French Foreign Minister to the French plenipotentiary in America, which said:

. . . "I may say to you M., and you may confide to M. the General Washington exclusively, that M. de Grasse has express orders, after having provided for the safety of our islands, to detach or take the greater part of the fleet to the continent of North America and to lend himself to all operations judged practicable for as long as the season will permit him to remain in those parts. If the Spanish are not in need of reinforcements from our troops, all of them will join you. It will be well that General Washington prepare to make the greatest possible use of this help and that he take measures in advance to assure their subsistence. . . ."

The promise of prompt and adequate naval aid concentrating in Chesapeake Bay, in a letter from Comte de Grasse received August 14, turned the entire plan of action.

The proposed attack upon New York was abandoned and the American troops journeyed to Virginia, where Lafayette had practically bottled Cornwallis and his Army on the peninsula of Yorktown.

We know that story now and how the British in New York were misled into an expected attack while the allied troops hurried to Virginia. We know of the timely arrival of De Grasse and his mighty naval force and how that arrival prevented the rescue of Cornwallis or his escape from Yorktown.

We know of the gratitude felt and expressed by George Washington and his fellow Americans at this magnificent stroke which practically ended the American conflict with the surrender of Cornwallis.

Today as part of the Celebration of the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington we pay tribute to the memory of Comte de Grasse. The suggestion that we do this came from Mrs. George Durbin Chenoweth, Regent, Comte de Grasse Chapter, National Society, Daughters of the American Revolution, at Yorktown, Virginia. It is a celebration, jointly, by the French and the American Governments and we are honored today by the presence here of the official representative of the French Government, Mr. Jules Henry, Chargé d'Affaires ad interim of France, in the absence from our shores of His Excellency, M. Paul Claudel, the French Ambassador.

Before making this introduction, however, I can not refrain from referring to a recent testimonial of the people of France which is most touching in its significance and which fits so perfectly into the tribute which we are paying to the memory of Comte de Grasse today.

On July 4 last, Baron de Fontenay, President of the Municipal Council of Paris, presented to the Mount Vernon Ladies' Association of the Union, Mount Vernon, Virginia, a painting representing "La Ville de Paris," the flagship of Comte de Grasse, which played such a heroic part in the siege of Yorktown. It is interesting to know that this flagship was thus named because it was presented to Louis XVI by the Parisian people. It was said to be the most beautiful ship of the time and served as flagship of Admiral de Grasse until its magnificent and dramatic end, when ablaze from stem to stern, it sank beneath the waves in the great battle with the English in 1782.

That painting is another and fitting reminder of the historic friendship between the people and governments of France and the United States. It recalls a glorious chapter of our long history and vividly indicates the essential character of the help which France gave to us in our time of need.

I can not leave this subject without referring to the attitude of George Washington toward Admiral de Grasse after the siege of Yorktown, as indicated by his final expression of thanks to the Admiral.

No one knew or felt more keenly than George Washington the value of the services performed by Admiral de Grasse.

Presumably many of his compatriots, as well as we of today, considered the arrival of De Grasse at Yorktown a happy coincidence, yet Washington knew that this circumstance was directed by that Providence which had guided him and protected his countrymen through all the long years of that terrible war.

De Grasse, it is true, was working under general orders from his government, but had he not been sincerely devoted to the American cause he could easily and conveniently have delayed his action or terminated his service without achieving the glorious results which came with the surrender at Yorktown.

I do not believe that we Americans have ever expressed proper appreciation for the service rendered by De Grasse, and the thought comes to me that I do not remember of having seen or heard of a monument to Comte de Grasse upon American soil.

If this is true, it is a regrettable omission and a neglect that should be promptly and adequately rectified.

In this capital city of the nation, where many beautiful monuments stand as memorials to other great foreigners who aided George Washington and his patriot army, there should be a suitable memorial erected to one of the greatest of these men—Admiral Comte de Grasse.

Just recognition of his service has been too long delayed to this French hero whose presence at Yorktown, whose personal interest and strong support, made the victory possible which virtually ended the war of the Revolution.

And now, as the Director of the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission, it is my privilege and pleasure to present the Representative of the French Government and to express through him, to his countrymen, the lasting gratitude of the United States of America for this supreme act which crowned our Revolutionary arms with success, and brought freedom to our beloved land. Mr. Henry will speak after the United States Marine Band plays the French National Anthem.

I now take great pleasure in presenting Mr. Jules Henry, the distinguished Chargé d'Affaires of France, representing the French Government.

Mr. Henry, responding on behalf of the French Government, spoke as follows:

Let me first assure the Honorable Sol Bloom of my profound gratitude for the feelings expressed in his address. I know how sincere they are and I would not fulfill a most pleasant duty if I did not tell him that through his splendid and successful efforts to commemorate, during the celebration of the 200th anniversary of the birth of George Washington, the Franco-American cooperation of the period of the War of Independence, he has earned the admiration and friendship of my compatriots.

Last year, on the occasion of the Celebration of the 150th anniversary of the surrender of the British forces at Yorktown, the American Government extended to my Government the invitation to participate in the never to be forgotten festivities that were held on the same spot where Franco-American friendship was first cemented. A French mission, headed by Marshal Petain and composed of the descendants of those gallant Frenchmen who fought for American independence, came to this country and, for a few days, in the presence of the President of the United States and General Pershing, all the common glories and common sufferings of both nations during the War of Independence were evoked and described.

Today the Bicentennial Commission and its eminent Director, Hon. Sol Bloom, are celebrating the 210th anniversary of the birth of Admiral de Grasse. Knowing as they do the essential part played by him in the capitulation of Yorktown, the members of your Commission have deemed it proper, nearly a year after the Yorktown festivities, to honor his memory by a special tribute.

I need not point out how grateful my country will be for this tribute to the gallant sailor who was "a great forgotten man" until in 1931, when the Daughters of the American Revolution had the pious thought of dedicating a monument to him.

May I take this opportunity of recalling the important part which my former chief, Ambassador Jusserand, took in the endeavor to make De Grasse's personality better known to the American and French public? In doing so, the man who, for 24 years, represented France in the United States, was prompted not only by his devotion to one of his outstanding countrymen, but also by his love for America—a love so dear to his heart that shortly before his death, his last words were to express the wish that the country of his birth and the country where he had lived for so long, never should tear apart the ties that were formed by the victory of De Grasse at Yorktown.

Francois Joseph Paul, Marquis de Grasse, Tilly, Comte de Grasse, was born in 1722, the third son in a family of the ancient nobility of Provence, and early destined to a naval career. During the Seven Years War, he attained the rank of Captain and, as Commander of the "Robuste," took part in the battle of Ouessant, fought off the coast of Brittany, June 17th, 1778, which ushered in French participation in the American War of Independence. In 1781, he was made Commander-in-Chief of the French fleet which, on May 21st, set sail from Brest to the American shores.

At the end of July, De Grasse, whose fleet was stationed in the Antilles to protect the French colonies in that section against English attacks, decided after surmounting considerable difficulties, to sail for Chesapeake Bay for the purpose of aiding the land forces of Washington and Rochambeau. These difficulties were two-fold:

1. De Grasse was leaving the French West Indies unprotected and disobeying an order from the French Government to have nine of his ships convoy the merchant vessels bringing to France the annual merchandise exports from the Antilles; and

2. De Grasse decided to embark on his ships 3,400 men garrisoned at Santo Domingo, for the purpose of attacking Florida. In so doing, he was violating a Convention signed between the French and Spanish Governments and liable to disciplinary measures.

In taking the blame for the momentous decision he had reached, De Grasse displayed all the qualities of a great man of war. As a French military writer expresses it: "He dared being weak everywhere so that he might apply the maximum of his strength on the most important spot."

On the 5th of August, 1781, the French fleet, composed of 28 battleships, left Santo Domingo, heading for the Chesapeake Bay. On August 31st, De Grasse lay anchor off Cape Henry in the Chesapeake, sending some light vessels to block the mouth of the James and York Rivers, thus cutting Cornwallis from his source of supply while the 8,000 men from St. Simon and Lafayette were guarding the entrance to the Williamsburg peninsula.

On September 5th, the British fleet was signaled at the precise moment (11 o'clock in the morning) when De Grasse was proceeding with the disembarkation of the 3,000 men brought from Santo Domingo. Without losing for a moment control of the situation, the French Admiral decided to let 90 officers and 1,800 of his sailors, together with 3 of his vessels, proceed with the disembarking operations. A moment after, he ordered the main body of his battleships to sea and met the British off Chesapeake Bay. After two days of fighting, he defeated the British so badly that five of their vessels were out of condition. Their losses amounted to 336 killed or wounded and they were compelled to sail on the 9th for New York. There was an outburst of enthusiasm in Philadelphia. The main body of Franco-American troops under Washington and Rochambeau had arrived on September 2nd and everyone was discussing the clever strategy of De Grasse which would henceforth allow these troops to proceed to Yorktown and to complete the blockade already begun by Lafayette and De Grasse. Cornwallis' position was considered hopeless and as the man of the street expressed it: "Washington will go on to catch Cornwallis in a mousetrap." On October 19th, that prophecy was realized by the surrender of the British land and sea forces to Washington and De Grasse.

The main part De Grasse played in the Yorktown battle consists in the tremendous help he gave the forces of Washington and Rochambeau, adding 2,000 men to the French forces of 7,800 soldiers and making a total of 9,800 Frenchmen fighting on the side of the Americans whose troops numbered around 9,000 soldiers.

De Grasse's momentous decision deserved him the unanimous thanks of his comrades-in-arms and the best conclusion I can find to this short address is to quote here the words of commendation which your first President addressed to my countryman the day after the surrender of the British: "The capture of Yorktown, whose honor is due you, has exceeded all our expectations. . . . Allow me to present to you my truest and sincerest congratulations on the happy issue of the war. . . . Your timely intervention has given America independence and liberty. . . . Your skill and talents are responsible for the final success."

I am happy that this tribute rendered my countrymen by the founder of this Republic is today, after so many years, emphasized once more by the generous initiative of the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission.

ALGERIA

HE notable series of Bicentennial Celebrations in France were supplemented by George Washington observances in France's possessions. Algeria heard the message of the Washington Year at an official George Washington reception in Algiers, capital and chief seaport, on February 22, 1932.

The spacious ball room of the Hotel St. George was the scene of the event. Mr. Oscar S. Heizer, American Consul in Algiers and host at the reception, reported that there were two hundred invited guests present. Besides the American colony and the entire consular corps, a large number of the leading officials of the French administration attended.

The Governor General was represented at the reception by M. Jarre, Administrator of the Colonies and Director of the Civil Cabinet, and the Secretary General of the Government was represented by M. du Pac. Other notable persons attending were: M. Atger, Prefect; Admiral de Montcabrier and Madame de Montcabrier; Mayor Brunel and Madame Brunel; the Rector of the University; the President of the Chamber of Commerce; the Archbishop of the Cathedral; the Bishop of the Anglican Church, and the Consuls of various foreign nations.

The CHICAGO DAILY TRIBUNE, European edition, described the event as, one of the most interesting and enjoyable functions ever held at Algiers . . . all present being impressed by the air of quiet dignity and cordiality befitting such an occasion.

Governmental officials conveyed their compliments to the American Consul upon the significance of the day and spoke of George Washington as one who is dear to the hearts of all mankind.

One of the foreign officers who attended the reception, Hon. Dollin du Fresnel, Consul of Honduras, came away from the affair impressed to the extent that he wrote a special article on George Washington for LA ANTENA ESPANOLA, an Algiers periodical, issue of February 29, 1932, which was given wide circulation. A translation of part of this article follows:

The moment is well chosen to speak a little of this great man who was the first President of the United States of America. George Washington was truly an outstanding character, enjoying before the whole world a unique prestige that comes, it seems, from that serenity of soul, that reflection with which his smallest acts were impregnated, and, in addition, that simple and noble attitude which gives him incomparable grandeur. . . . George Washington's love of country was a profound instinct in his life. This great citizen gave to his country stable institutions of government. He was unique in that he governed only to serve. He enforced obedience, but he knew how to lead men rather than to drive them.

During the evening of February 22 a gala Washington dinner was served at the Hotel Aletti in Algiers to the leading members of the American and French communities. The Star Spangled Banner and the French Tricolor were displayed side by side and a life-size portrait of Washington hung over the banquet table.

FRENCH INDO-CHINA

HE sun of the Far East cast long shadows through tropical trees upon a group of Americans, Frenchmen, native citizens and soldiers in picturesque white uniforms and straw helmets, gathered in the city of Saigon, French Indo-China, on October 29, 1932, for a celebration of the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington. The occasion was the official naming and dedication of a square in the city in honor of the Great American and the presentation of a bronze bust of Washington, mounted on a marble pedestal, to French Indo-China by the American colony in Saigon.

The authorities of Cochinchina, the province in which Saigon is located, speaking through their Governor in January, 1932, suggested that the Place d'Espagne, a beautiful square directly in front of the Palace of the Governor, would be the appropriate one to be given the name of George Washington. This square is a place of historical interest in Saigon, according to dispatches from the American Consul, Mr. Henry S. Waterman. The French, in taking possession of Cochinchina, including the capture of Saigon in 1859, were aided by a force of Spaniards from the Philippine Islands. After the settlement of Saigon by the French and their choice of a suitable location for the erection of the Governor's palace, a place directly in front of the proposed palace was given, in gratitude to Spain as a site for a consulate. Inasmuch as Spain did not desire to erect a consulate, a public square was laid out on the site and named "Place d'Espagne." Later, through direct negotiations with Spain, Great Britain acquired this square, but exchanged it for another site in Saigon. In March, 1932, Governor General Pierre Pasquier, the leading French governmental authority in the country, approved the renaming of the square in honor of George Washington.

Governor Eutrope, of the Province of Cochinchina, Consul Waterman and Mr. Goutès, Chief of the Governor's Cabinet, exactly at 4 o'clock on October 29, walked ceremoniously across the street from the Governor's palace to the square. There had been erected in the square a bronze plaque bearing the name, "Square George Washington."

While the native military guard stood at attention, Mr. Goutès read the following official decree of the Governor of Cochinchina:

THE RESIDENT SUPERIEUR IN INDO-CHINA, GOVERNOR P. I. OF COCHIN-CHINA, OFFICER OF THE LEGION OF HONOR, IN VIEW OF THE DECREE OF OCTOBER 20, 1914, DEFINING THE POWERS OF THE GOVERNOR OF COCHIN-CHINA AND THE RESIDENTS SUPERIEURS IN INDO-CHINA;

IN VIEW OF THE DECREE OF NOVEMBER 21, 1931;

IN VIEW OF THE LETTER NO. 855-AP OF MARCH 7, 1932, FROM THE GOVERNOR GENERAL OF INDO-CHINA

DECREES:

ARTICLE 1—THE SQUARE FACING THE PALACE OF THE GOVERNOR OF COCHIN-CHINA AT THE INTERSECTION OF THE STREETS LA GRANDIERE AND MAC-MAHON, BELONGING TO THE PUBLIC DOMAIN OF COCHIN-CHINA SHALL BE KNOWN UNDER THE NAME "SQUARE GEORGE WASHINGTON."

ARTICLE 2—THE DIRECTOR OF THE OFFICES AND THE ADMINISTRATOR, CHIEF OF THE CABINET, ARE CHARGED TO SEE THAT THE PRESENT DECREE IS PLACED IN EXECUTION.

SAIGON, OCTOBER 29, 1932.

EUTROPE.

Governor Eutrope then pronounced in French: "In the name of the French Republic, the Government of Indo-China and the Government of Cochinchina, I hereby give the name of Square George Washington to this square."

MONUMENT IS UNVEILED

The Governor, the American Consul and the Chief of the Cabinet next proceeded to the tribune facing the monument. Among the prominent persons present in the tribune, which was decorated with American and French flags and green plants, were Monsignor Dumortier, Bishop of Cochinchina; Generals Vallier and Maille; Captain Richard, commanding the naval forces in Indo-China; Pastor Peyric; Maitre Mathieu, President of the Colonial Council; Mr. Gorton, British Consul General; Mr. Richaud, Vice-President of the Chamber of Commerce; Chief Judge of the Court Nepveur; the Procurator of the Republic Canavaggio; the President of the Commercial Tribunal Gorsse, and others.

Mr. Douglas Fairbanks, famous American moving-picture star was also present, with Mr. Scotten, American Vice Consul, and the various members of the American Colony.

Governor Eutrope handed the unveiling rope to Mr. Fairbanks, who slowly lifted the covering, while the band of the 11th Colonial Infantry Regiment played "The Star Spangled Banner" immediately followed by the "Marseillaise."

Hidden under the veil were little Johnnie Nelson, dressed in buff and blue as George Washington, and little Miss Renée Déroutilhe, dressed as Marianne of the French revolutionary epoch. The two children stood at attention during the playing of the national airs.

ADDRESS BY CONSUL WATERMAN

At the termination of the "Marseillaise" Consul Waterman delivered the address of presentation as follows:

Monsieur Le Gouverneur, Mesdames, Messieurs:

In the name of the American colony in Indo-China, I desire to express to you our profound gratitude for the courteous act which caused the naming of this beautiful garden, the Square George Washington, in commemoration of the Bicentennial of the birth of the greatest of Americans.

I would like to read to you a letter received from the Director of the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission upon hearing of your friendly gesture:

The United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission has learned with the most profound gratification and pleasure of the beautiful tribute which the French Government and the Governments of Indo-China and Cochinchina are paying to the memory of the First President of the United States by naming a square, in the city of Saigon, Square George Washington.

On the occasion of the dedication of the Square will you kindly express on behalf of this Commission our deep appreciation of this splendid and enduring observance of the Bicentennial Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington. The people of the United States are indeed proud of this expression of the esteem in which he is held and are pleased to have this opportunity to express, in turn, their friendship and high regard for the people of French Indo-China.

What could be more appropriate on this occasion than to present to a French colony a reproduction of the reputedly most faithful likeness of George Washington in existence, executed by a great French sculptor, Jean Antoine Houdon?

George Washington, "first in war, first in peace, first in the hearts of his countrymen," loved France only second to his own country and one of the closest friends to the day of his death was Lafayette, who with Rochambeau, De Grasse and others, came from France to assist him so materially in his days of greatest gloom.

Washington, on the other hand, was Lafayette's hero to the extent that the latter as a token of his esteem sent Washington the key to the Bastille, which may be seen today in WASHINGTON MONUMENT ERECTED AT SAIGON, FRENCH INDO-CHINA. "GEORGE WASHINGTON" (little Johnnie Nelson) and "MARIANNE" (little Miss Renée Déroutilhe) STANDING AT ATTENTION DURING THE PLAYING OF THE NATIONAL ANTHEMS OF FRANCE AND THE UNITED STATES AT THE UNVEILING CEREMONY.

Mount Vernon, Washington's home on the Potomac. It was during the period of the formation of the lasting friendship between Washington and Lafayette that the traditional friendship between France and America had its inception. The young French officers and men and the struggling colonists who fought side by side learned to appreciate each other's good qualities, thus cementing the unbroken period of friendship between the two countries which exists to this day.

France had its share in the construction of the greatest monument in existence in honor of George Washington, namely the beautiful capital of the United States. It is possibly not known to you that the plans for the City of Washington were laid out by an officer of the French colonial army, Pierre Charles L'Enfant, who was so enthusiastic in the cause of the American Colonies that in 1777 he went to America at his own expense, where he joined the American Army and became a Major of Engineers. His ability was recognized by Washington, and under his direction Major L'Enfant laid out the plans of the capital, which are still followed and consulted today when making improvements in the City of Washington. Major L'Enfant is buried in the National Cemetery at Arlington and the American Congress erected a monument there in his honor.

Unfortunately, George Washington never had the opportunity of visiting France, as his life was so full of self-sacrifice to his people that he did not even find sufficient time to devote to his personal affairs.

The life of this man, whose glory increases with the passing of each year, should be one of particular interest to the Indo-Chinese because, first of all, Washington was a "colon." ("Colon" in French is a colonial planter or farmer and has a different meaning from the word "colonial"). He was a cultivator of the soil, his greatest interests were in the soil and what it could produce. He was also a surveyor, a soldier and a statesman, but in his heart of hearts he was always a "colon" and a gentleman.

There may have been greater generals than George Washington, there may have been greater statesmen than George Washington, but history can show us no name in which all of the manly virtues have been more signally united in one human being.

Possibly the greatest tribute which his memory has received is that the British now consider him as one of their greatest heroes and are proud of the fact that George Washington was a colonial of pure British stock. Today, another Houdon statue of Washington, who was at one time the greatest enemy of Great Britain, stands in Trafalgar Square in London.

George Washington's life was one of personal disappointments and self-sacrifice caused in large part by his singular devotion to what he considered his duty. A man who, at times almost alone in his faith, never removed his gaze from his ultimate objectives. A man in whom honor, integrity, straight-forwardness and self-effacement were blended in a most striking manner. Who but a George Washington would refuse with indignation the crown which was attempted to be placed on his head? It is of this man that another one of our greatest Americans, Abraham Lincoln, said: "To add brightness to the sun, or glory to the name of Washington, is alike impossible."

May this monument be a permanent reminder of the friendship which has always existed between France and the United States, and may the guiding spirit of George Washington, whose likeness is before you, ever watch over and guide our two countries through any trials and tribulations which may arise ahead of us.

Monsieur le Gouverneur, the American colony and its friends present through your intermediation to the Union of French Indo-China this monument.

GOVERNOR EUTROPE'S RESPONSE

Governor Eutrope accepted the monument in the name of his people in the following address:

Mr. Consul, Ladies and Gentlemen:

Once more, the celebration of the Bicentenary of George Washington causes the American colors to fly on French territory fraternally united with the French colors. Thousands of kilometers away from their countries they reunite, and are reunited, the American colony of French Indo-China and the population of Saigon together in a common admiration for one of the most illustrious figures of history.

In a gesture which shows their veneration for the memory of George Washington as well as their liking for the country where they are living, the Americans of Indo-China and their friends offer today to French Indo-China this bust of George Washington which so happily enriches the artistic patrimony of Saigon. They have decided as an additional attention that this bust should be a reproduction of that of the great French sculptor Houdon. In the name of the Governor General I address to all the donors the thanks of French Indo-China.

You have reminded us, Mr. Consul, that George Washington loved France as a second fatherland and that he was united to Lafayette by a bond of friendship which only death could sever.

Gentlemen, the friendship which united these two great men was the model of those noble friendships which have been formed and developed during the periods where each of our peoples battled for their existence, between fellow soldiers

Right to left: Mr. Goutès, Chief of the Governor's Cabinet; Maitre Mathieu, President of the Colonial Council; Governor Eutrope, of Cochinchina; Lieut. Gen. Vallier, American Consul Waterman, Capt. fighting for the same cause on the same fields of battle. The relations which were thus established between the best of French and American citizens, the common cemeteries where there repose in both America and France thousands of comrades in battle of the two nations, are the surest gauge of the persistence of the Franco-American friendship.

At a time when economic difficulties without precedent cause different nations to isolate themselves behind customs barriers, when national interests tend to be opposed to each other, it is well, it is indispensable that the harsh struggle of economic interests should be softened by the grand recollections which evoke the union of nations during the hours of peril in the past, which demonstrate the necessity of this union in the scarcely less difficult hours of the present.

This union, this spirit of understanding and confiding collaboration, we find realized in Indo-China where the American colony participates usefully in the work undertaken by France to develop this country and its resources.

Does it not appear to all under these conditions that the celebration of the Bicentennial of the great George Washington takes on significance here quite particular?

This work of colonization which we are following in Indo-China, making healthy a country, developing it, making the soil give forth, was that not also the work to which George Washington consecrated a part, the largest part, of his life? George Washington at the age of 16 left for his first surveying expedition to the new lands of western Virginia; he had to work all day, pass the nights in open air under tents or under any available covering, at a time when winter was at its height on the summits of the Alleghanies, when the melting of the snow swelled the rivers and made their passage difficult, when the paths through the forests were cut by swamps and precipices.

George Washington at that time was a vigorous and intelligent young man; he loved his hard life, worked with honesty and purpose; gifted with an active and hardy temperament he enjoyed exploring distant lands, participated in hunting expeditions after which, tell us certain of his biographers, the Virginia gentlemen got together joyously to drink and to dance.

George Washington settled a number of years later in his domain at Mount Vernon, which he himself was to exploit. During his whole life he was a planter; this Mount Vernon which he left to join Congress when the confidence of his compatriots had called him to public life, he was to rejoin definitely, after having become the most illustrious of Americans, to visit his farms, to oversee in person the work in his fields and resume his occupation of "colon."

George Washington could have taken for his motto the one of Marechal Bugeaud, the pacificator of Algeria, "Ense et Aratro," by the sword and by the plow. If the illustrious patriot was a great warrior, a great President, a sage who stepped immediately into immortality, he was also above all a planter, a "colon", a clearer of land full of love for this land which he had known in its virgin state. In spite of wars, in spite of the heavy financial burdens which he knew while extending his domain, he worked, pursued his labor and succeeded. What lesson, Gentlemen, for all of us at present, what beautiful lesson of energy and also of encouragement! And was I not right when I affirmed that the image of George Washington lends to local conditions a particular significance!

To George Washington, liberator and glory of his country, to George Washington promoter of Franco-American friendship, to George Washington finally, courageous "colon" in adversity, who received from the President of the Chamber of Bourgeois of the State of Virginia the eulogy that he was more capable of action than of eloquence. I address the respectful salutation of the colony, the testimony of our admiration for this splendid example he has given us and the lesson of which shall never be forgotten.

TWO THOUSAND ATTEND CEREMONY

At the close of the Governor's address little "George Washington" picked up the bouquet of red, white and blue flowers from the base of the monument, and, with a courtly bow, kissed the hand of "Marianne" and presented it to her. There then filed past the monument, saluting it, a procession of two hundred Annamite school children.

It is estimated that over 2,000 people were at the dedication ceremonies.

A parchment scroll giving a list of the donors of the monument was enclosed in a hermetically sealed bottle, and placed inside the bust itself. The scroll bore the following inscription in French:

1732-1932

IN COMMEMORATION OF THE BICENTENNIAL OF THE BIRTH OF GEORGE WASHINGTON

The American colony at Saigon and its friends present this monument to French Indo-China at Saigon, October 29, 1932. His Excellency the Governor of Cochinchina, E. Eutrope, representing the colony, receives the monument in the presence of many officials, civil and military authorities and the consular corps.

Melvin, Diethelm & Co., Miss Carolyn Jacobs, C. R. Lyons, Sidney Legendre, H. C. Durr-schmidt, C. T. Bauman and A. H. Tessier.

Mr. Waterman, in his account of this notable event, wrote:

Acknowledgment for the success of this little ceremony must go to the small American colony of Indo-China; to a few Americans passing through who showed their interest in the monument; to French firms of Saigon, representing American manufacturers; to the American Committee, composed of E. W. Nelson, chairman; John E. Eiker, Jr., and George Washington Drolette. But above all, the acknowledgment should be made to Vice Consul W. Everett Scotten, without whose tireless efforts and unbounded enthusiasm the monument would never have been erected.

Acknowledgment is also made to Mr. Chauchon, of the Board of Public Works, architect of the city of Saigon, for his great interest, since the inception of the project, in seeing that the monument was properly and artistically placed, in drawing the design for the monument itself and the inscription.

Thanks are also due to Mr. Douglas Fairbanks, who arrived on a boat on October 28, with the intention of going on a hunting expedition immediately, but who, when requested by the American colony and the local Government, most generously and kindly postponed his trip to remain in Saigon and take a place in the dedication ceremony. Mr. Fairbanks was most gracious and friendly during his short stay, gave thousands of autographs—in fact had to be rescued after the ceremony from the hundreds of Annamites desiring his signature—made a most favorable impression upon everybody, and was indeed a creditable representative of the American people in every possible way.

A Fox Movietone outfit, in charge of Messrs. Hawk and McInnis, made its plans to be in Saigon during the ceremony and covered the dedication exercises thoroughly with sound and picture apparatus.

At 5 o'clock in the evening the American colony tendered a reception to the Governor and his corps at the American Consulate. During the reception Governor Eutrope presented to each of the three members of the American Committee, and to the Consul and the Vice Consul, a bronze medal struck by the French Mint in Paris to commemorate the Bicentennial of the Birth of George Washington.

GOVERNOR GIVES BANQUET

The reception was followed by a banquet given in honor of Washington by the Governor of Cochinchina to the American colony at the palace. Toasts to the President of the United States, offered by the Governor, and to the President of the French Republic, offered by the Consul, gave the banquet the air of fraternity. Mr. Fairbanks spoke a few words bringing the greetings of the American people to the people of Indo-China.

The celebration was given prominent place in several French and Indo-China publications, including L'IMPARTIAL, LA DEPECHE D'INDOCHINE and L'OPINION. The latter paper printed the following editorial:

[Translation]

The inauguration of the bust of George Washington was the occasion for a fine manifestation of the traditional friendship which unites the United States and France.

Saturday at 4 o'clock the American colony presented through its Consul, Mr. Waterman, a bust of George Washington to the city of Saigon.

The manifestation which took place greatly honors our young colonial city which from now on, like many of its metropolitan elders, may ostensibly show its admiration for the greatest of Americans, George Washington, the affectionate comrade of Lafayette and the ardent friend of France

AMERICAN CONSUL HENRY S. WATERMAN SPEAKING AT SAIGON. ANOTHER VIEW OF THE OFFICIAL CEREMONY AT THE DEDICATION OF THE GEORGE WASHINGTON MONUMENT IN FRENCH INDO-CHINA.

Although Governor General Pasquier, of French Indo-China, found it impossible to attend the ceremonies at Saigon, Consul Waterman reported that he graciously declared the afternoon of October 29 a holiday for all Government offices in Saigon, in order that the governmental officials of the capital of Indo-China could be present at the dedication ceremonies.

Governor Pasquier also sent the following telegram to the American Consul:

FINDING IT IMPOSSIBLE TO ASSIST PERSONALLY AT THE CEREMONIES IN HONOR OF GEORGE WASHINGTON, I DESIRE TO ASSOCIATE MYSELF TO THE WORDS OF FRATERNITY WHICH WILL BE PRONOUNCED UPON THAT OCCASION. ALL OF INDO-CHINA AND I MYSELF TAKE PART TO THE BOTTOM OF OUR HEART IN THIS MANIFESTATION OF DEEP FRIENDSHIP IN WHICH THE TWO GREAT REPUBLICS UNITE IN THIS COMMEMORATION OF THE HERO WHICH AMERICA HAS GIVEN TO THE WORLD, AND FOR EACH OTHER.

MOUNT VERNON, VIRGINIA—THE HOME OF GEORGE WASHINGTON.

MADAGASCAR

MADAGASCAR, a large island off the East Coast of Africa, a French Colonial possession, and one of the most remote parts of the world from the United States, despite handicaps of time and distance, joined in celebrating the George Washington Bicentennial. At Tananarive the American Consulate was the scene of a Washington observance on February 22, 1932. The American flag was unfurled to the breeze to signify the importance of the occasion and a great number of callers from various parts of the island were received by the American Vice Consul, Hon. Percy G. Kemp. The guests conveyed their high regard to Mr. Kemp regarding the day and expressed their goodwill toward the government of the United States.

During the evening a Washington dinner party was held at the Consulate at which toasts were drunk to the Great American and attention was directed to the Bicentennial theme by the decorations, the conversation, and a general patriotic atmosphere.

The American Mission at Ivory, Fianarantsoa, Madagascar, held its own Washington celebration, which took the form of a "five o'clock tea." Rev. S. Nesdal states in a letter to the American Consul at Tananarive that: "I am glad to report a very successful commemoration at this place. My invitation to the Chef de Region & Adjoint, Chef de Province, Chef de District, and Commissaire de Police was very cordially accepted. We had a very pleasant time interspersed with music and short speeches."

One of the most appealing descriptions of a Bicentennial celebration in any country was submitted to the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission by Miss Clara A. Dysland, of the American School in Fort Dauphin, Madagascar. Prefacing her account Miss Dysland says: "We are in our small way celebrating the Bicentennial of George Washington in our school work. . . . It would be difficult to find even in the United States a more patriotic group of youngsters than we have here." Continuing, the account reads:

An American who once came to this island for scientific purposes remarked: "Madagascar is about as far from the United States as one can get." But not only does the distance of many thousand miles separate us from our homeland: We are under the Southern Cross, instead of the Great Bear; in the Southern hemisphere with the hottest season coming directly after Christmas, instead of in July and August; surrounded by brown-skinned natives and few signs of civilization; and with French as the official language and Malagasy in all of its dialects spoken by most of the population. Here one would hardly expect to find much to remind a person of America.

Yet here in the southeastern part of Madagascar, in the midst of such conditions, is found a group of American citizens, loyal and true, with a deep love for the homeland and all that it represents. Here hearts are thrilled when the Star Spangled Banner is unfurled to the breeze and our national songs are heard or sung.

In Fort Dauphin, the seaport and headquarters of our mission, is an American school, the only such school in the island, and here American principles and ideals are taught.

As patriotic Americans we have not been unmindful of the world-wide celebration of the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington, but on the contrary have tried to do honor to the Father of our Country. We have in many ways had the valued assistance of the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission, which has been much appreciated.

At school various Washington projects have been carried out. In the lower grades a study of Washington was pursued throughout the year. Silhouettes of our first President were made and sent to the Americans here. Washington booklets were started early in the year and completed by Thanksgiving Day. To find illustrative material enough was no easy matter, but friends here and in America gladly cooperated. One feature of the booklets was a page containing the twelve Bicentennial stamps, an interesting Washington art gallery, and all who participated secured a complete collection. These booklets, the proud possessions of their youthful authors, were on display at our Washington program on Thanksgiving Day and awakened much interest.

Arrangements were made for a Washington declamatory contest for the upper grades and an essay contest for the high school. Rules were laid down similar to those followed in similar contests in the United States.

We were overjoyed to be granted by the Bicentennial Commission a badge-medal and a bronze official medal as prizes to the winners in the contests. When the medals arrived and had duly passed the customs they were received with great enthusiasm. Interest was not only shown by those competing for them, but the smaller pupils begged to be allowed to touch or hold the big bronze medal bearing the likeness of Washington, and this privilege was granted to each loving little heart. It was touching to see how each one in turn held out two hands to make a cup-shaped receptacle in which the medal was very reverentially received. It reminded one of the native custom of always receiving a gift with two hands, be it but a needle. Such value must be placed on the gift that two hands are necessary for receiving it.

One evening we Americans gathered for the declamatory contest and the awarding of the two medals. Patriotic songs were sung and the declamations were well spoken. The air was filled with expectancy over the decision of the judges. First place and the badge medal were awarded in the declamatory contest to Marie Pederson, whose declamation was entitled "National Monument to Washington." The prize-winning essay was written by Agnes Torvik and was entitled "Washington's Influence on Our Life Today." She was the happy recipient of the bronze official medal.

Another part of our celebration was the unveiling of the splendid reproduction of the celebrated Athenaeum portrait of Washington, a gift from the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission. The arrival of this picture caused great rejoicing on all sides. Our great Washington loved children and he is loved by our little American children out here in Madagascar as well as by those of his own country. Before our much admired picture was framed it almost came to grief, but was rescued just in time—a little six-year-old girl was about to throw her arms about it in a loving embrace.

A frame of native ebony was made and the picture was hung in one of the rooms of the school and unveiled with simple but impressive exercises. After the singing of "America," Agnes Torvik read a paper especially written for the occasion. Two of our smaller pupils, Dagny Tverberg and Agnes Braaten, then pulled the cords that drew aside the two American flags unveiling our much prized picture of him who was "first in war, first in peace, first in the hearts of his countrymen." The singing of "The Star Spangled Banner" concluded the program.

On Thanksgiving Day we Americans in Fort Dauphin gathered at Lebanon, our peninsular summer resort, for a dinner and services. That same evening the American School gave a Washington program in the spacious parlor of the school dormitory. The program consisted of music from the days of Washington, a Betsy Ross play and a presentation of the development of our national emblem through readings and a display of seven flags used at various times in the history of our country.

We trust that these studies and celebrations have not only done honor to Washington, but have given us a deeper love for our country, a greater appreciation for him, and that they have filled us with a desire to emulate the noble traits of his character.

We are very grateful to the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission for its live interest and valued cooperation in our work in this far corner of the world and for the material it sent to us. Words cannot express the appreciation felt, not only by our school, but also by the rest of the Americans here. It makes us all realize that we are a part of that vast band of Americans that during the past year have been honoring our illustrious Founder, and in so doing paying tribute to our beloved country.

PRIZE-WINNING ESSAY

Miss Torvik, whose essay on George Washington was awarded the prize, was the first student graduated from the high school division of the American School in Madagascar. Special reference to her success in the George Washington Bicentennial Contest was made at the graduation exercises. Her prize-winning essay follows:

WASHINGTON'S INFLUENCE ON OUR LIFE TODAY

"First in war, first in peace, first in the hearts of his countrymen," Washington is loved and honored by all true Americans who teach their children never to forget that his example, and the fruit of his labors are their inheritance. His entire influence on our life today cannot be estimated. As citizen, soldier, farmer, scholar, and statesman, he has benefited not only America, but the whole world.

Washington stands out as a noble example of loyal citizenship. He loved his country, and surely more than any one else, has done much for her in every way. When America "nobly resolved to risk her all in defense of her violated rights," she turned to Washington. Unanimously elected by Congress to take command of her armies, he left his farm, like Cincinnatus, and answered that high call. Although hardships and privations were before him, he stood firm and steadfast as a rock. "We must not despair," he exclaimed. "The game is yet in our own hands. To play it well is all we have to do." Courageously, he did play it well, leading America through an arduous war to independence. We are grateful to Washington for the freedom which we all enjoy today.

Perhaps as a nation-builder and organizer Washington has had more influence on our life today than as a patriot and soldier. Under Britain's rule, the colonies had been protected in numberless ways, but after the Revolution they were left unprotected and helpless. They had no government. Again Washington came to the rescue. Many forms of government were considered, but he firmly believed that a republic, an executive government, would last longer, and make for a happier nation. He had "little to learn about executive government from the prerevolutionary experiences of the colonies," but nevertheless he conducted this nation, "new in its forms and principles, until it had settled down into a quiet and orderly train." We are indebted to Washington for our representative form of government in which each citizen has a part.

But this is not all he did for his country. The foundation was now sure, but the people needed to be taught and directed. Washington's aim was to promote education in America. "Knowledge," he said, "is in every country the surest basis of public happiness." His intellectual influence reaches down to our own day, for he himself was a writer. His writings contain not only valuable information, but noble aims and purposes for all generations to follow. The first university was Washington's idea. He said "The best means of forming a manly, virtuous, and happy people will be found in the right education of youth; without this foundation every other means, in my opinion, must fail."

Washington has done much for the expansion of the United States. He was the first engineer in our country. While still a boy, he became a surveyor, thereby gaining experience which later proved to be of value to him. Interested in all progress and development, he suggested routes of transportation, one of which was later used by the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, encouraged the use of steam, and worked for internal improvements. "No men of his time had as great an influence as Washington in the expansion of the population and of the political and social ideas into the West. More than any other individual has he contributed to found this our widespread empire and to give the western world her freedom."

In the agricultural field also has Washington had lasting influence. He encouraged farming, taking the lead himself at Mt. Vernon, where he spent his time, when not in the service of his country, making valuable experiments and observations which are used even at the present time. They have had great influence on the advancement and commercial independence of America.

But Washington's name is mightiest in moral reformation. The purity of his life, his integrity, his incorruptible honesty, his devout reliance on God, the scrupulousness of his conscience, his humanity, generosity, and justice—these stand out before the world as a shining unparalleled example, influencing the lives of all. Thank God for Washington and his influence on our life today!

SOCIETY ISLANDS

HE Governor of the Society Islands, the Mayor of Papeete, their wives, and all of the French and foreign officials of the islands led a group of more than 400 persons who attended a gala George Washington reception and program at the American Consulate in Papeete, on the Island of Tahiti, the capital of the Society Islands, on July 4, 1932.

The guests were received by Hon. William P. Garrety, American Consul, who was also the recipient of friendly and official greetings and Bicentennial salutations. Consul Garrety aroused the interest of his audience with an address on the life of George Washington in which he pointed out that the destiny of France and America walked hand in hand in the days of the Great American, and for that reason, if for no other, the Star Spangled Banner and the Tricolor might well be displayed together in gesture of fraternity, as was being done throughout France and her colonial possessions during the Bicentennial Year.

During the day a reproduction of the famous Stuart portrait of Washington was hung in the Bureau of the Consulate with appropriate ceremonies.

TURKEY

TO THE rising generations in Turkey, who are enjoying the benefits of democratic reforms, George Washington, liberator of his people, henceforth will be more than just another historical figure from a distant land. Through the medium of the Bicentennial celebration in the land of the Star and Crescent Washington and his ideals were brought impressively to the attention of a representative part of the Turkish people by the American colonies in Istanbul and Izmir, chief cities of the Turkish Republic.

The President of Turkey, His Excellency Gazi Mustafa Kemal, conveyed his felicitations and united the government of Turkey with the celebration in the following cabled message to the President of the United States:

MR. HOOVER,
PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES,
WASHINGTON.

ON THE OCCASION OF THE BICENTENNIAL OF THE GREAT AMERICAN GEORGE WASHINGTON, I AM HAPPY TO EXPRESS TO YOUR EXCELLENCY MY SENTIMENTS OF SINCERE FRIENDSHIP AND KIND GOOD WISHES FOR THE HAPPINESS AND PROSPERITY OF THE UNITED STATES.

GAZI MUSTAFA KEMAL (PRESIDENT OF TURKEY)

Under the direction of the American Ambassador to Turkey, Hon. Joseph C. Grew, a George Washington Bicentennial Committee was named in Istanbul in January, 1932, consisting of the following persons:

Joseph C. Grew, American Ambassador, Chairman; Mrs. Joseph C. Grew; Charles E. Allen, American Consul; Dr. Caleb Gates, President of Robert College; Dr. Marion Talbot, Acting President of Constantinople Woman's College; Lewis Heck, President of the American Chamber of Commerce; Luther Fowle, Treasurer of the Turkey Mission of the American Board of Foreign Missions; Harry T. Baker, representing the Y. M. C. A.; Margaret B. White, representing the Y. W. C. A.; Colonel Duncan J. Elliott, representing the War Department; Frederick B. Lyon, representing the Department of Commerce, and David Williamson, Secretary of the Committee.

This Committee immediately made preparations for the observance of the Bicentennial in the city named for Constantine, but whose name was changed during the reform period to Istanbul. Turkish-American schools were invited to participate in the celebration with the result that the Robert College in Istanbul and the Woman's College in the same city were pledged to conduct essay contests upon Washington subjects, and in various other ways focused the attention of the students on the Great American. The former school distributed the following notice to all of its students:

Throughout the United States and in all parts of the world, especially where there are American institutions, the 200th anniversary of the birth of George Washington will be celebrated during 1932. The life and character of Washington were such that he can not be regarded as of mere importance but he is of significance as a world figure. The variety of his interests give him universal appeal. Washington advanced as a surveyor, engineer, farmer, business man, writer, soldier, and statesman. It is but natural that the students of Robert College should be interested in Washington and should be encouraged during these coming months to read, write, and study about him and the time during which he lived.

The notice then proceeded to give a long list of essay topics and a bibliography of Washington material from which information could be derived. The students entered enthusiastically into the project, and a large number of essays were submitted. The colleges named also established Washington book shelves in their libraries, containing history, biography, Washington's own writings, and miscellaneous documents concerning his life and times which will become permanent additions to the literary collections of these Turkish-American institutions.

Ambassador Grew, in a letter of January 9, 1932, to the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission in Washington, D. C., said that "the Turkish situation with respect to the Bicentennial is somewhat different from most foreign countries because the American community, with few exceptions, resides in Istanbul while members of the Turkish Government live in Ankara, so it will not be possible to combine the two in the main celebration on February 22." However, the celebration in Istanbul was not deterred because of this fact.

On Washington's birthday, 1932, three commemorative functions were held in Istanbul. During the morning the entire student body and staff of the "Constantinople Woman's College," and many resident Americans met in the assembly hall of the College to honor the great Virginian. At this function the mixed assemblage arose and sang the "Star Spangled Banner," listened attentively to President Robert L. Scott, Principal of Robert College, who read excerpts from the writings of George Washington, and was held in rapt interest by the address delivered by Ambassador Grew, in which he pictured Washington as the symbol of uprightness, courage, and devotion to patriotic duty, inspiring leaders of countries fighting for independence and regeneration, such as Mustafa Kemal had wrought in Turkey.

During the afternoon a similar ceremony was held at Robert College at which the American Ambassador was also the principal speaker. The address delivered by Ambassador Grew at these Bicentennial events is reprinted in part:

* * * Immediately we pause to ask, why was Washington great? Some men go down in history as great men because they dealt successfully with great events in which chance played a predominant part. Great battles have been won by unexpected flukes which in turn have contributed to the winning of wars with which the name of the victorious general will ever be associated. Hero-worship is an admirable thing, but to justify itself it must be based not only upon what that hero did, but upon what he was. Great deeds are worthy of remembrance, but it is the character and personality of the doer which is primarily worthy of study and emulation.

Washington won a war, one of the most difficult and uphill fights that have ever been recorded in history, the results of which, since it led to the founding of a great nation, were of epoch-making importance.

* * * I have said that Washington was a sound and deliberate thinker. How easy it is for all of us, when some problem arises, to decide it on the spot, by intuition or by predilection perhaps, but without thinking that problem through, without looking at it from every side and from every angle. It is the man who pauses to think a problem through, to analyze it from previous experience, who rightfully earns a reputation for sound judgment. From boyhood it was Washington's habit to think back, clarify his mind and pass judgment on the events which he had shared. An event might be as fruitless as a shooting star unless he could trace the relations which tied it to what came before and after. Hence his deliberation which gave to his opinions the solidity of wisdom. Audacious he might be in battle, but perhaps what seems to us audacity seemed to him at the moment a higher prudence. If there were crises when the odds lacked ten to one against him, he would take the chance. He knew the incalculable value of courage. But he knew also the importance of deliberation and used it constantly in his statesmanship. Although Washington was less learned than many of the men of his time in political theory and history, he excelled them all in a concrete application of principles. His strength lay in his primal wisdom, the wisdom which is based not on conventions but on a knowledge of the ways in which men will react towards each other in their primitive, natural relations. He had the widest acquaintance among men of different sorts. He listened to all opinions, but never sacrificed his own unless convinced by further factors as to its fallacy. In this respect he was one of the most actual and therefore one of the wisest among the statesmen. Patrick Henry, being asked when he returned home, "Who is the greatest man in Congress?" replied: "If you speak of eloquence, Mr. Rutledge of South Carolina is by far the greatest orator; but if you speak of solid information and sound judgment, Colonel Washington is unquestionably the greatest man on that floor." In the House of Burgesses, when he first took his seat, and attempted to acknowledge the ovation given him, the Speaker said: "Sit down, Mr. Washington, your modesty is equal to your valor, and that surpasses the power of any language that I possess."

* * * We need not draw comparisons between leaders in history. Some were great for one reason, some for another. Yet it is quite impossible, standing today as we do on Turkish soil—soil that has been fought for and bled for and consecrated for all time by the courageous deeds and sublime patriotism of illustrious leaders,—not to see the analogy between the American Revolution of 1775 and the Turkish Revolution of 1920, not to see the similarity of roles of George Washington and Mustafa Kemal; not to recognize the vision, the far-sighted judgment, the unrivalled courage and patriotic devotion that each gave to the welfare and progress of a newly-founded nation. Let us then depart today, having done homage to the memory of the great dead, with the happy conviction that among the living we still find the same spirit of high enterprise and the same qualities as existed in former days. The world's pioneers are not extinct; when necessity and emergency call, they are there ready to devote their lives to their country's need. And as for us, who follow where they lead, let us too do our little best to carry on the torch of inspired patriotism along the trails which they have blazed.

At 5 o'clock in the afternoon a Bicentennial reception was held at the American Embassy for the American community in Istanbul, to which function were invited also many of the Turkish dignitaries of the city. More than 200 persons attended this social event and on the lips and in the hearts of all were expressions of good will and pleasure at being able to join in the festivities of the day. Washington portraits, American flags, colonial decorations and music identified the fête with the day.

On February 26 a George Washington luncheon was held under the auspices of the American community in Istanbul. This event, expressive of the love in the hearts of Americans abroad for their nation's founder, was attended by 135 members of the colony and several invited guests of prominence in Turkish affairs. The speakers on this occasion were Dr. Talbot, President of the Constantinople Woman's College, and Dr. Gates, President of Robert College, both of whom dwelt at some length on the life, the ideals, the example of Washington, and the all-around greatness of his character. Children of the community joined in singing the President's March, and other patriotic airs.

The American colony at Izmir, capital of the vilayet of the same name and one of the chief cities of Asia Minor, convened on the 22nd of February, 1932, at the Consulate and gave honor to George Washington and to the standards epitomized in him. Among the attendants at this event were the American Consul, Hon. Herbert S. Bursley, and Mrs. Bursley, and Dr. Cass A. Reed, President of the International College at Izmir, who delivered a brief address on the theme of the day. The Celebrants indulged in indoor baseball and other games until evening when a Washington entertainment was held in the home of Mr. Archibald MacFarlane. In so far as possible this event was designed to recall the days of Washington in song and dance and conversation. This reception was in turn followed by another Bicentennial gathering later in the evening at the American Consulate.

George Washington literature sent to Turkey by the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission was available at these ceremonies in Istanbul and Izmir and was distributed to interested parties. Several portraits of George Washington as well as copies of the chart, "Flags of American Liberty," were distributed to schools in the vicinity of the Consulates, and in various other ways was the attention of the community directed to the Bicentennial celebration.

FINAL INAUGURAL ADDRESS OF GEORGE WASHINGTON, AT FEDERAL HALL, NEW YORK CITY, APRIL 30, 1789.

REICHSTAG HONORS MEMORY OF GEORGE WASHINGTON. THIS NOTABLE CEREMONY, WHICH WAS UNPRECEDENTED IN GERMAN HISTORY, WAS HELD UNDER THE AUSPICES OF PRESIDENT VON HINDENBURG. THE PICTURE SHOWS THE ENTIRE ASSEMBLY, INCLUDING CHANCELLOR BRUNING AND AMERICAN AMBASSADOR SACKETT, SINGING "THE STAR SPANGLED BANNER."

GERMANY

THE people and the Government of Germany honored the memory of George Washington, during the nine-months' celebration of the Two Hundredth Anniversary of his birth, in an unprecedented manner. Never before did a foreign hero receive such universal and enthusiastic acclaim. To judge by the spirit of the bicentennial ceremonies which took place in all parts of Germany, George Washington is a name which is cherished and revered by the German people.

Streets, squares and parks were named or renamed in honor of America's First President. Eminent statesmen and educators eulogized him in eloquent addresses. A George Washington Memorial Library was established in the Technische Hochschule in Stuttgart and an endowed professorship was planned for the University of Munich. Germans and Americans mingled in numerous banquets and other festivities under the flags of both nations, and for the first time the strains of the "Star Spangled Banner" were heard in the legislative hall of the Reichstag. The above were but a few of the highlights and characteristics which marked the Bicentennial Celebration in Germany.

In the following message to President Hoover, President Paul von Hindenburg congratulated the American people on the important anniversary and committed himself and the German people to its commemoration:

BERLIN, FEBRUARY 22, 1932.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES,
THE WHITE HOUSE,
WASHINGTON, D. C.

IN CONNECTION WITH THE CELEBRATION OF THE TWO HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE BIRTH OF YOUR GREAT NATIONAL HERO, I VENTURE TO EXPRESS THE MOST CORDIAL CONGRATULATIONS TO YOU, MR. PRESIDENT, AND TO THE WHOLE AMERICAN NATION, BOTH IN THE NAME OF THE GOVERNMENT OF THE REICH AND IN THAT OF THE GERMAN PEOPLE. GEORGE WASHINGTON, WHO WAS A MODEL LEADER OF HIS FELLOW-COUNTRYMEN IN WAR AND PEACE, BELONGS AMONG THE IMMORTALS OF THE WORLD'S HISTORY. MAY THIS YEAR OF COMMEMORATION OF GEORGE WASHINGTON, WHOSE STRONG HAND STEERED THE YOUNG AMERICAN SHIP OF STATE SAFELY THROUGH ALL REEFS DURING A MOST DIFFICULT PERIOD, BE THE BEGINNING OF AN ERA OF NEW ECONOMIC ADVANCE FOR THE AMERICAN PEOPLE AND THE WHOLE WORLD.

VON HINDENBURG [PRESIDENT OF THE REICH].

Again, nine months later, at the close of the George Washington Bicentennial Celebration, the interest of the German government was expressed in the following communication from the German Ambassador in Washington, His Excellency Herr Friedrich W. von Prittwitz und Gaffron:

WASHINGTON, D. C., NOVEMBER 24, 1932.

MR. SECRETARY OF STATE:

ON THE DAY WHICH MARKS THE CLOSE OF THE GEORGE WASHINGTON MEMORIAL CELEBRATION, THE GERMAN GOVERNMENT FEELS THE NEED ONCE MORE TO EXPRESS TO THE AMERICAN GOVERNMENT THE DEGREE OF INTEREST WITH WHICH THE ENTIRE GERMAN NATION HAS FOLLOWED THE OBSERVANCES IN HONOR OF THE FIRST PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

THE UNITY OF SPIRIT WITH WHICH THE WHOLE WORLD HAS SHOWN ITS VENERATION FOR GEORGE WASHINGTON HAS INDEED BEEN A SUBLIME SPECTACLE. FOR THE GERMAN NATION, WHICH FEELS ITSELF BOUND BY MANIFOLD HISTORICAL AND HUMAN TIES TO THE AMERICAN NATION, IT WAS A MATTER OF HEARTFELT INTEREST SOLEMNLY TO CELEBRATE THE IMMORTAL MEMORY OF GEORGE WASHINGTON. THE GREAT AND SPONTANEOUS PARTICIPATION OF THE WIDEST CIRCLES OF THE GERMAN POPULATION IN THESE CELEBRATIONS DURING THE PAST YEAR IS THE BIRTHDAY REMEMBRANCE WHICH THE GERMAN GOVERNMENT IS GLAD TO OFFER TO THE AMERICAN PEOPLE AT THE CLOSE OF THEIR GREAT WASHINGTON MEMORIAL YEAR.

ACCEPT, MR. SECRETARY OF STATE, THE RENEWED ASSURANCE OF MY HIGHEST CONSIDERATION.

(Signed) F. W. VON PRITTWITZ, GERMAN AMBASSADOR.

HIS EXCELLENCY,
THE SECRETARY OF THE STATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
HENRY L. STIMSON,
WASHINGTON, D. C.

AMERICANS AND GERMANS JOIN

Many of the celebrations were planned and carried out by the German people themselves. Other commemorative events were held under the auspices of the American residents of various cities or were organized by Germans and Americans jointly. In some cities commemorative exercises were held under serious handicaps, and in others projected events had to be cancelled because of the economic distress which Germany suffered in common with the rest of the world. But despite all obstacles, the name and fame of George Washington and the genuine friendship existing between the German and American peoples were potent enough to inspire one of the greatest demonstrations of good will and friendship ever to occur in the country which gave to the American Revolution such illustrious leaders as Barons von Steuben and de Kalb.

Among the German celebrations in honor of George Washington none was more interesting or of greater value in the development of friendly relations between Germany and the United States than the project carried out by the Deutsche Akademie with the assistance of the Carl Schurz Society. By inviting Dr. Carl Wittke, professor of history at the Ohio State University, to lecture throughout Germany on George Washington and American institutions, the Deutsche Akademie selected a means of participating in the Bicentennial Celebration which, in keeping with the purposes of the organization, was calculated to "develop more thoroughly the spiritual and cultural relations between Germany and the United States."

The plans of the Akademie also included the establishment of an endowed professorship of American history in one of the leading German universities as a permanent memorial to George Washington and a means of developing among the German people a knowledge of American history, life, and conditions. Unfortunately the general adverse economic situation of 1932 made it impossible to procure the necessary funds at that time, but hope for the accomplishment of the project has not been abandoned by the Akademie.

Advising the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission of the lecture tour by Dr. Wittke, Major R. Fehn, secretary of the Deutsche Akademie, on April 15, 1932, wrote:

In order to develop more thoroughly the spiritual and cultural relations between Germany and the United States, the American committee of the German Academy invited the professor of history of the Ohio State University, Dr. Carl F. Wittke, for a series of public lectures in Germany, commemorating the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington. The lecture tour of Professor Wittke was intended as a symbol of the active and sincere participation of the Deutsche Akademie in this occasion, so important for the history and development of the United States, and it was also intended as the first step in an attempt to develop throughout Germany a better knowledge of American history and culture by inviting an outstanding American scholar for lectures in Germany.

Professor Wittke arrived in Germany early in January and addressed university groups, local assemblies of the Deutsche Akademie and city authorities in the following German cities: Halle, Freiburg, Frankfurt, Heidelberg, Karlsruhe, Stuttgart, Berlin, Munich, Magdeburg, Dresden, Breslau, Hamburg. In these lectures, which were well attended and enthusiastically received, Professor Wittke developed in German or in English various themes on the life of George Washington. He discussed Washington's contributions to the creation and development of the United States, and his importance as a figure in world history.

Professor Wittke outlined in various lectures, the aims and purposes of America's foreign policy from 1789 to the present.

The lecturer spoke from the point of view of a scholar in the field of history and for that reason was able to develop most successfully some of the fundamental themes of American history. Professor Wittke brought to these lectures, two of which were broadcast over large networks, not only profound scholarship and sincere understanding, but an intimate knowledge of German as well as American conditions. He pointed out to his audiences that a spiritual and cultural relationship between the United States and Germany should be further developed.

The efforts of Professor Wittke who received only his actual traveling expenses, and the financial support given by the Carl Schurz Memorial Foundation made this lecture tour possible and successful. To the latter the Deutsche Akademie owes special thanks for its help in making it possible to carry out the plans for a George Washington celebration in these times of extraordinary economic and political stress in Germany.

In recognition of his important services for the development of a better understanding between Germany and the United States the Deutsche Akademie elected Professor Wittke to honorary membership in the Akademie.

BICENTENNIAL COMMITTEE NAMED IN BERLIN

Plans for the observance of George Washington's Bicentennial Anniversary were begun in February, 1931, when United States Ambassador Frederic M. Sackett announced at the annual Washington Birthday banquet of the American Club in Berlin that a committee had been selected to plan and supervise the celebrations in Germany.

The announcement met with the instant and enthusiastic approval of the club, and a resolution approving the action of Congress in undertaking a general celebration was adopted. It was also decided that the American Club of Berlin would support the movement whole-heartedly and would take the initiative in the celebration in Germany.

OPENING OBSERVANCE IN BERLIN

The first Bicentennial ceremonies in Berlin took place Sunday morning, February 21, when special commemorative services, conducted by the Reverend Mr. Turner, pastor of the American Church in Berlin, were held. The pastor remarked on the significance of the occasion, and introduced United States Consul General George S. Messersmith, who had been invited to deliver an address on the life of George Washington. In a letter of February 27, 1932, Mr. Messersmith advised the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission of this and other observances throughout Germany, and made this interesting comment:

It is interesting to note that not only in Berlin, but in every one of the cities in Germany in which we have a consular establishment the local authorities and distinguished Germans in various walks of life have cooperated in a very whole-hearted and generous manner with our consular officers in arranging celebrations in commemoration of this event.

Speaking of the Bicentennial Celebration of Washington's birth, Mr. Messersmith told the congregation that all the world was joining the United States in honoring the memory of her First President. He expressed appreciation for what was being done in Germany to commemorate the anniversary and advanced the opinion that the reason for the universal interest in George Washington was due to the fact that he "is one of the great figures in world history." Inasmuch as there would be much said on the life of the great American during 1932, the Consul General stated that in his discourse he would confine himself to a discussion of those factors which made George Washington the truly great man that he was.

Mr. Messersmith's address follows in part:

It is with a certain hesitation that I speak to you this morning on Washington because in approaching this, the greatest historical personality we possess, I feel myself inadequate to do justice even to a narrow phase of the subject which I may endeavor to discuss with you in the short limits of the time at our disposal.

Throughout the whole of the United States and throughout the whole world where Americans may be enjoying the hospitality of other countries, we are about to celebrate the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the birth of the one whom we have become accustomed to speak of as the Father of our Country. Because Washington is really not only a great historical figure in the United States, but is one of the great figures in world history as well, our German friends and other peoples throughout the world are joining with us this year in these anniversary celebrations. As this celebration is, therefore, in a sense a world-wide one, it must be considered not only as a tribute to Washington the American, but to Washington as one of the truly great spirits who has definitely risen above the mass of humanity and has shown the way to higher and better things, and who by really unselfish devotion to an ideal, has achieved something permanent for humanity.

As you are familiar with the few excellent portraits we have of Washington and as his features are probably better known to us than those of any other American, I only need say here of his personal appearance, that in his prime he was a man of impressive figure, being about 6 feet 3 inches in height and weighing about 220 pounds, of florid complexion and strong, rather immobile features. In general demeanor he was quiet, reserved, slow and even considered cold, though always courteous. He was not easily moved to any show of feeling. His reserve and general demeanor were such that he was described by some contemporaries as glacial, but those who knew him realized that behind that calm and cold exterior there burned fires of passion and devotion. That he was capable of strong passion to which he nevertheless seldom gave way, history has recorded for us. It would be difficult to examine the personality of Washington in even the most cursory way within the limits of our time today, in order to bring out those elements which constituted his greatness. It is only the most sketchy picture I can bring to you and it is quite likely that I shall develop nothing new for any of you.

His earliest training and environment among circumstances so familiar to you, developed in him that strong spirit of independence, that love of liberty and that intolerance of petty minds which so strongly characterized him in his whole career. This spirit of independence and love of liberty must be viewed as guiding principles which actuated him in every hour of decision in that long public career, where every day called for important decisions. His intolerance of petty minds, of small things and small people, were the reasons why he was considered by many cold and unapproachable.

He was from his earliest years of maturity influenced by his adherence to republican ideals. With an aristocratic background stretching back over many generations and with the training of a real aristocrat of the old world transplanted into a new country, his adherence in his day to republican ideals only stands out the more significantly. He nevertheless did not harbor any rancor or hatred of England, but fought for the separation of the colonies from the mother country because he believed it essential for the development which was their right. He resented the exploitation of the colonies by the Crown as not being truly aristocratic in principle and his turn to republicanism was probably largely influenced by what he saw of aristocracy and monarchy in action.

He was a man of the highest courage in the truest sense of the word. I am not speaking of physical courage which, though very important, is not the courage of the highest order. He had that courage of mind and spirit which brooks no obstacle, considers no sacrifice too great and no danger too threatening, but sees only the object to be attained and which follows it unswervingly without hesitation, without a moment's vacillation. Probably few military leaders have had their courage tried in dark hours as Washington. He did not falter at Valley Forge nor at other almost equally distressing crises of the revolutionary period. When assailed by his enemies and detractors, when the things he most loved were attacked, and at a time when he himself would have much preferred the quiet and calm of Mount Vernon, his devotion to his ideals, to the new country for which that devotion was to earn him the title of "Father," and his inability to give way to pressure and opposition, made themselves felt in a much more magnificent fashion than any show of physical courage on the battlefield. His was that high type of moral courage which fights its battles in the seclusion of the study and of the work chamber as effectively as in the field of military and political struggle.

He had the virtue of self-control, which is one of the primary and most essential elements of greatness. His calmness when attacked and maligned as general of the armies and as President, is so well known that it needs no comment. With his enemies and with those who endeavored to undermine his work, he had infinite patience although he felt for them a righteous contempt.

Political feelings and personal ambitions, contrary to our usual opinion, had probably even more unrestricted play in the early days of our Republic than now and for the man with the background of Washington and for one who avoided place rather than seeking it, it required the highest degree of self-control to maintain calm amidst a storm of passions. We know that in spite of the strong temper which he possessed, history can record but few instances when it showed itself. The great man must first be master of his own spirit.

As a military genius he is accorded universally a high place. From his earliest years he showed his ability to lead and to organize men. Before the age when most young men now go to college, he was already in command of troops and was little more than of age when he became commander of the Virginia forces after Braddock's inglorious defeat. Like most military geniuses, Washington showed marked ability in his early years. He had the real military genius which does not depend for its success upon unlimited materials of war. He had that genius which wins victory by the spirit it can put into troops, by the foresight and ingenuity with which it can plan campaigns and by the considered judgment with which it can reap the full results of victory.

His organizing capacity showed itself in the way in which he carried out his duties during the French and Indian wars. It showed itself later in a most startling fashion when he made out of the voluntary Continental army a fighting machine which won his country's freedom—a feat which is still the amazement of military writers and commentators throughout the world. It showed itself in the part which he played in the work of the Constitutional Convention of which he acted as President; and finally it showed itself in the work which he did as President in consolidating the results of the Revolution and of the Convention, and in the laying of a sure foundation of the country which today is so grateful. To win victories, to conceive plans, to show the way, are all in themselves expressions of greatness, but when we find them combined with the ability to organize and really to build, we have a truly great and exceptional personality. Perhaps in no way is Washington's greatness more significant than in his vision and his political capacity. In the part which he played in the Constitutional Convention and in his Farewell Address, we find a man who sees far into the future, who is able to forget his immediate surroundings, who does not have his vision clouded nor his judgment disturbed by the petty disillusionments and difficulties which are always with us and which pre-occupy small men, who could look forward and beyond and above these things clearly into the future and envisage the really big things which have a permanent significance. His Farewell Address is the expression of a seer and of a prophet and yet is the expression of a wise and considered statesman. In one of his essays on representative men, Emerson emphasizes that clear vision is one of the sure signs of true greatness and in this respect Washington meets fully all the tests.

And in his simplicity of speech and manner and life there is a sure sign of true greatness. The great are always simple and it is only the near great who have to surround themselves with ceremony and ceremonial. Although a patrician by birth and breeding and by his associations, he was a true democrat. He abhorred sham and pretense of all kinds. In his personal life and habits he remained always quite simple although he maintained a certain dignity, natural to his character. Although reserved, he was always accessible. He maintained his self-respect at all times but did not wound that of others or their sensibilities, no matter how humble.

He had another quality which is only found among the few great men who reached the highest eminence and that is an almost total lack of personal ambition. While he was consumed by a burning desire to serve his country, while he felt that it had a claim upon his every moment and upon his every force and thought, he was imbued by a real desire to serve rather than to gain a place for himself. What Washington desired for himself more than anything else, was the peaceful life of a Virginia gentleman farmer, a quiet and calm existence in which he could enjoy his family and his friends. As is often the case with the truly great, his real personal ambitions were never achieved. But his life was one of sacrifice. He knew that he was living in a great epoch in the life of a new country. His devotion to his ideals and to the republican spirit made it possible for him to put aside his personal desires and ambitions. He had to a great degree that real element of greatness—passion for the service of his country. He always felt that the honors which were thrust upon him were too great for him, that there were others who could probably bear the responsibilities better than he. He always approached his responsibilities in an humble spirit, and like the truly great, sought for guidance from the Divine spirit. To me one of the most impressive incidents, even if it may be legendary, which history records, is that of Washington praying in the snows of the hillsides at Valley Forge in the midst of that terrible winter, for Divine guidance in what seemed an almost hopeless task. It is after all only small minds which feel that they can depend upon themselves and it is a truly great mind which understands the necessity for the co-operation of all useful means to a worth while end.

But it is not possible to analyze greatness. It is a futile endeavor to attempt to take a great personality and to analyze the various factors which make up that greatness which mankind has accorded to it. But however this may be, and however inadequate my brief analysis today may be, we know that Washington was a truly great man; great not because circumstances made him so or because he was born so, or that a single act of bravery or intellect made him so; but because he possessed in a very unusual degree all those qualities of mind and soul which make a person capable of supreme service to his fellows. Such men belong to no one country, to no one people. Their unselfish achievements are the property of mankind and the inspiration of humanity everywhere. The world's truly great are only too few, for too often selfish ambition clouds the vision of those who would lead struggling humanity to the heights.

We Americans are grateful for the memory of this man who has served as the ideal everywhere of those struggling for greater service, for wider human liberties, for more unselfishness and for the greatest political freedom and happiness of all men.

PUBLIC SQUARE NAMED FOR WASHINGTON

George Washington's birthday dawned on a Berlin thoroughly prepared to commemorate the auspicious anniversary. Beginning the day's activities was the short but impressive ceremony conducted on the morning of February 22 at the Lehrter Bahnhof under the auspices of the Carl Schurz Society and municipal authorities of Berlin, when a public square, situated not far from the site to be occupied by the future offices of the United States Embassy, was named "Washington Platz" as a lasting tribute to the memory of America's champion of liberty in the Capital City of Germany. Numbered among the large crowd assembled to witness the official dedication of the square were representatives of the national and municipal governments, the United States Embassy, the American Institute, and many citizens of Germany and America. A troop of American Boy Scouts in uniform added a touch of color to the event.

Although the naming of the square was authorized by the city council of Berlin, the suggestion originated with the Carl Schurz Society. The dedicatory ceremony on Washington's birthday was arranged under the direction of the society, and the president, Dr. Hans Draeger, was in charge of the program.

Dr. Draeger warmly welcomed those in attendance and spoke of the importance of the occasion as being a signal tribute to the memory of George Washington. He expressed the satisfaction felt by the Carl Schurz Society in being identified with this and other projects in which the anniversary of Washington's birth would be commemorated throughout Germany. Dr. Paul Loebe, president of the Reichstag, then was introduced. Speaking briefly of the German appreciation for George Washington's greatness, Dr. Loebe expressed the belief that the bonds between Germany and the United States would be more firmly cemented in the Bicentenary commemoration of Washington's birth. The dedication of the "Washington Platz," he said, was only one of many events in which Germany proposed to observe the occasion during 1932. Calling upon the throng surrounding him for cheers for Germany and the United States, Dr. Loebe was enthusiastically answered by resounding huzzas from all sides.

RESPONSE BY MR. WILEY

In the absence of United States Ambassador Frederic M. Sackett, John S. Wiley, Chargé d'Affaires ad interim at the Embassy, responded to President Loebe's remarks. Mr. Wiley graciously acknowledged, on behalf of his country, the mark of Germany's friendliness toward the United States as evinced in this commemorative tribute to George Washington. He said:

In the absence of the Ambassador I have the honor to express the very sincere appreciation of the American people that one of the important squares in the Capital of Germany has been named after President George Washington, in commemoration of this two hundredth anniversary of his birth. I especially wish to thank the municipal authorities of Berlin for choosing this square in front of the Lehrter Bahnhof to bear Washington's name and I also desire to thank the officials of the Carl Schurz Society for their initiative in inaugurating the movement.

As Dr. Draeger has already stated, the selection of Washington Platz is an especially happy one. An ever-increasing proportion of the Americans who visit Europe come to Berlin. Many of these obtain their first impressions of this great city on their arrival at this station. What could better signify the friendly relations existing between our two countries than that at their first step they should be greeted with the name of the founder of American freedom, the first President of the United States?

May the naming of this square prove to be a happy symbol of the future of our two nations.

That evening the Bicentennial Celebration proper was officially ushered in at a noteworthy banquet held under the auspices of the George Washington Bicentennial Celebration Committee in the famous Marmor Saal, or Marble Hall of the Berlin Zoological Garden Building, in Berlin. The gathering was distinguished by the presence of many officials of the German Government, including Dr. Wilhelm Groener, Minister of National Defense and of the Interior; Dr. Gottfried Treviranus, Minister of Transportation, and several representatives of the German Foreign Office.

Numbered among the guests of honor also were: Dr. Walther Simons, former Acting President of the Reich, and former Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Germany; Dr. Heinrich Sahm, Mayor of the City of Berlin; Dr. Bernhard von Buelow, of the German Foreign Office; General von Steuben, a great grand nephew of the General von Steuben, George Washington's aide-de-camp, and Admiral von Raeder, chief of the Navy Department of the Ministry of National Defense.

Presiding over the banquet, Ambassador Sackett welcomed the distinguished and numerous guests assembled on the occasion, and spoke of the reasons for the Bicentennial Celebration in which George Washington's countrymen planned to honor his memory. The celebration, he stated, was reaching into every land where people were seeking to evince the deep respect in which Washington's name is universally held. Said the Ambassador:

I extend a cordial welcome to our distinguished guests, the representatives of the German Government. They graciously join with us in paying tribute to the life and example of General Washington, the First President of the American Republic, on this the two hundredth anniversary of his birth.

As you all know, Washington epitomizes American traditions. With his contemporaries he founded a government which is the oldest in present form that serves any people of the world. He left a marvelous heritage to succeeding generations. He gave of his time, his substance, and intelligence that there might be established a new character of government. It was responsive to radical ideas, and subversive of the conservatism of the times—a nation consecrated to the rights of the individual in respect to life, liberty, property and the pursuit of happiness.

How well Washington and his confreres succeeded is a matter of history, but the fact that the edifice they erected has endured through the years creates in the breast of every citizen that spirit of thankfulness and appreciation which is responsible for tonight's foregathering of Americans throughout the world. This morning's sun in its course will cast its rays upon successive groups of our grateful people—men and women—assembled to give acclaim to patriotic thoughts inspired by the name of Washington, until having girdled the earth it bids adieu to the twenty-second of February and enters upon a new day.

It is a privilege to preside over this notable gathering in honor of him who guided the earliest beginnings of the land I proudly call my home. While these anniversary meetings open the Washington Duo-Centennial, a much larger program is envisaged by the Committee of Congress entrusted with organizing a notable year of commemoration. Frequently, especially on festal days, until the time of Thanksgiving next November, the events of America's early history will be celebrated in the cities, towns and hamlets of the United States. Similarly our nationals resident in other lands will come together in various cities on several occasions through the year to pay homage to their first President. So general is the interest in the life and times of Washington and so widespread the reverence for his memory that governments and peoples of almost every land are seeking opportunity to evidence the deep respect in which his name is held.

The story of Washington furnishes the broadest base on which are builded America's ideals. For the native-born and for the stranger who seeks adoption in our land, that story forms the example of patriotism and love of country that is the joy of life to an American citizen. It is fitting therefore that gathered here we should listen to the record and achievements of the man whose memory we revere.

Your Committee is most fortunate in being able to draw upon a treasure house of knowledge. I have the great pleasure of first presenting to you Frederick J. E. Woodbridge, Johnsonian Professor of Philosophy in Columbia University of New York, who is spending the present year in Germany as Theodore Roosevelt Professor of American History and Institutions. George Washington—I fancy no more fitting subject could be found for a whimsical philosophical study of a great historical personage by one who is a world master of his craft. Such a master is Professor Woodbridge, and a real American. His distinguished services to American education and philosophical research form a background singularly congenial to his subject, and I present him to you as Berlin's contribution to the commemoration of our national tradition.

WASHINGTON'S CHARACTER DISCUSSED

Professor Woodbridge, thus introduced by Ambassador Sackett, ably fulfilled the promises made by his eminent countryman by speaking eloquently of the qualities of Washington's character which made him great. The advice Washington left his countrymen upon his retirement from the Presidency was referred to by the speaker, and he averred that the observance of this counsel was one of the prime factors in the growth of the United States. To that fact he also attributed the success with which "peoples from the old world living together in the new" had established unbreakable bonds of citizenship and loyalty between Germany and America. Dr. Woodbridge's address in its entirety follows:

Nineteen thirty-two—Seventeen thirty-two, two hundred years. And yet I remember that my mother told me in my childhood, that her father was born in New Hampshire the year George Washington died. Such memories shorten the centuries. I looked upon my grandfather with awe, as if he had known Washington himself. It was only a bare touching of birth and death as they are dated in the calendar, but it is enough to remind us of living citizens who have learned of Washington from his contemporaries and have not been left to books alone. We are asking today who George Washington was. But ask our elders who have been in the world 70 or 80 or 90 years, and ask the youngsters in school. The answers will reveal the difference there is between memory and history, between looking at a living ancestor and looking at a printed page. They will reveal an experience which we as a nation are rapidly losing, and shall soon have lost altogether. The day draws near when it will no longer be possible for the living to feel through the perspective of the years a contact almost physical with him who was first in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen. It is fitting, therefore, at this turning-point in the remembrance of Washington, that we should try to see a man as his contemporaries saw him and listen to his advice as to the words of a father again saying farewell.

He himself said of the Confederation: "Today one nation, tomorrow thirteen." The words paint him to the life, as his contemporaries saw him—one nation in his presence, in his absence thirteen. He was unity in symbol and in fact, simply by being on the spot. As a soldier he had held together through long and weary years, a turbulent, rebellious, selfish, mutually distrustful and often despairing people. He had led them to victory at last. He had been first in war. They turned to him in peace, asked him to become a statesman, and lead them to a greater victory, the victory over dissension and disunion in their freedom. And he did it, a man with little more than the experience of a soldier to go upon. He was first in peace. They wanted a constitution. They did not ask him to make one. They asked him to preside over the convention that he might be in that turbulent assembly, the symbol and fact of unity again. They got a constitution. They asked him to be President. He took the office reluctantly, and knowing so little of statecraft, he gathered about him a group of men who knew much, and bade them go to work. They worked. They differed and they quarrelled. He kept them at it around the table, just as he had kept his debating officers at it around him in his tent. He was asked to be President again. Again he accepted reluctantly. He was a tired soldier. But, after that second term, the young nation was strong enough to run for fifty years, before it met another struggle for unity and life. That was an achievement. That was what men saw when they looked at Washington, and that is what fathers told their sons. There was an army of statesmen, with Ministers and future Presidents in it, but the General was Washington.

We may speculate about what would have happened without him, but what happened, did not happen without him, and what happened was stupendous enough to make conjectural history look cheap indeed. Here was the man who was the nation in his person, a man who compelled gratitude, admiration, and worship, whose frailties existed to be forgotten, the tired soldier of many a tiresome battle, who wanted to be a farmer instead of a President, who was transformed into a great statesman through the fortunate coincidence of his character with the opportunity, who should be painted as the portraits paint him—the Commander, fearless, confident and serene. He became first in the hearts of his countrymen. So they remembered him, and so they bequeathed him to their children's children.

Descriptions of Washington by his contemporaries have much to say about his personal appearance and his moral qualities. They read a little as if the compulsion to admire suppressed the attempt to form a critical judgment. But listen to Thomas Jefferson writing of Washington in 1814:

AMERICAN FLAG RAISED IN THE NEW WASHINGTON PLATZ IN BERLIN. A TROOP OF AMERICAN BOY SCOUTS, WITH THE ASSISTANCE OF GERMAN SOLDIERS, CONDUCTED AN IMPRESSIVE FLAG RAISING CEREMONY AS PART OF THE CELEBRATION OF THE GEORGE WASHINGTON BICENTENNIAL IN THE GERMAN CAPITAL.

"His mind was great and powerful, without being of the very first order; his penetration strong, though not so acute as that of a Newton, Bacon or Locke; and as far as he saw, no judgment was ever sounder. It was slow in operation, being little aided by invention or imagination, but sure in conclusion. Hence the common remark of his officers, of the advantage he derived from councils of war, where, hearing all suggestions, he selected whatever was best; . . . He was incapable of fear, meeting personal dangers with the calmest unconcern. Perhaps the strongest feature in his character was prudence, never acting until every circumstance, every consideration, was maturely weighed; refraining if he saw a doubt, but, when once decided, going through with his purpose, whatever obstacles opposed. His integrity was most pure, his justice the most inflexible. . . . His temper was naturally irritable and high-toned; but reflection and resolution had obtained a firm and habitual ascendancy over it. If ever, however, it broke its bonds, he was most tremendous in his wrath. . . .

"On the whole, his character was, in its mass, perfect, in nothing bad, in few points indifferent; and it may truly be said that never did nature and fortune combine more perfectly to make a man great, and to place him in the same constellation with whatever worthies have merited from man an everlasting remembrance."

This, in spite of its "nevers" and "everys" and because of its studied restraint and qualified exaggeration, reads like a well-considered estimate. Jefferson had the analytic habit of mind and consciously spoke to posterity as well as to the immediate ear. The central and controlling sentence in his judgment of Washington is this: "Perhaps the strongest feature in his character was prudence." Not to plan first and hear suggestions afterwards, but to hear suggestions first and then to plan; not to start with conclusions; but to come to them, and to come to them when they are needed, and with the full acceptance of responsibility; to have a violent temper so controlled and disciplined that it keeps a plan once adopted steadily driving to its accomplishment—these traits of character describe a man whom others instinctively trust. It is the realistic habit of mind. It makes experience count more than theory, and the sense of fact count more than the dreams of the imagination. It is prudence, a timid virtue in the weak, a compelling power in the strong. We see a soldier, a President once, a President again, a strong man, a self-disciplined man, a fearless man, a man of integrity, bringing the power of prudence to the shaping of a nation.

Washington's Farewell Address to the people of the United States was a plea for prudence in conducting national affairs at home and abroad. North, South, East, and West were called upon to see above their rivalries and ambitions their essential interdependence, and above this, the commonweal of a people, inviting mutual respect and co-operation. He tried to impress upon them that their problem was the sinking of their sectional differences in that common cause which alone could assure them peace, prosperity, and happiness. It was like a father speaking to his children out of a life's experience, bidding them—be sensible and prudent, and cautious about illusions of glory. He was saying goodbye to a new nation. In an intensely personal sense it was his. He had given his life to it, risked his life, his fortune, and his reputation. He foresaw that it had the opportunity to become one of the great nations of the world, but he wanted it to be a different sort of nation from the ordinary. He wanted to see a people becoming conscious of their nationality through that common, daily, and neighborly intercourse with one another, which their independence and their new land offered them in rich abundance. He did not want their national consciousness to be generated by participation in the quarrels of others. Turning from North, South, East, and West, he looked across the ocean and spoke his words of warning. They are familiar to school children. They are read annually in the Senate. We may listen to them again:

"Observe good faith and justice toward all nations. Cultivate peace and harmony with all.—Religion and Morality enjoin this conduct; and can it be that good policy does not equally enjoin it?—It will be worthy of a free, enlightened, and, at no distant period, a great nation, to give to mankind the magnanimous and too novel example of a People always guided by an exalted justice and benevolence.—Who can doubt that in the course of time and things, the fruits of such a plan would richly repay any temporary advantages which might be lost by a steady adherence to it? . . .

"In the execution of such a plan nothing is more essential than that permanent, inveterate antipathies against particular nations and passionate attachments for others should be excluded; and that in place of them just and amicable feelings towards all should be cultivated. . . .

"Against the insidious wiles of foreign influence, I conjure you to believe me, fellow citizens, the jealousy of a free people ought to be constantly awake. . . . But that jealousy to be useful, must be impartial. . . .

"The great rule of conduct for us, in regard to foreign Nations, is, in extending our commercial relations, to have with them as little Political connection as possible.—So far as we have already formed engagements, let them be fulfilled with perfect good faith. Here let us stop."

That was prudence in 1796. Has it been changed by 136 years? Has it been changed by the Bremen speeding across the ocean? By the network of cables which lie at the bottom of the sea or by those strange rays of nature which have brought Europe and America within speaking distance of each other? Has it been changed by a World War? By the fear of destruction unless we all join hands to succor one another? Is it out of date? Has it ceased to be prudence in the modern world? Surely the living and not the dead must answer such questions and take the responsibility for answering them. And we, the living, are sorely in need of prudence. We have too much the habit of planning first and hearing suggestions afterwards, of starting with conclusions instead of coming to them, and of claiming to be realists when we have so little sense of fact. The living never answer a question right, unless they answer it in terms of the conditions which generate it. The dead are in the great majority. It is prudent for the living to turn to the dead first, before they turn to that future which will surely answer all their questions, but which as surely will never tell them how.

We are remembering Washington. We remember his Farewell Address. We should also remember the fact on which it was based. It was not the product of a political theorist, but of an experienced man. It drew its force from circumstances. Political connection with Europe had been severed. That connection had been largely responsible for strife among the colonies. It was a serious danger to the young nation, not only on account of the inexperience and insecurity of its government, but also on account of the character of its population. The people of the new United States were American in name only. In ancestry they were European. In flesh and blood, in emotional kinship, in the memory of fathers and grandfathers, in the memory of former allegiances, of historic defeats, victories, and glories, in culture, in religion, in the thousand things which go to make up that inherited patrimony which is the natural basis of a man's piety—in all this the people were English, German, French, Dutch. They were freed from Europe by a Declaration of Independence and by the establishment of a government, but they were not freed from what living men remembered. Political connection with Europe could, all too easily, transform national conflicts in the old world into civil conflicts in the new. Experience and fact lay back of that rule of conduct which Washington advised. It was based on a soldier's experience and observation.

And now; after these many years and many changes? My fellow citizens who acknowledge a rich inheritance from Germany or from France or from Italy and I who acknowledge the same from England, have we ceased to thrill at the names of those great nations? Do we look with careless indifference on their welfare or their fate? God forbid! But we are Americans. That means that we have sworn allegiance to a Constitution under which for all these years, just such men as we have lived happily and peaceably together, enjoying without fear or favor what each of us could contribute to the other's good. This is why, when we sit down to consider our national relations to the lands we love, lands which have been loved for 136 years through successive generations, we find that we must consider our relations to them not individually but collectively. And when we consider our relations to them collectively, we find that we can do so with calmness and satisfaction only on the basis of their relations to one another. The way they deal with one another is crucial for the way we can successfully deal with them. We must be impartial. It is not whim, nor prejudice, nor avarice, nor ambition which makes this so. It is the experience of the kind of life we have lived, North, South, East, and West. The international prudence of Washington becomes ours, when we think of international politics and remember what we are.

And what are the United States of America? A great and powerful nation, no doubt. But does its greatness or power tell what its experience has been or is? Do they define the kind of force it is in civilization and human history? Our fate has defined us differently. It has made us the experience of the different peoples of the old world living together in the new, and finding in that common life a loyalty to one another which even a world war, with the heart-rendering decisions it entailed, could not weaken. It looks like an experience to be guarded. It looks like an experience to be employed. It is usable. It is ready to be used. It wants to be used. It defines an opportunity and a responsibility. International politics and international prudence are now unhappily two different things. Can they be made happily one? The men and women the world over who shall make them one, will be dear to the hearts of Washington's countrymen and dear to the hearts of their own.

An enthusiastic wave of applause swept the audience as Professor Woodbridge concluded his discourse, and the orchestra immediately brought every person to his feet with the inspiring strains of the "Star Spangled Banner." At the conclusion of this rendition of America's national anthem, Charles Kullman, well-known American tenor at that time fulfilling an engagement with the Berlin State Opera, delighted the assemblage by singing several familiar American compositions.

Ambassador Sackett then presented the next speaker, Dr. M. J. Bonn, in the following introduction:

"And now we are privileged to listen to reflections on Washingtonia, as envisaged by one of Germany's greatest publicists. Professor Dr. Moritz J. Bonn, Rector Magnificence of the Handels-Hochschule of Berlin, combines the highest accomplishments of German intellectual life with an intimate knowledge of American letters, customs and ideals. His wide experience as exchange professor in several of the leading American universities; his extensive and remarkable public service to his own country and the brilliance of his appearances before the Williamstown Institute of Politics mark him with a fame that is international. As student and essayist, as educator and executive, but particularly as an idealist in the realm of kindly friendship, I commend Professor Bonn to your cordial interest."

WHY GERMANS ADMIRE WASHINGTON

The speaker immediately captured the interest of his auditors by a discussion of factors involved in the American War for Independence and the important place in relation to it held by George Washington. Washington as a private citizen had few connections with Germany, said the professor, and his official contacts were not sufficient to account for the deep popular sympathy with which Germans all over the world were paying homage to him. The reason for it, asserted Dr. Bonn, was an "instinctive feeling" that in the character of George Washington were combined stability, integrity, courage and all other attributes of greatness. "It is this," said the speaker, "which makes us all join you in the world-wide celebration of George Washington, who by becoming the Father of his Country, did not cease to be a son of our own old world."

Dr. Bonn's speech follows:

Two hundred years ago when George Washington was born, there was no Germany, but merely a jumble of many States of varied size and importance, inhabited by German-speaking people. Under these circumstances neither his official connections with Germany nor the impact of his achievements on German life seem considerable to the superficial observer. And yet, it was Germany, or rather Prussia, who made the foundation of the United States possible during George Washington's life time.

England had been Prussia's ally in the Seven Year's War; and in some ways it was England who profited most from it. For France's entanglement in continental Europe had prevented her from throwing her entire strength into the struggle for the new world. She lost Canada, not merely by the storming of Quebec, but on the German battlefields where Frederick the Great prevailed. It was the cost of the French wars which raised the taxation issue in the North American Colonies, and it was the ousting of France as an immediate dangerous neighbor which enabled them to strike out for complete independence at a time when they were not strong enough to face a great military power as neighbor, when no longer protected by a comparatively unexacting mother-country.

The fact that none of the German States were Colonial powers enabled their inhabitants to look upon the first great modern struggle for national emancipation from rather a friendly point of view, though the fundamental ideas which finally embodied themselves in the Declaration of Independence and the American Constitution were not very dear to the German mind of those days. These ideas constituted a bond rather between the American and the French Revolution. For the time being France and the United States were in close alliance not only because England was the common enemy, but because the spirit of rationalism, descended from the great French philosophers, could easily be applied to political problems in a France struggling against the continuation of the ancien régime, and in the American Colonies, striving for liberty. Germany, on the other hand, was politically anti-rationalist and has remained so until today. Moreover, though the groupings of the powers on the European chessboard changed quickly enough, England as a rule was considered an ally, though not a beloved one, whilst France, owing to history and geography, was rather the traditional enemy.

There was indeed a close relation between Washington and the German people by means of the settlers in the United States, who even at that early date numbered very nearly a quarter of a million. In most States they were not very important in the social scale of life; and as a consequence few of them were Tories. The majority threw themselves into the struggle for American independence with a heartfelt enthusiasm, whilst—one of the curious paradoxes of history—the French in Canada remained finally Loyalists.

George Washington had a high opinion of those German settlers. His body-guard is supposed to have been formed by them. And it is well-known that drill and organization of the American army—drill and discipline not being one of the most cherished traditions of American national life—were greatly enhanced by the work of Baron von Steuben.

All this, however interesting it may be, would scarcely account for the deep interest, for the feeling of veneration and sympathy with which Germans in Germany as well as all over the world join in the celebration of the two hundredth anniversary of George Washington. We pay homage to him, of course, as the founder of a great country which, apart from a very short and unhappy period in the world's history, has always been friendly to us. And we honor in him the great soldier and statesman who established the principle of national self-government in the modern world. But this does not go deep enough; it might account rather for official celebrations than for deep popular sympathy.

George Washington as a private citizen, had very few connections with Germany. He never had a chance to travel in Europe. He was not a very learned man, he did not know our language and was not interested in our main achievement of the period in which he lived: the great revival of German literature and German philosophy. It may very well be doubted whether any of the great names which are inscribed on the role of honor of Germany of those days, meant anything to him. He was, if I read him rightly, a typical gentleman of the eighteenth century. He grew up in that great nursery of English gentlemen across the seas in Virginia. His ideals of life, his ways of acting, his attitude towards friends and foes, his pastime, and even his foibles are those of a very fine gentleman of this extraordinarily interesting age which evolved the type of gentlemen to perfection who maintained all the honorable traditions of the past, whilst he opened his mind liberally to new ideas. Curiously enough, the same century, by letting in the age of reason, destroyed the foundations on which alone this aristocratic type of gentlemen could flourish.

It is another of the very curious paradoxes of history, that the man who was the best type of many things English—he even was very fond of afternoon tea, an institution, which in the American West is considered "effeminate"—was the man who put an end to the North American colonies as English countries. He and his friends tried to impress a good many of their own traditional ideals in the American Constitution; and in some ways they have been successful. But ever since he stepped from the Presidency, and certainly from the accession of Thomas Jefferson, the tide has been running strong in the opposite direction. An America has been created, evolving a character of her own, turning aside vigorously from all European examples, evolving social and political ideas of her own which influence Europe and the rest of the world today, but are scarcely any longer influenced by them.

This "Making of America," or rather of the United States as a political and social system of its own—just now it is not as loudly acclaimed as perfect as it was a few years ago, but I am convinced that the crisis with its most acute sufferings is bound to pass in not such a very long time for the people of the United States—has been a wonderful achievement for the States as well as for the world in general.

But there is a great danger involved, a danger perhaps never greater than at the present time: the growing consciousness of an essential national character of their own on the one us to maintain it, and enable us to face the dangers threatening it today from many sides rather than cut themselves adrift. It is this instinctive feeling, if I may so call it, which makes us all join you in the world-wide celebration of George Washington, who by becoming the Father of his Country, did not cease to be a son of our own old world.

Dr. Bonn's address met with hearty applause. The audience arose in a body as the orchestra played the German patriotic anthem, "Deutschland, Deutschland über Alles." Ambassador Sackett then proposed a toast to President von Hindenburg and Dr. Groener responded by proposing a toast to President Hoover. The program was concluded with the presentation of an American film story of the life of George Washington.

Most of the program at the Marmor Saal was broadcast to the United States where it was re-broadcast over a nation-wide radio network. S. Miles Bouton, dean of the American correspondents in Berlin, was master of ceremonies and radio announcer. There were nearly seven hundred guests at this notable celebration which received wide attention in the press of Germany and many other countries. The Bicentennial Celebration in Germany had a most auspicious opening.

hand, and the discovery of a different attitude to life and its problems among the European nations, that are just now driving the people of the United States towards an ideal of complete isolation. I do not think that this ideal can ever be achieved, but great damage may be done to the world at large and especially to the relations of the United States to Europe during the time in which they are striving to achieve the impossible.

This day presents a wonderful opportunity to Europeans as well as to citizens of the United States in uniting in a celebration of the memory of George Washington. He had the American outlook, for he was not only a great American soldier and statesman, he was one of the pioneer minds, striving westward, where the future of the American commonwealth lay hidden in those days—I might mention here by the way that he wanted to settle his Western Ohio estate with German settlers—but he had the instinctive feeling and understanding of a European mind as well. He united the striving for American ideals with the maintenance of what was good in European tradition. He succeeded in breaking the link which forged his country to Europe's political fate. But he never allowed the link to snap which bound it to the common inheritance of European civilization. He achieved American independence; he was not willing to sacrifice to it international interdependence. He gave his country what was essential to it in those days: complete separation; he saved it as well from getting involved in separate entangling alliances as from striving after complete isolation.

As long as the American nation does homage to George Washington, we can be assured that they will not forget the common origin of our Western civilization; they will help

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE LUNCHEON

The American Chamber of Commerce of Berlin commemorated George Washington's birth anniversary with an appropriate luncheon on Tuesday, February 23. Former minister of finance of Prussia, Dr. Suedekum, was the speaker and Dr. Werner Feilchenfeld was guest chairman. The luncheon was held at Kempinski's, and each guest was presented with a copy of Gilbert Stuart's Athenaeum portrait of Washington.

George Wolf, president of the Chamber of Commerce, made a few remarks on the life of George Washington, and introduced the guest chairman, Dr. Feilchenfeld, and the speaker of the day, Dr. Suedekum. Dr. Suedekum had but recently returned from a visit to America, and he announced his subject as "What impressed me most in the United States."

Among the prominent guests present at the luncheon were Percival P. Baxter, former Governor of Maine; Henry C. Wright, prominent industrialist of Bath, Maine; Frederick W. King, former president of the American Chamber of Commerce of Berlin; Dr. K. O. Bertling, S. Miles Bouton, Fritz Menke, Dr. Ahrens, Arthur E. Dunning and Dr. F. Saxon.

CEREMONY IN THE REICHSTAG

The Bicentennial Celebration was continued in Berlin on March 6 when a ceremony, unparalleled in the history of Germany, was conducted in the Reichstag in the presence and under the patronage of the venerable and beloved President of the Reich, Paul von Hindenburg. Never before had the meeting place of Germany's national legislature been the scene of such a tribute to the memory of a hero of another nation; and when the "Star Spangled Banner" was played during the program it was the first time that the strains of America's national anthem had ever echoed through that historic chamber.

The program for this memorable event was presented under the auspices of the Carl Schurz Society with the cooperation of the American Institute, the German Academy, and other prominent German organizations active in the promotion of friendly relations between their country and the United States. The honorary committee for the occasion consisted of Ambassador Sackett, Chancellor Brüning, Dr. Loebe, President of the Reichstag, Dr. Sahm, Mayor of Berlin, and Dr. Rauscher, Mayor of Potsdam.

The great chamber of the Reichstag presented an impressive appearance for this unprecedented occasion. A bust of George Washington occupied a prominent place on the dais from which the president of the Reichstag usually conducts the sessions of that body, its pedestal draped in red, white and blue bunting. The flags of Germany and the United States hung side by side in the background embowered in evergreens and other foliage with which the hall was so beautifully decorated. The floor and galleries were filled with representatives of every German organization having American affiliation, of the German Government, the army and navy, as well as many other eminent citizens of Germany, the United States and other countries. So great was public interest in the program that long before the ceremonies began there was standing room only in the hall of the Reichstag.

ADDRESS OF CHANCELLOR BRUNING

Dr. Heinrich Brüning, Chancellor of the German Reich, the first speaker of the day, opened his address with a reference to the extent of the celebration which the people of the United States had inaugurated earlier in the year in honor of their first President. He pointed out that Germany had already joined America in the Bicentennial observance and referred to the Reichstag program as a "specifically German commemoration" dedicated to the great American. The presence of President von Hindenburg was cited as evidence of the desire of official Germany to share in the Bicentennial Celebration.

"Rarely will it occur that a statesman long since departed is honored by a commemorative ceremony on the part of a nation other than his own," asserted Chancellor Brüning. "Quite extraordinary reasons must there be for doing so. The object of such homage must be a historical figure of great prominence, both as a statesman and as a man, and there must be special ties of friendship between such a nation and the nation from which he sprang."

Continuing his address, the Chancellor said:

It is not incumbent upon me to give a detailed portrayal here today of the personality and achievements of the man whose name is written in indelible letters in the annals of world history. I will only outline in a few words what is, after all, throughout history the decisive factor for good to an afflicted nation; namely, the spiritual greatness of its highest leader.

For six years the struggles for America's independence went on, in which General Washington led a small, at first entirely untrained and never well equipped number against a far superior opponent. Again and again this struggle seemed so hopeless in view of the inequality of the fighting forces and ammunition that even the most courageous lost hope. Only Washington's confidence remained the same, even on the darkest days, and his indomitable will carried the fight to a victorious end. He was clear-sighted and sure of his goal in the not less difficult internal struggles for the unity of the Thirteen Colonies. Do not we present day Germans read with inner emotion of how the people then called him to be their first president at the head of the new state; how he did not refuse the call and in the face of the most difficult internal and foreign political conditions, in the midst of the most severe financial straits, steered the new state safely through all the rocks with a firm and steady hand?

"When we think of Washington," we read in the new historical work by James Truslow Adams, "we do not think of him as a commander-in-chief or as an executive or diplomat. We think of him as the man who by the mere strength of his character held a divided and torn country together until the victory and who, when peace was established, continued to hold his disunited countrymen together by their love, respect and admiration of him until a nation was welded together for permanent unity and strength."

That was the true greatness of Washington and will always be the greatness of all great rulers in history. Hold out, do not despair, is his exhortation which we still hear today. An exhortation addressed to all who are placed in a responsible position in the hard struggles for the existence of their nation. Hold out—in the face of all inimical personal attacks. Even a great statesman like Washington—as we see throughout history—was not spared inimical opposition, personal attacks and suspicion, although he was given the honorary title of "Father of his Country" even during his lifetime.

Nicholas Murray Butler writes in this connection: "Let those who are distressed at the bitterness, dishonesty and unscrupulous intrigue that accompany so many political controversies in our day, draw comfort when they read about the occurrences in the last four years of Washington's presidency. No criticism was too malicious or too violent to be directed against him, no epithet too unjustified and too base to be thrown at his head. . . . The accusation that Washington had misled and deceived the people was brought against him quite publicly and printed. He was even charged with having put on a mask of patriotism to conceal his despicable plots against the liberty of the people. Into such depths of baseness and slander can party spirit plunge human beings."

In sketching for you this picture of a time that is already 200 years gone, is it not like a description of our present-day German history?

The ties of friendship which, I hope, now permanently unite

GERMAN NEWSPAPERS OF WASHINGTON'S TIME. THIS EXHIBIT IN BERLIN OF OLD GERMAN NEWSPAPERS, CONTAINING NEWS FROM AMERICA ABOUT GEORGE WASHINGTON AND HIS ARMY DURING THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION, WAS ONE OF THE MOST INTERESTING FEATURES OF THE BICENTENNIAL CELEBRATION IN THE GERMAN CAPITAL.

the German people with the American nation, reach back to the time when the United States were welded together by George Washington. The number of Germans who fought in the ranks of the American fighters for liberty was large. About 10 per cent of the total white population of the Thirteen Colonies was of German birth, according to the computation of a prominent historian. Another historian says that the Germans constituted a particularly high percentage of those who rose up to fight for liberty. As early as half a century prior to Washington's birth Franz Daniel Pastorius with thirteen families from Krefeld had founded the first German city in the New World; namely, Germantown, Pennsylvania. Year after year more families had immigrated. It was chiefly the devastation of the Palatinate under Louis XIV and the oppression of the Rhenish countries through foreign troops which lasted for many years that had sent thousands of people from these regions across the sea. Later the chaotic conditions attendant upon the Seven Years' War had driven many Germans to emigrate to the colonies. They settled mainly in the hinterland of the colonies of New York and Pennsylvania. It was there that General Nicholas Herkimer, or Herchheimer, with 800 men from the Palatinate, constituting the local militia, gained the victory of Oriskany in 1777, which Washington is said to have designated as the first ray of light in the Revolutionary War. And it was from among Germans settled in the colony from which Washington came that most of the "Virginia Rangers" were recruited, a troop that fought throughout the whole war with great valor. Several regiments, one from Maryland, one from Pennsylvania, one from Virginia, and one from New York consisted largely of men of German origin. The same is said of a cavalry guard of the Commander-in-Chief that was led by one Major von Heer. Some of the paladins of Washington, Friederich Wilhelm von Steuben, the organizer and Inspector General of the Continental Army, the Generals von Kalb and Peter Mühlenberg; the deputy Quartermaster General Heinrich Lutterloh, were well-known historical figures of German blood; as were also Joseph Heister, Gerhard von der Wieden and Frederick Weissenfels. Also among the younger officers there were several bearers of German names. All these men of German blood fought for the independence of the United States and thus formed an imperishable tie between the new state and Germany.

What Washington thought of the Germans in America can be seen by a letter in which he thanked the German Lutheran Congregation "in and near Philadelphia," for their good wishes upon his election to the Presidency of the United States.

"I rejoice," wrote Washington, "in having so suitable an occasion to testify the reciprocity of my esteem for the numerous people whom you represent. From the excellent character for diligence, sobriety, and virtue, which the Germans in general, who are settled in America, have ever maintained; I cannot forbear felicitating myself on receiving from so respectable a number of them such strong assurances of their affection for my person, confidence in my integrity, and zeal to support me in my endeavors for promoting the welfare of our common country."

Frederic the Great's interest in the growth of the United States is particularly well known. Hardly had peace been signed between America and England than Frederic offered the young American State what it needed most for its devastated economy; namely, firm trade relations. It may be seen what a great need existed for such relations in America by the fact that the Continental Congress sent Thomas Jefferson to Europe for the purpose of concluding, together with the special delegates already present there, treaties of friendship and commerce with as many states as possible, such as had so far existed only with France, Holland and Sweden. But the American delegates met everywhere with lack of interest—even with aversion—with the sole exception of Prussia. The treaty was concluded in July and August, 1785, after negotiations which, owing to the difficulties of communication prevailing at that time, were long-drawn out; the aged king took considerable personal interest in these negotiations. It was an epoch-making state document, mainly owing to its maritime law provisions intended to safeguard private property, and was greatly approved of in America. In a letter to Lafayette, Washington said that it seemed "to constitute a new era in negotiation, and to promise . . . happy consequences."

Thus the closest relations between Germany and America have already played an important part in the history of the origin of the United States. We unite today in the spirit of this friendship, which it is our common intention to deepen and expand, with the American people in memory of their great leader. We are honoring him as a historical personality and statesman, but to us Germans it is also a matter of sentiment to celebrate the immortal memory of George Washington.

"STAR SPANGLED BANNER" SUNG IN REICHSTAG

Chancellor Brüning's address was followed by the "Star Spangled Banner," played by a double quartet of wind instruments from the "Kosleckschen Blaserbundes." The entire assemblage was invited to sing the national anthem of America, but quite naturally it was only the countrymen of George Washington for the most part who could do so. However, there were many Americans in attendance, and they gave a good account of themselves musically as they sang with thoughts of homeland uppermost in their minds. The whole scene possessed a dramatic quality perhaps not fully appreciated by those present, for, as stated above, it was the first time that the "Star Spangled Banner" had ever been heard in the great hall of the Reichstag.

United States Ambassador Frederic M. Sackett next addressed the gathering and spoke briefly of the serious purpose with which his country had undertaken the commemoration of George Washington's birth. The Government of the United States and the American people, said Ambassador Sackett, were deeply appreciative of the signal honor paid by Germany and her people in their tributes to the memory of George Washington. Following are the sentiments voiced by the Ambassador:

In the distinguished presence of the respected and venerable President of the Reich, attended by the Chancellor and Cabinet and surrounded by the foremost personalities of the Government and people, I rise in this historic chamber to bring America's greetings to the German nation.

In such a gathering I wish to express the heartfelt appreciation of my Government and our people for the signal honor which Germany pays to the United States as this nation unites in tribute to General Washington, founder, mentor and first President of the American Republic.

It is with serious purpose that the commemoration of the 200th anniversary of the birth of General Washington has been planned by the Congress of the United States. The pages of history widely proclaim the pride which all nations feel in the achievements of their departed national heroes. From the earliest times great men have struggled and sacrificed for the good of their countrymen. They have been heroes and creators of their countries' liberties. In periods of stress, through their wise counsels they have guided their countrymen to successful events from which millions have reaped and through which millions still enjoy immeasurable benefits. The names of these illustrious dead are surrounded by the halo of greatness. Their memories are preserved in the minds of men with increasing fervor in every succeeding generation.

In memory of such men monuments have been raised, cities have been named, codes of laws have been given and political systems founded, for the spiritual and material benefit of mankind. They have become in the course of ages the very epitome of the virtues of the nations to which they belonged.

These men, though simple at heart, possessed in an extraordinary degree those attributes of human character which are distinguished for grandeur, loftiness and nobleness. They surpassed their fellow citizens in their unselfish devotion to the public cause. As men of greatest mould their acts of courage and devotion counted most for the public good. They created history where they wrought and by their acts they determined the fates of their nations. Their lives have been lived for the benefit of men, and men are better because they lived.

The genius of Washington is the foundation of our national life. We derive from his virtues, from his fortitude, from the deeds of his daily life and counsels, those ideals which we call American. Our patriotism is most profoundly conjured by the name of Washington; our love of country is fostered in memory of him. The valedictory which he left to guide those who came after him, written from the fullness of his wide experience, remains a compelling influence. The widespread celebration of his birth after two hundred years is predicated on the feeling that a closer study of the man and his times, a wider diffusion of understanding of what he stood for and bequeathed, will knit yet more closely together the people of our nation composed as they are of many origins.

One has but to remember the beginnings of the American colonies, the variety of foreign peoples under the influence of their national traditions, which were settled in the original states, to understand the service he performed. He found those settlers colonists, but left them Americans. He led them into battle joined only in a common cause and denounced as rebels, but he created from them a united nation.

With the establishment of this people and the birth of its national consciousness the world achieved a new force and a new agency of civilization. The present stability rests upon that original unity which its founder established. The individual greatness of the founder has often determined the destiny of peoples. Such men have been the mentors of their peoples, and the advice which they gave at home has been heard as an inspiration and a declaration of truth abroad. They have been the arch-interpreters of national ideals and the world has honored them because they spoke simply to their own people. They not only established the nation but shaped forever, as one might say, the national character. They were accepted as leaders in those far-off years because they expressed most clearly what the youthful nation felt.

Impressive it is when, in an assembly such as this, the memory of an illustrious man is deeply revered and honored; but how much more do we stand in awe realizing that with the tide of time, as in the past so in the future, perhaps down into countless ages, the achievements of our illustrious dead will be an inspiration and emulating motive for those that follow.

The American nation was fortunate that in its beginning it found such a leader as George Washington. An outstanding characteristic of the life of Washington was his constant courage in his continuous struggle with adversity. From his earliest expeditions, pushing forward the frontier in the wilderness, through his military campaigns of the Revolutionary period, there is the record of almost continuous reverse. His indomitable will was never shaken and he rose from discouragement and defeat to the supreme heights of achievement. Perhaps more than any other that quality of determination endeared him to his contemporaries and furnished an example of persistent courage that has imprinted itself on the character of the American people.

As a leader he attracted the bolder spirits of his time from other lands. They contributed effectively to establishment in the new world of that ideal of liberty and human freedom which is the cornerstone of our national life. As this nation unites in commemoration, on the initiative of the several German societies maintaining cordial relations with the American people, I wish to acknowledge America's debt to Germany in our struggle for independence. In the fullness of our gratitude I offer a tribute to the imperishable memory of General von Steuben, Baron von Kalb—to the Mühlenbergs, father and sons, and to those other Germans who made our cause their cause and by their genius and heroism assisted in making possible the final victory of General Washington and the establishment of American freedom.

The German national air "Deutschland über Alles" was sung by the audience led by the Siemens Chorus, following the speech of the American Ambassador.

PROF. WINDELBAND'S ADDRESS

The orator of the day, Professor Wolfgang Windelband of the University of Berlin, was introduced. Professor Windelband reviewed in detail the life of George Washington and the value of the example he set for the guidance of modern statesmen. Paying high tribute to the first President of the United States, the speaker said:

Nations condemned by fate to misery and distress have always longingly turned their eyes from such an abyss toward the bright heights of important events. From the great deeds of the past, strengthening of their own energy of will may arise. They form the spur for again arousing all strength. Humanity needs history as the eternally bubbling source of the highest excitations, which make it capable of glowing devotion. Above all, it is the great personalities which act as shining examples to arouse emulation and thus, out beyond one's own rich life, to be able to come to splendid activity.

Reference has already been made by the Chancellor to the strong incentive for us Germans to celebrate the memory of George Washington. But apart from all the considerations to which he has referred, Washington's work and life must be familiar to us from the point of view that he overcame difficulties before which we ourselves stand, that he found himself faced with problems with which we are struggling. Let me therefore try, through a short and compressed survey of this infinitely rich life, to make clear the great reality which Washington's historical activity possesses for us Germans.

On the occasion of the 200th anniversary of his birth on February 22, a description of him was given in books, brochures, in countless articles, so that I may assume that the outward course of his life and the various points of his accomplishments are known.

Washington grows up as a member of a land-owning class. His first independent steps lead him in the direction which later becomes the great fundamental fact of the history of the United States in the 19th century; he follows the urge to the West, the urge to the interior of the almost unexplored, huge continent. With the years of his youth is bound up the romance of the fights with the Indians, the struggle against France, whence threatens the most serious danger to the English colonial position. Then he becomes leader in the great Revolutionary War. The nation, now free, renders him thanks for his great accomplishment at the head of the American army, by summoning him unanimously to the chair of President, and after the first term is completed, the second unanimous call follows.

His death in 1799 follows soon after his voluntary retirement at the completion of his second term of office. Thus he stands before us, and thus he appears to his own nation today as the embodiment of the national unity and freedom for which he himself struggled. In his personality everything that is purely American comes symbolically to expression. One stands amazed before this accomplishment, and this amazement increases when we understand under what great difficulties it is accomplished. Washington attained his goal against the most difficult obstacles, obstacles which arouse from without as well as within.

In the consideration of Washington's life, we have the picture of how the young nation, having become independent, takes its fate in its own hands. We have every incentive to investigate the way it became master of the resulting difficulties and dangers.

Next the difficulties which Washington faces during the war for independence. For a long time he is a general without a real army. Numerically, his army was always extraordinarily small. But also its quality was not equal to the task.

PRESIDENT WASHINGTON'S INAUGURATION RE-ENACTED IN BERLIN. THIS PHOTOGRAPH SHOWS MEMBERS OF THE AMERICAN COLONY IN THE GERMAN CAPITAL MARCHING IN THE RE-ENACTED INAUGURAL PROCESSION IN COSTUMES OF THE AMERICAN COLONIAL ARMY

The militia of the colonies were schooled in fighting with the Indians; they had to fail when faced with the regular troops of England. Especially important was the inadequacy of the people who made up the militia. Secretly these troops separated; the farmers for the most part, went home, as soon as the time was finished for which they were pledged by their home government, or when harvest work at home became too urgent.

It is a proud realization for us Germans that Washington first came into possession of a warlike instrument through the work of our countryman, Wilhelm von Steuben. The name Steuben is inseparably connected with the origin of American freedom. No one realized this more than Washington himself. For decades the regulations which Steuben drew up for the training of the soldiers, were used by the American army. In Washington and Steuben the German and American people are closely united for the first time.

In the war German blood flowed on both sides, in favor of America on the part of the German farmer, in favor of England on the part of the regiments in the pay of the English. Of these latter a large number did not return to the Old World after peace was concluded; and those who were sent out to help maintain the English control, have in this way helped appreciably to strengthen the German element over there.

The position of the commander-in-chief is thus extremely difficult and in a military sense the decision was first brought about through the interference of the allies against England. This slight development of a real American army is due in large part to the great financial need. This war was financed through inflation. The paper money issued by Congress lost value rapidly, and only too well can we understand what troubles arose for America from this inflation. All the economic and moral injuries which are so well-known to us, developed therefrom at that time.

But besides the financial stress, Washington had to meet the most fearful of all obstacles; lack of unity in his own camp. One must not think of the American struggle for freedom as the unanimous uprising of a people. Next, there exists a great party in the land, the Tories, which will not help in the break with England, and whose followers in part fought for England. But the chief hindrance was jealousy of the separate colonies toward each other. These colonies have become independent states through the separation from their motherland; they are proud of this independence and do not wish to put in the place of the English sovereignty the central authority which might be in opposition to their own interests.

I need only recall the sharp line of division between northern and southern states, puritanism, the industry and commerce of the lands of the North on the one hand and the aristocratic, agrarian, southern states which rested economically on slave labor. This antagonism was the controlling factor in all American history up to the Civil War.

Thus all these colonies feared that if a strong central authority were established, it might act in a way harmful to their own interests, and it required bitter experience to make the idea of union prevail. The battle about the constitution is again a fight for all against all, and the hatred with which it was fought still quivered in the national life after it was ended. And President Washington had to feel it. In the period of his presidency there occurs also the beginning of the two great parties, the Federalists and the Anti-Federalists. Thanks to his great authority, Washington accomplished the master feat of getting into his cabinet the two persons who opposed each other as leaders in the quarrel at the head of the two parties, the Federalist Hamilton and the Anti-Federalist Jefferson, two men of the strongest human and political individuality, neither one inclined to subordinate himself, each sustained by belief in the correctness of his own view of life, in the righteousness of his own cause.

It was not possible long to hold this union; the breach occurred even under Washington; both leaders had to leave the cabinet. But the stronger the antagonism of the parties appeared, so much the more grew Washington's position as the defender of the union. Nothing is more significant for the infinitely deep impression which he made on the political life of America, than the fact that the attempt has been made again and again to introduce new ideas the more easily by combining them with the name of Washington.

In what way was it finally possible for him to complete such a work, to attain such wonderful success? It cannot be emphasized often enough that the secret of Washington's political accomplishment lies in his humanity, in his human individuality, his character. He himself once said: "A good moral character is the first essential in a man." And that is in his case the foundation for everything else, for his military and political success. The Shakespeare saying: "He was a man," has seldom such justification as with George Washington. His quality as a man, his greatness of soul, is the most decisive thing. Not so much what he did, but how he did it, showed the ways of the future.

It is not his own initiative which drives him on, and forces him to act. The fact that the nation took him for its leader is rather to be understood through the unconscious radiation of his personality, than that he himself contributed so extraordinarily thereto. He becomes leader of the Revolutionary War, he who is of an entirely unrevolutionary nature. As long as it seemed possible, he struggled for understanding with England. There are evidences of sincere sadness on his part over the outbreak of the war which he felt as a war of brothers. He deeply regretted that the once so happy and peaceful fields of America must either be drenched with blood or inhabited by slaves; in truth, a sad alternative! But, he asked, could a man hesitate in his choice?

It became clear to him, after the battle of Bunker Hill, that an understanding had become impossible. And now he steps with full devotion to the side on which he sees the right; and you know what he accomplished as leader. But here again his strength lies not in the mastering of the purely military tasks of the general; he succeeds through the spirit which inspires him and which he knows how to transmit. The words with which he took over the office of general show, as do the similar ones on assuming the Presidency, his deep inner modesty.

He has the ability to put the right man in the right place; the real and inward dignity of his bearing make it easy for his co-workers to subordinate themselves to him. By nature he is quite charming, and occasionally this inner core of his nature breaks through. But in general he has himself astonishingly well in hand and therewith possesses one of the most important, decisive qualities of a leader. Add to that still his personal bravery and firmness under all circumstances—no wonder that another great man of that time, Napoleon, could say of him that he seemed to be no citizen of the modern world, but called to mind the most illustrious examples of antiquity. The real steadfastness with which he brought his nation out of danger was derived from his firm belief in the right and belief that Providence, that God would not let this right fail.

These are the characteristics which made victory possible for him. After he had won it, he would gladly have retired to the quiet of his Virginia country life. But again, he stepped into the foreground. From the victorious general, he becomes the statesman, the founder of the new State.

The nation needed this man with his sense of reality and unselfishness, to assure the common good. Through the medium of countless visitors, who came to Mount Vernon, through his extensive exchange of letters, he guided the voice of the nation, with all outward restraint. Thus it is again his spirit which determines everything and thus it is a matter of course that he becomes the first President. It is his spirit which is expressed especially in the fundamental provisions of the constitution, this constitution of 1787, which has constantly been justly praised as a model, as it has succeeded, in spite of the sharpest opposition and conflicting interests in giving the basis for lasting unity; this constitution which in all its provisions takes into account these antagonisms and makes compromises, in order to remove their sharpness.

Nothing is written on Washington's banner with such large letters as the idea of national unity. The fearful events during the war did not originate this conviction, but greatly strengthened it. The unity of the freed colonies is for him the hypothesis for their further progress, their further life. He wishes to leave to individuals the proper amount of independence. Washington is infinitely far from the utopia of the unified state. But he is firm in the belief that development and improvement will be possible if the separate states subordinate their individual interests in all great decisive vital questions to the common good. How much he considers the strong central power absolutely necessary is best shown by the fact that he who indignantly thrust the crown from him, discussed in detail with the real father of the constitution, James Madison, the question whether in the interest of the existence of a strong central power the introduction of a monarchy should be considered.

Washington constantly meets two enemies in his fight for national unity; the particularism of the separate states and party spirit. His warnings against particularism which might finally become a danger to union, come from a deeply bitter heart, like the words which Bismarck in a similar sense laid down for Germany in the "Thoughts and Recollections."

Near to despair, Washington asserts that the work is not complete after victory, but that now the first real danger arises through particularism. In 1786 he wrote that America's individuality as a nation was threatened with disappearing if a change did not occur soon. Again he speaks warningly against the "fatal policy" of the states keeping their most capable men to themselves, saying that it was foolish to try to set in order the smallest part of the clock before the great spring which keeps the whole in motion was itself in order. Besides this there was his great struggle against what he considered the other enemy of union, party spirit.

It was Washington's principle in action to avoid everything which might loosen party passion. Also from this point of view he advocated tolerance to an extent which was by no means generally shared at that time. For the sake of unity, it happened that Washington after the expiration of his first term as President again overcame his need for rest and again put himself at the disposal of the nation. His feeling of duty conquered his personal wishes. He recognized how only his remaining could bring a period of quiet to the young State, which it needed in order to grow internally. So he remained in office.

And finally it is essentially the same point of view of avoiding all danger for the young union as much as possible, which led him to the principle of the separation of America from the European system of states which found expression in the famous farewell address of 1796. From the political union with the states of the old world, Washington feared the rekindling of the internal antagonisms which had been overcome with difficulty. He was warned by experience of the way in which the question whether America was to go into the field with the revolutionary France again against England, exerted a distinctive influence on the political life, and by the way in which, kindled by the French envoys, the domestic antagonisms and passions at once awoke to a dangerous extent and caused the battle of parties and associations to assume the utmost animosity. Therefore the exhortation, which up to today with few, even though fateful exceptions, stands as a shining star over the whole foreign policy of the United States, whose effect we feel so distinctly in the policy of our day.

Hot were the battles in which the President fought for his life's goal. He was not spared attacks by his opponents in most unspeakable, unworthy and unseemly form. To these he expressed his principle: "To persist is duty and to be silent is the best answer to slander." History has proved him right; it has shown how little the accusations made against Washington in the heat of the battle of the day reached him. The deeper we sink into his personality, the more clearly we understand how only this man could carry through his policy in the time of need, or distraction. The suggestive strength which went out from him, brought about the carrying out of his ideal. The union was preserved and therefore the people of the United States, led by George Washington found the strength, in spite of all the differences in blood which flows in its population, to grow together into a nation. With pride the Americans may speak of their state as of the "melting pot," in which all the antagonisms flow and unite themselves to a national union. It is the faithful continuation of the work of Washington which has produced this wonderful character.

Unity, the standing-together of the nation, not sinking into party spirit, thus sounds Washington's ideal. Think of the adjurations which Bismarck addressed to the Germans, to see in another German first a fellow-countryman and then a partisan. And think of the most stirring of his many speeches, in which he made the party spirit responsible before God and history if the whole splendid work of 1866 and 1870 again collapsed. Here in this call to union flow together the lines from Washington and Bismarck. In no way can we more truly serve the memory of these two great men, than by making it our duty, when it is a question of the life of the nation, of not letting party consideration arise. In the spirit of Bismarck, as of Washington, let us sound the exhortation to unity. It is up to us to keep the flame of this spirit; it will be our responsibility whether our nation can experience again its blessing strength.

COMMISSION'S MESSAGE READ

During the ceremony in the Reichstag the following cabled message of appreciation from Hon. Sol Bloom, Director of the United States George

"GEORGE WASHINGTON TAKES THE OATH OF OFFICE" IN BERLIN. SCENE FROM THE RE-ENACTED INAUGURATION OF THE FIRST PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES. THE PART OF WASHINGTON WAS TAKEN BY CONSUL RAYMOND H. GEIST. THE STAGE IS A REPRODUCTION OF OLD FEDERAL HALL IN NEW YORK CITY.

Washington Bicentennial Commission, was read and translated into German by Dr. Hans Draeger, President of the Carl Schurz Society:

WHILE THE PEOPLE OF THE UNITED STATES ARE HONORING THE MEMORY OF GEORGE WASHINGTON, IT IS MOST GRATIFYING TO KNOW THAT HIS MEMORY IS ALSO BEING HONORED BY THE PEOPLE OF GERMANY. ON BEHALF OF THE AMERICAN PEOPLE AND THE UNITED STATES GEORGE WASHINGTON BICENTENNIAL COMMISSION PERMIT ME TO EXPRESS SINCERE APPRECIATION OF THE HOMAGE YOU ARE RENDERING TO THE FOUNDER OF THE AMERICAN REPUBLIC. IT IS SPECIALLY PLEASING AT THIS TIME TO MENTION THAT A CELEBRATION IN HONOR OF YOUR WORLD-RENOWNED CITIZEN AND POET GOETHE IS TO BE HELD IN THE CITY OF WASHINGTON.

The next commemorative event in Berlin in connection with the Bicentennial Celebration was a pageant presented at the Hotel Esplanade on April 30, the anniversary of the inauguration of George Washington in 1789 as the first President of the United States. The pageant, a colorful and highly successful affair, was presented by the Committee on Women's Organizations and Children's Activities, a sub-committee of the George Washington Bicentennial Committee in charge of the celebration in Germany.

Conforming as nearly as possible to the known facts of the Washington inaugural, the Committee erected a duplicate of the front of Federal Hall in New York City where the first President took the oath of office. All the participants in the original ceremony, including George Clinton, Governor, and Robert R. Livingston, Chancellor of the State of New York, the latter being the official who administered the oath of office; John Adams, the newly elected Vice President of the United States; and such eminent spectators as Baron von Steuben, Roger Sherman, Samuel Otis, Secretary of the Senate, General Henry Knox, and Governor Arthur St. Clair, were impersonated in the commemorative pageant. Each was garbed in the dress of the American Colonial period, and the faithful re-enactment of Washington's induction into office and the Inaugural Ball and reception which followed, proved to be one of the most impressive of the Bicentennial events in Berlin.

The pageant was witnessed by more than three hundred persons including Ambassador and Mrs. Sackett, Consul Raymond H. Geist, eminent German and other friends, and the majority of the American colony in Germany's Capital City. A supper and dance in the ballroom of the hotel concluded the festivities of the evening.

Advising the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission of the program, Dr. Wirth wrote on May 4, 1932:

Particular praise is to be accorded the American Women's Club of Berlin for the care bestowed upon the whole event and the unqualified success which it had. Local newspapers have given the event considerable publicity and were unstinted in their praise.

Bicentennial events were planned by the committee for May and June, but because of the general political and economic situation in Germany at that time it was deemed advisable by those in charge to postpone the celebrations. One of these proposed events was a pilgrimage to Potsdam, the birthplace of Baron von Steuben, which, unfortunately, had to be abandoned entirely.

BERLIN CELEBRATES JULY FOURTH

In an excellently arranged dinner dance at the Adlon, one of Berlin's leading hotels, the next bicentennial function occurred on July 4, under the auspices of the American Club of Berlin. Nearly the entire American colony in Germany's Capital City assembled on this occasion to celebrate the 156th anniversary of America's Declaration of Independence, and to honor the memory of the man who devoted his life to the establishment of the principles therein enunciated. It was a George Washington program from start to finish, and a striking bust of the Father of his Country, draped in the red, white, and blue, looked out over the gathering at the banquet tables. It seemed almost to embody the spirit and personality of the immortal Chieftain and to suggest his presence at the festivities dedicated to his memory.

Flags of the German Reich, draped side by side throughout the hall with Old Glory, attested to the friendship and cordial relations existing between the two great republics, while beautifully colored lights and lanterns diffused a mellow glow over all. At the tables were seated the many Americans and their German friends who had gathered to commemorate the beginning of America's freedom and the birth of her first President.

Guests of honor on this occasion included Dr. Fuehr of the German Foreign Office, and Mrs. Fuehr; Carl von Buelow, Counselor of Legation of the German Foreign Office, and Mrs. von Buelow; Dr. Hermann Davidsen, and Mrs. Davidsen; Count Tattenbach, and Countess Tattenbach. Both of the last named gentlemen were also of the German Foreign Office. In addition to these there were many other prominent Germans and other nationals in attendance.

United States Ambassador Frederic M. Sackett, and Mrs. Sackett; United States Consul Raymond H. Geist; Counsellor George Gordon of the American Embassy in Berlin, and Frederick W. King, honorary president of the American Chamber of Commerce in Germany were also among the guests of honor. Dr. Frederick Wirth, Jr., president of the American Club of Berlin and chairman of the George Washington Bicentennial Committee for Germany, presided over the assemblage.

TOASTS TO PRESIDENTS

Toasts to the President of the United States and the President of the German Reich were proposed by Dr. Wirth to open the program, and the orchestra continued by playing the "Star Spangled Banner" and the German national anthem, "Deutschland über Alles." The banquet then proceeded to its close when Dr. Wirth introduced the second part of the program by speaking briefly of the significance of the occasion and the reason for commemorating at that time the two anniversaries of America's independence and the birth of George Washington. Referring specifically to the human rights principles which had been written into the Declaration of Independence, Dr. Wirth stated that that document was capable of inspiring in the hearts of mankind "that combined spirit of faith, of hope, and of sympathy and, perhaps, an additional element which is sorely needed at present—courage." United States Consul Raymond H. Geist was then introduced to read the Declaration of Independence to "a very attentive audience." Commenting on this part of the program, Dr. Wirth stated that many of the German guests took the trouble of advising him later that it was the first time they had had the opportunity of becoming acquainted with the historic document. A number of them expressed the intention of obtaining copies of it for future study and consideration.

A toast was then proposed to Ambassador and Mrs. Sackett, "which the guests," stated Dr. Wirth, "were prompt to take up with great enthusiasm and applause while the orchestra played the American national anthem." Ambassador Sackett responded informally to the toast, and his few but delightful remarks were received with hearty applause. Dancing then commenced and the remainder of the evening was spent in that diversion. The entire event proved to be of great interest, and the general comment was that it formed a fitting part of the Bicentennial festivities in Berlin.

Earlier in the day Americans in the German Capital City conducted a golf tournament at the Wannsee Golf Club. Perfect weather prevailed to make this a most enjoyable feature of the Fourth of July festivities.

OLD NEWSPAPERS EXHIBITED

A very interesting feature of the Bicentennial Celebration in Berlin was the display in the Hotel Esplanade of 18th century German newspapers carrying dispatches relating to George Washington and the progress of the Revolutionary War in America. The display was arranged by the Bicentennial Celebration Committee of Berlin through the courtesy of Alfred Kröger, owner of the newspapers, and considerable attention was attracted by it. All the papers on exhibit are issues of the LEIPZIGER ZEITUNG, formerly the official gazette of the City of Leipzig.

One of the surprising and most striking facts relating to the accounts printed in these newspapers was the degree of accuracy with which they were written. Misinformation is contained in many of them, quite naturally; but considering the difficulty with which any dispatch could be verified at that time, most of the items in the old gazettes are remarkably near the truth.

The earliest dispatch in the collection was dated June 7, 1774, and told of the British government's dismissal of Benjamin Franklin from the postal service of the colonies. The Boston Tea Party was described as one of the forerunners of America's demand for independence, and it was noted that the entire American populace appeared united in the determination to win freedom or die in the attempt. Other dispatches followed the progress of the war, and frequent mention was made of the pitiful plight of the American army. One story, coming from London on August 5, 1777, told of the complete defeat of General Washington, and stated that the American commander himself had died of wounds suffered in battle. The ZEITUNG did not believe this report, however, and asked its readers to await confirmation before giving it credence.

Another dispatch from London, printed March 1, 1781, claimed that the American General Greene had been defeated and that Washington, in discouragement, had submitted terms for his own surrender to the British commander. The following week the paper said that mutiny had broken out among Washington's soldiers, but that when Clinton had sent emissaries asking them to join the British army, the Britons had promptly been turned over to Congress as spies. The slowness with which even the most important news was transmitted at that time is shown by the fact that it was not until December 6, 1781, that the paper was able to print the details of the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown. Even as late as May, 1782, the paper said that the results of Yorktown were not fully realized in England; that despite America's demand for recognition of her independence, Great Britain still was hoping to avert the complete loss of her colonies.

The final edition of the LEIPZIGER ZEITUNG appearing in the exhibit, dated February 16, 1800, told of the death of George Washington and the national sorrow occasioned in America by that mournful event. An appended note stated that the building of the City of Washington had advanced so far that Congress would soon be able to convene there.

CLOSING CELEBRATION IN BERLIN

The Bicentennial Celebration in Berlin was brought to an official close on Thanksgiving Day, November 24, 1932, in a typically American Thanksgiving dinner and dance at the Hotel Esplanade under the auspices of the American Club of Berlin. Among the prominent guests in attendance were Ambassador and Mrs. Frederic M. Sackett, who had returned to Berlin only a few days before from a trip to the United States; Dr. Drechsler of the German Foreign Office; George A. Gordon, counselor of the American Embassy; George S. Messersmith, United States Consul General; Lieut. Col. Jacob W. S. Wuest, American Military Attaché; Capt. Kenneth G. Castleman, American Naval Attaché; Dr. Norlin, Roosevelt Exchange Professor then lecturing at the University of Berlin, in addition to many eminent representatives of American commercial concerns in Berlin and others.

The most informal spirit prevailed during the entire celebration, which was said to be one of the finest of its kind ever witnessed in the German Capital. The guests entered into the spirit of the occasion, and everyone seemed to enjoy the Thanksgiving menu which included roast turkey and cranberry sauce, pumpkin pie, and ice cream.

With an excellent bust of George Washington prominently displayed on a flag-draped pedestal, and with flags of Germany and the United States hanging side by side throughout the halls, the magnificent ball rooms of the Hotel Esplanade presented a colorful and most attractive appearance for the closing celebration of the Bicentennial Year in Berlin. Toasts were given to the welfare of the people of Germany and America and their leaders; all the remarks made at the dinner were entirely of an informal nature. About 250 persons attended the banquet while many more came in later for the dance which commenced immediately afterwards. The Americans were joined in the celebration by a great number of Germans and friends from other countries.

A fitting part of the closing ceremonies was the reading of the original Presidential Thanksgiving Day Proclamation, issued by George Washington in 1789, in the American Church of Berlin on the Sunday preceding Thanksgiving Day.

Writing Director Sol Bloom of the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission of the final celebration, Dr. Frederick Wirth, chairman of the Bicentennial Committee of Germany, said:

I am taking this opportunity of thanking you personally, as well as your staff, for your kind, whole-hearted and admirable assistance and cooperation. Without such cooperation we do not believe we would have been able to carry on as well as we did. In fact, without your Commission's encouragement in the first place, the needed incentive would not have been present.

BREMEN CELEBRATES THE BICENTENNIAL

Under the auspices of the officials of the Bremen Free State and the City of Bremen, a program was presented in the Rathaus (city hall) on February 22, 1932, in commemoration of the anniversary of George Washington's birth, which was considered by the BREMER NACHRICHTEN, leading newspaper of the city, as "an extraordinarily worthy and impressive affair." Later in the same evening, members of the American colony in Bremen, numbering 31, were hosts to nearly a hundred of the leading officials and citizens of the state and city at a banquet given in Hillman's Hotel to commemorate the important anniversary. Both events were among the most memorable occasions of the kind ever witnessed in the city, and many complimentary articles appeared in the press regarding them.

Among the many close ties existing between Bremen and the United States, not the least significant and interesting is the one formed on June 19, 1847, when the first mail steamer connection between Continental Europe and America was established. Appropriately enough, the vessel making the epochal trip with mail consigned to Europe was the American steamer, Washington. Since that time Bremen has become the second largest port in Germany, and is today the seat of one of the largest passenger steamship lines operating between Europe and the United States.

The Two Hundredth Anniversary of George Washington's Birth was therefore an occasion of importance not only to Americans in Bremen but to the residents of the city as well. United States Consul W. A. Leonard, in a communication to the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission dated February 24, 1932, wrote that "the two celebrations were impressive and showed a friendly spirit, giving the impression that the officials of the Bremen Free State, as well as other leading citizens, were glad of the opportunity to recount their close commercial and shipping relations with the United States, and also of the opportunity to renew their expression of friendship for the American people."

SENATORS ATTEND CELEBRATION

The celebration in the city hall was attended by members of the Bremen Senate, members of the House of Burgesses, consular representatives in Bremen, leading residents of the city, and the American colony almost in a body. Before this distinguished audience the program opened with the overture "Christopher Columbus" by Wagner, which was played by the Bremen City Orchestra under the direction of Kapellmeister Dr. Weiss. Brief introductory remarks were then made by Mayor Dr. Donandt who at the same time introduced the speaker of the day, Dr. Schecker.

Dr. Schecker, a leading educator of Bremen, spoke at length on the historic relations between Bremen and the United States, pointing out that the first American Consul to the city was appointed by George Washington. The development of Bremen into one of the leading seaports of Europe was outlined, and the important part played by the city as a port of emigration for great numbers of those who left Germany to become citizens of the United States were interesting facts developed by the speaker.

Educators and students of Bremen had always been eager to learn of the United States, said Dr. Schecker, and Bremen historians had written much concerning the American people. The works of Wilhelm Kiesselbach, called the "American Federalist," which dealt with the history and culture of the United States; the educator, Adam Storck, who defended the United States against the calumnies of a poorly informed enemy; and of George Kohl whose scientific investigations in America earned for him an honorary doctor's degree from the University of Boston, were referred to as evidence of the deep interest which has ever prevailed in Bremen in matters connected with the United States.

Many tributes to the character, the integrity and the foresight of George Washington were interspersed throughout the Doctor's speech, and the discourse was ended with the poetic greeting to America carried by the steamship Bremen on her maiden voyage:

Germany's most German stream
Bears Germany's mightiest ship
To the sea spanning the world.
Travel with fleet wind
Happily on sure keel
To the Western World.
Bear with the name of the city
Bremen's banner and honor
Joyfully from port to port.
Starry banner at the bow,
United with Germany's flag,
Greet America's people!

At the conclusion of the impressive speech the Bremen City Orchestra played the "Star Spangled Banner," while the audience stood in respectful silence and Mendelssohn-Bartholdy's "Meerestille und glückliche Fahrt," was played by the orchestra to bring the celebration to a close.

CONSUL PRESIDES AT BANQUET

Consul Leonard presided at the banquet which was given that evening at Hillman's Hotel and welcomed the guests in a few remarks outlining the purpose of the function. The Two Hundredth Anniversary of Washington's Birth was being celebrated throughout the world wherever Americans were residing, stated Mr. Leonard. It was a tribute to Washington's international character that friends of America were joining in these commemorative programs, and the Consul expressed his own and his country's appreciation for the friendly spirit manifested, especially in Bremen. He then proposed a toast to General von Hindenburg, President of the German Reich, which was taken up with enthusiasm by the assemblage.

Senator Apelt, senior member of the Bremen Senate, responded to the remarks of Consul Leonard by expressing his appreciation for the opportunity of speaking of the friendly relations which had existed so long between Bremen and the United States. These he reviewed ably and in an interesting manner. The Senator spoke of the strength of character of George Washington and the worthy example he had set for all who came after him to follow. The close relations existing between Bremen and the United States occasioned only the greatest pride in the hearts of the people of Bremen, and Senator Apelt expressed his sincere hope that such happy relations would continue always to exist. He closed his remarks by proposing a toast to the President of the United States which the guests drank with the same enthusiasm they had shown in the previous toast.

In recognition of the occasion, the North German Lloyd, principal passenger steamship line of the city, ordered that all its buildings and ships be decorated with the colors of the United States. In show windows of the company's buildings were special displays featuring the Bicentennial Celebration and depicting the development of the long and friendly relations between the firm and the country George Washington helped to found.

The American committee in charge of the banquet in Bremen consisted of Consul W. A. Leonard, chairman; Henry B. Parker, Edwin A. Dinnsen, and Sterling Wood. Owing to the general economic conditions prevailing throughout the year and the absence from the city of many of the American colony, it was deemed unwise by the committee to attempt further celebrations. However, those which took place on Washington's birthday were of such an impressive nature and so widely heralded in the press as to be among the most memorable ever held in Bremen in honor of a foreign hero.

THE CITY OF Breslau COOPERATES

The extent of bicentennial observances in Breslau may best be shown by quoting from the report of United States Consul Robert R. Bradford who wrote "that owing to the limited number of persons making up the American colony in Breslau the local commemorative events have perforce been of a simple character."

The first of the events was a tea given on February 21 by Consul Bradford to the members of the American colony and German friends. The tea was well attended and as a commemorative event made a fine impression on the people of Breslau.

As another bicentennial feature, Dr. Carl Wittke of the Ohio State University was invited to lecture on March 3. The invitation was extended by the Lower Silesian Group of the German Academy, the University of Breslau, the Technical High School, and the Silesian Society for Native Culture. Dr. Wittke's lecture on George Washington was given under the auspices of these organizations.

Despite the fact that a political speech was given in the city the same night by a prominent German, the lecture was well attended by representative people of Breslau. Much favorable comment on it and the occasion it commemorated was received from the German people.

COLOGNE HOLDS BANQUET

An unusual means of honoring the memory of George Washington was chosen by the American colony of Cologne when, after a banquet commemorating his two hundredth birthday, the sum remaining from the money taken in to pay the expenses of the dinner was contributed to a Cologne agency for the relief of the poor. This action on the part of the Cologne Bicentennial Committee was greatly appreciated by the people of that city and attracted much favorable comment.

The Bicentennial banquet took place on February 22, 1932, at the Hotel Excelsior in Cologne. It was attended by more than 100 people, including important officials and leading persons in banking, industrial, and other circles. The Mayor of Cologne and his wife, Dr. and Mrs. Konrad Adenauer, were the chief guests of honor.

After toasts had been given the President of Germany and the President of the United States the American Consul, George L. Brandt, made the following brief remarks:

We have met here to commemorate an occasion which had the greatest of significance to us as a nation, the birth two hundred years ago today of one who deserves to live ever in our memory as the Father of our Country. As a gathering of Americans for that purpose we associate ourselves with similar gatherings everywhere in the world tonight where there are Americans, meeting to honor and revere the name of Washington, under the leadership of the committee appointed by Act of Congress with our President as chairman.

In this commemoration of Washington's birthday we have the gracious assistance of our friends here present with us as our guests, and to them we extend a most hearty welcome coupled with our grateful thanks for their attendance. We do not forget the share the countries they represent have had in making the United States a nation. To those of the fair land of Germany in which we are pleasantly residing, we particularly wish to say that we do not forget their countryman, the Baron von Steuben, who came to us when our fortunes in our difference with the mother country were at a low ebb, and with high efficiency and with unselfish regard for our cause, gave to our troops a military knowledge they needed. Neither do we forget the other great contributions Germany has made to the progress of the United States through the intelligence, skill, courage, industry, honesty and thrift of the German people who came to the United States to make up an important part of our nation.

Further, as your country's representative here and as chairman of the committee which has arranged this ceremony, let me thank you one and all sincerely for your generous response to the invitation that has brought you here tonight.

Soon we are to have the great privilege of hearing an address on Washington by one who is eminently qualified and has graciously consented to deliver it. I propose therefore simply to acknowledge here for our community, with the rest of the people, the great debt we owe to Washington. First in war as the military leader who brought us safely through many troubles to the peace from which there came the United States of America. First in that peace as President of those new United States who conducted us safely through a nation's birth throes. Therefore is he first in the hearts of his countrymen. May we never forget and may our private and public lives ever reflect our appreciation of his private and public virtues.

UNIVERSITY HEAD SPEAKS

Following the toast to George Washington which was here proposed by Consul Brandt, Dr. Kuske, rector of the University of Cologne, was introduced as the principal speaker of the evening. Dr. Kuske emphasized especially the qualities which made George Washington great as a leader and pointed out the significance and practical value of America's adoption of a democratic constitution. He further stated that a great leader could best develop his own virtues from the democratic and liberal consciousness of his people.

Dr. Kuske's address was received with demonstrations of approval by his listeners and was favorably commented on in the press of Cologne and other cities.

Washington's birthday was not allowed to pass unnoticed by the American school in Cologne. Boasting an enrollment of only six pupils, a program was nevertheless arranged by the children and their teacher, to which the parents were invited. This program was featured by the presentation of a silk American flag, the gift of P. M. Reinartz of the Armco Iron Co., and chairman of the school board. The presentation was made by the American consul. A reproduction of the well-known Athenaeum portrait of George Washington by Gilbert Stuart, supplied by the United States Bicentennial Commission, was framed and also presented to the school by Mr. Brandt.

A commemorative religious service was held in the Anglo-American Church in Cologne under the supervision of Major Collard, lay-reader of the church. The service was well attended by members of the American colony and residents of Cologne. Both the United States Consul, Mr. Brandt, and Mr. Reinartz took part in the program by reading lessons referring to George Washington.

ELABORATE EXERCISES HELD IN DRESDEN

It was not enough for the people of the Free State of Saxony and the City of Dresden, its capital, to show their esteem and admiration of George Washington in only one celebration inaugurating the year-long commemoration of his birth; it took a whole week, known as "George Washington Week," for them to get the great celebration under way. And so sincerely did the people enter into the spirit of the occasion that long-time residents of Dresden unhesitatingly declared it to be one of the most memorable events ever witnessed in the city.

The opening program of this George Washington Week, which was in many respects the most significant because of the fact that it was presented entirely by the German people themselves under the auspices of the governments of the Free State of Saxony and the City of Dresden, took place in the new city hall in Dresden on Sunday morning, February 21, 1932. Interest in the program was widespread, and the hall was filled to capacity, while many hundreds of people who sought admission had to be turned away for lack of room. Other features of this series were a banquet and program under the auspices of an American Bicentennial Committee, headed by the United States Consul General, A. T. Haeberle; a patriotic service in the American Church of St. John and a tea in the rectory of the church; a patriotic performance in honor of George Washington presented by the management of the Albert Theater, and a program under the auspices of the Humboldt Club of Dresden.

Mr. Haeberle, according to his very interesting account of the events leading up to the celebration, had appointed a committee consisting of himself and the following other Americans: Dr. Oliver H. Budge, president of the German-Austrian Mission of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints; Dr. Robert McBride, a resident of Dresden for thirty years; Rev. Edward M. Bruce, rector of the American Church of St. John, and Professor Henry P. Spring. Despite the handicaps of an extremely small American colony and the universal economic depression, this committee immediately set to work on plans for a celebration which should do justice to the occasion. It was at this point, Consul General Haeberle reported, that he was invited by the Lord Mayor of Dresden, Dr. Wilhelm Külz, to attend a meeting which had been called to discuss plans for a Dresden commemoration of George Washington's birth. He added:

I thought Dr. Külz had in mind a joint celebration of Germans and Americans as was the case in other cities of Germany. I was, therefore, surprised to learn that the Saxon Government and the City of Dresden, with the cooperation of the State Opera and University, which were also represented at the meeting, had planned a celebration of their own in honor of our country.

Thus the State of Saxony and the City of Dresden arranged at their own instigation a splendid celebration in honor of George Washington which took place in the beautiful Assembly Room of the new City Hall, and unusual interest was manifested by the residents of Dresden in it. This commemorative celebration was one of the most impressive I have ever attended, because of its dignified character and simple but artistic decorations.

FRIENDLY FEELING FOR AMERICANS

Much of the interest thus shown in the Bicentennial Celebration Mr. Haeberle ascribed to the fact that Dresden was formerly the abode of numerous Americans which occasioned a very friendly feeling toward the citizens of the United States. Another factor, said Mr. Haeberle, was the fact that Dr. Külz, Mayor of Dresden, had travelled extensively in many lands, and knew how to manifest "in a befitting manner his friendship for other countries."

The celebration was first planned for the evening of February 22, but the date was later changed to Sunday morning, February 21, in order to lend greater dignity to the occasion in accordance with the German point of view. All the members of the American colony, government officials, the faculty of the University of Dresden and other prominent people including those who had special connections with the United States, were invited. As indicated in the excerpt from the Consul General's report quoted above, the interest in the celebration was so great that the hall in which it was held would not seat all those who applied for admission.

The meeting in the City Hall was both dignified and honored by the presence of Dr. Walther Schieck, Minister President of the State of Saxony, who delivered the opening speech. Briefly stating the purpose of the gathering, the President said that George Washington's greatness of character made him a man who belonged not only to the United States but to the rest of the world as well. Washington's sense of moral responsibility the President held to exceed in importance even his service as warrior and statesman. That Washington received the gratitude and love of his people in an ever increasing degree, President Schieck pointed out, was evidence of his nobility of soul. The English version of the address follows:

We have met today to honor the memory of one of the truly great men in the history of mankind. We are not prompted only by our feeling of friendship for the people of the United States in thus celebrating the memory of its national hero. Personalities of the dimensions of a George Washington are the property of the entire world.

History knows but few creations of statesmanship, which have been the work of a single man, such as was the founding of the United States of America. By dint of many years of labor in war and peace, Washington created a national union virtually out of nothing, a union which in the course of a century and a half has developed into one of the most magnificent commonwealths that the world has known. That this commonwealth should come into existence was by no means a foregone conclusion. The genius that was Washington cannot be separated from the fate of the thirteen young colonies. In Germany we experienced almost simultaneously the creative force which can emanate from a general and statesman who knows how to be the man of the hour at the critical juncture of his nation's history. A peculiar constellation of fate has willed it that out of the school of Frederick the Great should come that master strategist Baron von Steuben to weld the army of George Washington into an instrument of great power. Thus he became one of the countless Germans who have contributed to the building of a new nation and a new home for themselves.

When we inquire what it is that enables a statesman to perform so great a creative act which endures through the centuries, we must admit that it is the great moral power of a monumental personality more than all strategic acumen or statesmanship that is at work. Historical research which has sought to lift the veil from the legendary portrait of George Washington reveals to us an unselfish, utterly self-disciplined man whose lifework is a continual sacrifice for the good of his people. His great modesty, which is an earmark of true greatness, his nobility of soul and his great tactfulness cast their spell over all who deal with the life of George Washington. He received in richest measure the most beautiful reward that one may receive: the gratitude and love of his people is his lot to this day on an ever ascending scale.

We congratulate today the people of America that they were given in George Washington a builder of nations of whom Congress was able to say when he died:

The First in War
The First in Peace and
The First in the hearts of his countrymen.

MAYOR KÜLZ SPEAKS ON WASHINGTON

Following President Schieck on the program came Dr. Wilhelm Külz, Lord Mayor of Dresden. Dr. Külz displayed a keen understanding of George Washington's character and the significance of friendly German-American relations. The Mayor mentioned an interesting incident which had occurred more than two hundred years before in Dresden, showing that the facilities of that time afforded but slight opportunity to obtain accurate knowledge of America. The large numbers of Germans who had emigrated to the United States to minge their blood with that of Americans, were referred to as a factor in the creation of the close bond existing between the two countries. George Washington's cordial relations with Baron von Steuben were mentioned, and the famous German general was aptly referred to as the godfather of the United States "at the baptismal ceremony of the infant nation."

The translation of Dr. Külz's speech follows:

It is an illustrious gathering that I have the honor of welcoming today in this festive auditorium of our City Hall. This is the day which we dedicate to the honored memory of George Washington, the creator of the United States, upon whom history for the first time bestowed the unpretentious yet illustrious title: "President of the United States."

American citizens and friends of the United States are joining with official Dresden to celebrate the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington—a moment of historical significance no less for the city of Dresden.

Who would have thought such a celebration possible two hundred years ago? It was precious little that was known in those days concerning that great colony across the seas, which George Washington welded into a nation. Very little outside of romantic tales dealing with Indians had reached the ear of the inhabitants of our city. A Dresden diplomat in the year 1722 relates that two royal American princes, twenty and twenty-four years old respectively, had arrived in Dresden and that an English ship captain was leading them around as prisoners and displaying them for money. They went about in long green cloaks ornamented with silver. They were full-chested and their bodies and faces were tattooed with emblems of the sun, pictures of dragons and snakes. They had taken their lodging at the inn called "Krone." They absorbed a modicum of education and were baptized into the Protestant Church. On February 6, 1725, Augustus the Strong bought them for his royal suite and afterwards made a present of them to the Empress of Russia.

Fifty years later we have a similar picture showing the reverse of the medal. The ruler of Hessen-Cassel sells 12,000 subjects and the ruler of Braunschweig 4,300 subjects to the British to fight in the American War of Independence. Similar transactions were made by the rulers of Waldeck and Ansbach. Among them are Deume of Saxony and the then unknown lieutenant Neidhardt von Gneisenau of Ansbach. On the other hand, as chief actor of German birth, Baron von Steuben enters the great drama of American liberation. He drills American farmer boys, transforming them into a sort of Prussian soldiery in the manner of Frederick the Great, thereby becoming one of the chief supporters of Washington in his battle for freedom. "It is my greatest ambition," he writes George Washington, "to be of service to your country so far as it lies in my power and to earn for myself through participation in your great struggle for independence the title of American citizen." Thus a German general became godfather, even as George Washington was the father, at the baptismal ceremony of the infant nation.

Millions from that time on emigrated from Germany to the sweet land of liberty and much German blood mingled with that of the newly born nation. Thus quite naturally a reciprocal interest has developed from this bond, and for this reason the German people sincerely participate in this memorial occasion. The City of Dresden is anxious to do its part and remembers with gratitude that thousands of American citizens have in the course of time made this city their home. Dresden remembers gratefully how America's official representatives, now under the leadership of Consul General A. T. Haeberle, have fostered the friendly relations between the two nations. And when we today, as a token of national good will towards the United States, name a street after George Washington, we do so because as Germans we are able to recognize greatness and also great men of other nations.

By a resolution which Henry Lee presented in the House of Representatives in Philadelphia, of which President Schieck has already reminded us, George Washington was designated as the First in War, the First in Peace and the First in the Hearts of his Countrymen. We Germans know how to appreciate what such a personality means to a people inasmuch as a kindly fate has given us also in difficult times such a man. The President of the United States of America, John Adams, a successor to George Washington, said in his address in the Senate: "His example is now complete, and it will teach wisdom and virtue to magistrates, citizens, and men, not only in the present age, but in future generations, as long as our history shall be read." The historical events, in the center of which stands George Washington, have taught us the value of such a man who in emergency displays energetic leadership and who can say: "My life I give to the service of my country."

May this celebration deepen our mutual friendship. Surely the word of Moltke applies here: "Only in its own strength lies the fate of a nation." However much a really great people will always recognize without envy the great qualities of another, it is always national consciousness which gives birth to such thought and action as lead to positive achievement. But with the development of mankind, common interests and the points of contact in international relations multiply, it is the duty of national politics to foster international relations. Two great people, such as the people of the United States and of Germany, united by the bond of friendship, will in time contribute much of value for mutual benefit and for the welfare of mankind. That the City of Dresden may remain such a center of reciprocal friendship is the earnest wish which inspires us today.

HELD IN UNIVERSAL ESTEEM

Consul General Haeberle next addressed the audience, speaking briefly of the universal esteem in which the character of George Washington is held. He pointed to the continued reverence for the great man which prevailed in the hearts of his countrymen everywhere, and paid high tribute to the military ability of Baron von Steuben, who played such an important part in the American War for Independence. Expressing the gratitude which every American must feel for the evidences of friendship shown in the Dresden celebration, Mr. Haeberle said that this friendship dated from the "turbulent days when German and American officers fought jointly in pursuit of a high ideal." The Consul General's address was delivered in German, and the following is a translation of it:

It is not as paradoxical as it might appear if on this memorable occasion in honor of the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington I recall to memory the sad day in 1799 when George Washington departed from his earthly battlefield. That eventful day cast its shadow throughout the length and breadth of the land. The sad news of Washington's death spread with astonishing rapidity notwithstanding the primitive conditions and meagre facilities of communication of that day. The bells, which resounded throughout the land, were tolled to the accompaniment of sincerest mourning as an expression of the deep love of the people whom he had welded into national unity. The flag which he created and which during his presidency had been hoisted for the first time over our land, was drooping at half mast. It proclaimed not only the sorrow of a people, but also the deep reverence and recognition on the part of those who during his lifetime had been his political opponents and who had often enhanced the burden of his most arduous battles. These manifestations of mourning—the bells and the flags—were not merely official in character; rather did they testify to the first great sorrow of a young nation over the loss of its great warrior, over its first great President.

Washington's death also revealed—and this is the lot of great men only—that when the eyes of a truly great man close forever, the eyes of the living are opened; when the battle of life is over, when envy and intrigue are forgotten then new vistas enable us to perceive achievements and nobility of spirit in a new light. Even England, whose trained army he was compelled to meet with a soldiery almost wholly untrained and whose power he had annihilated forever in that portion of the new world, participated in the general mourning.

If we recall Washington's dignity and greatness of soul; his wisdom, his admirable self-discipline as warrior and statesman; his great tenacity under the most desperate circumstances; his heroic contempt for death when, leading his raw recruits into battle, he inspired them with the courage of veterans, there is little wonder that the Resolution adopted by Congress: "First in War, First in Peace and First in the hearts of his Countrymen" has been handed down from generation to generation as the most sacred heirloom of the American Nation.

It is not my duty today to expatiate on the great historical events of our country that transpired between 1732 and 1799. To prove Washington's unquestioned greatness, I have, therefore, referred to the high praise that posterity has accorded him, to the tribute of love and of esteem from surviving friend and foe.

Today, I have another task to perform, the pleasant duty of thanking the Saxon Government and the City of Dresden not only in my name and that of our American Colony, but above all on behalf of my Government.

When plans were first made for this celebration commemorative of the two hundredth birthday anniversary of George Washington, it was my belief that, as in other places, this State and the City of Dresden and our American Colony would be joint participants. It was, therefore, a pleasant surprise to learn from the Lord Mayor of Dresden, Dr. Külz, that the State of Saxony and the City of Dresden had taken the initiative in arranging an independent celebration as their tribute to the memory of the Father of our Country.

As we are most appreciative of this exceptional honor, it affords me great pleasure to be permitted to convey to the representatives of the State of Saxony and of the City of Dresden most cordial greetings from our Secretary of State, Honorable Henry Stimson, and an expression of gratitude from my Government which is mindful of the loyal assistance rendered by German subjects during our Revolutionary War.

I thank His Excellency the President of Saxony and His Excellency the Lord Mayor of Dresden for their expressions of good will. I also wish to express my gratitude in the name of my Government because in honor of our first President you have decided to give the name of George Washington to one of your new streets. May this act of courtesy and the interest that you have manifested in the 200th birthday anniversary of the Father of our Country awaken among our people a new interest in the beautiful city of Dresden which, in former days, was the favorite abode of so many Americans.

Deeply moved I stand before you today, deeply touched by the proof you have given of your veneration for our national hero.

We, who are Americans, remember today not only the great deeds of Lafayette, but gratefully also the invaluable services of your countryman, General von Steuben, who played so important a part in our War of Independence and whose name will continue to live in the history of our country. We recall the unstinted praise that Frederick the Great bestowed upon the brilliant achievements of Washington.

I have in my possession Menzel's well-known picture of Frederick the Great which bears the inscription "Dedicated to Free America" and the words of the great Prussian king: "It is certain that almost all the countries of Europe sympathize with the Colonies and espouse their cause." You know the story that Frederick the Great presented a sword to Washington, bearing the modest and generous inscription "From the Older to the Greater." Although this story remains a legend, it is worthy of note as an indication of the esteem in which George Washington, the renowned general of the New World, was held by Frederick the Great, the renowned general of the Old World.

Thus the gratitude of my Government and the gratitude of our people reverts from this impressive celebration to those turbulent days when German and American officers fought jointly in pursuit of a high ideal. We remember today the story of Frederick the Great who, on this side of the ocean, surrounded by enemies, overwhelmed by seemingly insurmountable trials, revealed to the world the greatness of his character, and, accomplishing the seemingly impossible, led his armies to victory; we remember today, beyond the ocean, the story of George Washington who performed those military achievements that called forth the applause of the Old World; the story of George Washington, who undismayed by the hardships of Valley Forge accomplished the apparently impossible and led his hungry, tattered, barefooted soldiers whose "marches might be traced by the blood from their feet" to those victories that finally culminated in the epoch-making capitulation of his foes.

As we confront the serious problems of the present day, it is natural that we contemplate that stormy period and its towering figures to remind us that not in the pleasure of life, but in its battles and struggles man approaches the divine. The present, as well, requires great men, and this day the festive bells in the United States not only proclaim the compelling greatness of Washington, but also remind the American people of the achievements of our honored President of today and the weighty problems that bear down upon him. The present, as well, requires great men. And so, if today you have honored our country by commemorating the greatness of our first Commander-in-Chief, our first President, I am especially gratified to be enabled to reciprocate in kind. I felicitate you, that the German Reich today possesses a leader who, like Washington, is honored and beloved both by his own people and other nations, and who, like Washington, will go down in history as a man, First in War, First in Peace, and First in the Hearts of his Countrymen.

TELLS WHY WASHINGTON WAS GREAT

Professor Dr. Johannes Kühn was then introduced as the speaker of the day. Dr. Kühn, professor of history at the University of Dresden, spoke eloquently on the life of George Washington, giving especial consideration to those qualities which made him great.

"It is easier to describe the life of a man who is called great by his contemporaries and posterity, than to say in what this greatness consists," began Dr. Kühn, continuing:

Besides, it is not easy for us Europeans to comprehend the significance of a man like Washington. We are too accustomed to seek human greatness in unusual talents and gifts of an individual nature. But there is something which stands behind the most glowing of talents and the resulting accomplishments, called personality; and there is something which encompasses this personality like a mother's care, raises it up, carries it and calls it to greatness, and we call that Fate.

It is not absolutely necessary that the great personality flow out in the talents of a genius; it may also act to a certain extent through itself. Nor is it right to separate the important man from fate—from the objective connection of things of which we know only the outside—for there exists an indissoluble and secret connection between them.

Washington was not a genius in the usual sense. He did not lack good, even significant talents, yet it is certain that in America at that time there were more intellectual persons, cleverer politicians, more skillful diplomats, perhaps even keener officers than he. But on the other hand, note that he was elected almost without opposition to all his offices, from command of the small border patrol of his home state of Virginia up to the Presidency; that the first Senate of the United States greeted him with a statement in which were the words: "all unite in you." That did not refer to his accomplishments but to his personality. But this personality stood in an unusual way under the guidance of fate. Seldom has a man obeyed this guidance so unconditionally as Washington.

Dr. Kühn then traced the life of young George Washington through his experiences as surveyor and militia officer in which he became acquainted with America's binterland. It was here that he witnessed the great conflict between French and British in its beginnings—a conflict which resulted in the expulsion of France from North America. With France no longer a colonial rival England began to oppress her colonies with taxation, and, with pedantic and unskillful diplomacy, so antagonized the Americans as to precipitate the Revolutionary War. That Washington took the part of the colonists in their fight against Great Britain, Dr. Kühn asserted, was due more to his acting from instinct than by philosophical or legal arguments justifying such a course. By accepting the commission as leader of the American armies Washington again heeded the call of fate.

The speaker then showed how Washington the general became Washington the statesman—the American statesman. It was his struggle with an impotent congressional government to obtain the necessary supplies, and even the authority, to prosecute the war, which gave him the idea of a strong, centralized government. This idea he never relinquished, and even before he left the army, Washington was doing everything he could to develop and strengthen in his associates a national consciousness. The establishment of an American nation was his vision, and his first thought after the achievement of independence was for the economic and political welding of the thirteen states by the creation of means of intercourse and the adoption of a strong federal constitution.

REST FOR THE "YOUNG GIANT"

Following the development of Washington's foreign policy as President of the United States, Dr. Kühn pointed out that its cardinal principle was rest for the "young giant, America, and its undisturbed growth." While encouraging the development of trade with foreign countries, Washington at the same time counseled against any alliances with another nation which would entangle America in wars abroad. "He found all these questions as simple as a problem in Euclid. They are, in fact, when one has once learned the essential and spatial and other interests of his own land." His country's interest over-shadowed anything personal or foreign.

Dr. Kühn's address continued:

What sort of a man was he who thus grew into his historical rôle as the personification of the new empire? He was one of the most retiring men that ever lived. He has nothing in common with those geniuses which pass over the land like a storm and lay their law upon the world. He did not go ahead of his time. He went along with it and displayed it in himself. He acted when the time was right, not before, but then without any hesitation, with quiet determination and absolute steadfastness. The completely transparent simplicity and clearness of goal of his nature, together with his reliability at all times won for him universal confidence. Not on words did he rely, for he spoke little and practically not at all in public. It is remarkable that the man who headed the Constitutional Convention did not once talk about its deliberations although he completely controlled the body in its fundamentals.

He was self-controlled from early youth. Quite extraordinary things had to happen, such as the treacherous behavior of Lee at Monmouth or the defeat of St. Clair by the Indians, to cause him to lose his temper. There are seldom exclamations in his letters. He was the opposite of our imaginative, fanciful, effusive man. And his letters might be tiresome if they were not always of intrinsic value.

He acted differently from him who can tolerate no one but himself. He sought to secure the most capable co-workers. He freely accepted advice in war and later in politics, but made his decisions entirely by himself, after strict examination. What an intellectual power he was despite his lack of a professed intellectual gift is shown by many examples. A man who had already, in October, 1789, foreseen the whole course of the French Revolution, is no ordinary man. And he who chooses as his closest co-workers the two most distinguished political talents of America at that time, the Francophile Democrat Jefferson, and the English admirer and constitutional monarchist Hamilton, and knows how to hold his own with them mentally and to paralyze their hostility for a long time, is likewise no ordinary man. Both far surpassed him in talent, in intellectuality, political imagination and knowledge; but he was the greater in contrast to their extravagances, with his crystal character, his unshakable will, his instinct for the great, the essential, as well as the attainable and the natural dignity which surrounded him.

Washington was of pure Anglo-Saxon origin, yet a mass of relations to the Germans was joined to his person. How strange to see this General during the entire war surrounded by assistants of pure German blood. How strange to note that in the American winter quarters in 1777, at a time of deepest dejection in the army, a Prussian officer, von Steuben, appears near the General to become Inspector General of the fought in great numbers on both sides, so that at Yorktown was witnessed the curious spectacle of Germans in British uniform surrendering to Germans in French and American uniforms.

Ending his discourse with a plea for the national unity of the German people Dr. Kühn said: "National consciousness should stand above party—that is the teaching which Washington as well as the incorporators of our own national being such as Frederick the Great, Stein and Bismarck, left behind."

The excellent musical program for this celebration was arranged under the direction of Dr. Reuter army and completely change its tactics, equipment and discipline. Even though the young, splendid French Marquis de Lafayette may personally have been closer to Washington, yet it deserves consideration that Washington as a sign of sincere friendship wrote his last letter as Commander in Chief to von Steuben.

Evidence is not lacking of the prominent part which Germans had in the American War for Independence; and if we, a German city and a German Hochschule honor Washington here, we do it also in the consciousness that special bonds unite us to the American people, and that in the American nation almost from the beginning there has flowed a great stream of German blood and spirit.

Kalb, Muhlenberg, Herkimer and others were named by Dr. Kühn as heroes of the Revolutionary War, and the exploits of Germans not so well-known were referred to by the speaker. It was a "disturbing fact," Dr. Kühn stated, that Germans of the managing board of the Saxon State Theaters. Selections were played by Jan Dahmen, one of the best known violinists in Europe, and his string quartet; vocal solos were rendered by Mrs. Wieber-Brack, an American with the Dresden State Opera, and an interesting number was furnished by the juvenile choir of the "Kreuz Kirche," a musical organization consisting of boys and young men ranging in age from 10 to 19 years and well known in many European countries. The choir sang the "Star Spangled Banner" in English.

CELEBRATION MAKES DEEP IMPRESSION

The celebration was considered by the people of Dresden and Saxony as one of the outstanding events in Dresden during a number of years—a fact referred to many times in Mr. Haeberle's official communications to the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission. The newspapers of the city all contained laudatory articles regarding the tribute to George Washington.

That evening, Sunday, February 21, a patriotic service was held in the American Church of St. John. The Rev. Edward M. Bruce, rector of the church, delivered a sermon on the patriotism of George Washington in which he emphasized the differences between real and pseudo-patriotism, and paid tribute to those who are patriotic enough to live as well as to die for their country.

Rev. and Mrs. Bruce also gave a tea at the rectory of the American Church of St. John on February 24, at which were present several government officials as well as members of the American colony.

On the evening of February 25 the Albert Theater of Dresden presented a special patriotic performance in honor of George Washington. Patriotic marches, both German and American, including Sousa's immortal "Stars and Stripes Forever," and "Cadet March" were played by the Fourth Artillery Band. David E. Tolman, from Salt Lake City, Utah, sang a group of three American folk songs. American films, dealing with episodes in the life of George Washington, were shown and appreciated by the public.

The performance closed with a one-act drama entitled "Thomas Paine," written by the German dramatist, Hanns Johst, and rearranged for the occasion. The play was, despite its title, built around George Washington as the central figure, and depicted his part in the Revolutionary War. The Fourth Artillery Band played both the German and American national anthems.

This celebration was attended by members of the American colony, prominent Germans, among whom were many holding important government positions, and members of the United States consular corps. Mr. Haeberle reported that all the papers commented favorably on the affair which terminated in a demonstration of patriotic enthusiasm.

POSTPONEMENT APPRECIATED

The American Bicentennial Committee had planned a celebration to take place on the evening of February 22, but owing to the death of Friedrich August, former king of Saxony and one of its best beloved rulers, it was postponed to February 26. This mark of deference on the part of the committee, entailing as it did considerable extra work, was deeply appreciated by the people of Dresden, and served to heighten general interest in the American celebrations. Unfortunately, however, because of this postponement, many German officials who had accepted guest of honor invitations, were unable to attend on the later date. Among these was Dr. Külz, Lord Mayor of Dresden, who had accepted an invitation to speak and who was forced to send his regrets at being detained in Berlin to attend a session of the Reichstag. Dr. Külz was, however, ably represented on the program by City Councillor Dr. Köppen.

The program planned by the committee was not undertaken without difficulties, as is shown in the following excerpt from Mr. Haeberle's communication to the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission dated March 10, 1932:

Owing to the small number of Americans, and the smaller number who might assist financially and otherwise, it appeared almost impossible to arrange a Bicentennial Celebration in honor of George Washington. However, it was our ambition to have not only a celebration, but one worthy of the important occasion, one that might have a value not only for our few Americans, but also for the German and other residents of Dresden in promoting international friendship and a feeling of good will.

How well the Consul General and his associates succeeded is shown by the fact that it was generally agreed that no other celebration held in Dresden by a foreign colony had ever attracted such a large number of German friends. Dr. Köppen, who represented the Lord Mayor on the program, said that during his public services in Dresden, covering a period of 33 years, he had never seen such a large gathering of Germans at an American celebration.

"It was of interest to me to note," wrote the Consul General in the communication referred to above, "that as a result of my visit last October to the distant part of Saxony, the 'Vogtland,' several Germans who are connected with the United States by family and business ties came to Dresden to attend our celebration."

PROGRAM IN EXPOSITION BUILDING

The Exposition Building in Dresden was the scene of the celebration, and the great hall presented a most attractive and festive appearance with its simple but artistic decorations. A large portrait of George Washington was prominently displayed, while the multi-colored flags of Germany, the United States, Saxony and the City of Dresden added to the splendor of the scene. The Dresden Symphonic Orchestra, under the direction of Johannes Freyer, played selections at the beginning of the program, and also furnished several numbers during the dinner.

Consul General A. T. Haeberle, officiating as toastmaster, welcomed the guests to the banquet and program in honor of George Washington, and spoke briefly of the reasons which prompted the United States to plan a great celebration in commemoration of his birth. Mr. Haeberle spoke of the world-wide proportions the celebration had attained, and cited the programs presented in Dresden by the governments of Saxony and the city as examples of the manner in which foreign peoples were participating in the Bicentenary commemoration. Continuing, the Consul General said:

On one occasion Washington declared that every important decision of his career had been actuated by love of his country, and the George Washington Bicentennial Commission asserted that he was not only the highest type of American citizen, but also the highest type of world citizen. This shows that the two types are not incompatible. He could not be the first in peace, or the highest type of world citizen, without being solicitous of the welfare of other nations.

And thus I feel that if Washington could be with us on this occasion, he would be the first to rejoice in the fact that our American Colony and our German and other guests have met on a basis of friendship. I am, therefore, happy, fellow countrymen, to extend a hearty welcome not only to you, but also to all our friends who have come to join us in our patriotic celebration. A few days ago we were the guests of the Saxon Government and the City of Dresden, and tonight it affords us great pleasure to be honored by the presence of the representatives of the various government departments of this State and of the City of Dresden.

Our American Colony is extremely small, but we offer our guests the best we can give them, perhaps little in the way of material festivity, but much in the way of hearts that are in a festive mood of appreciation. The participation of the friends of the American Colony tonight signifies an interest in our country. It is an expression of friendship, an expression of veneration for the Father of our Country. And for this interest, for this expression of friendship and veneration I extend to them on behalf of our American Colony a hearty thanks and a hearty welcome.

TRIBUTE TO WASHINGTON

Dr. Karl Mannsfeld, Minister of Justice for the State of Saxony, representing the President of the State, Dr. Schieck, was the next speaker. In a brief tribute to the character of George Washington, Dr. Mannsfeld said that the great American was one of the few national heroes who was respected alike by the "poor and the rich, the eminent and the obscure." Quoting Goethe on pre-Revolutionary America, the speaker remembered Baron von Steuben and the innumerable other Germans who have contributed to the development of America. In English Dr. Mannsfeld's address reads:

In the name of the Saxon Government I have the honor to thank you, Mr. Consul General, and the American colony for your hearty invitation to this banquet in honor of George Washington. The President of Saxony, who has already presented his felicitations at the City Hall on Sunday last, regrets exceedingly that he is unable to be present tonight.

You have had the lifework of George Washington described to you from many angles and for this reason I need not further expatiate upon the same. There is, however, one viewpoint which I would like to bring into relief. George Washington was one of the few national heroes, who found acclaim alike among the poor and the rich, the eminent and the obscure. He is the very symbol of the growing American commonwealth. In a spirit of true devotion the American people journey to the places consecrated to his memory.

Goethe stated:

"Amerika, du hast es besser als unser Kontinent das Alte.
Hast keine verfallenen Schlösser und keine Basalte.
Dich stört nicht im Innern zu lebendiger Zeit, unnützes Erinnern
und vergeblicher Streit."

"Lucky Continent of America!
You are far happier than the continent of Europe,
You have no castles in ruins and no rockbound tradition,
Your peace is not disturbed in the onward march of time by memories and strife that serve no active purpose.
Lucky Continent of America!"

These well known words of Goethe no longer apply today, for the United States can now look back upon a century and a half of proud history, a history which begins with the name of George Washington and leads with unparalleled energy to the world power which presents itself to us today. The German people have followed the illustrious American development with admiration. With pride we remember Baron von Steuben and the hundred thousand Germans who with heart and hand have contributed to this development, and that among the greatest names in science, art, politics and economics are many names of German origin. May the fate of the two great nations travel a common path in the forging of a greater future. This is our sincerest wish today.

I have the honor of proposing a toast to him who stands at the helm of the American Government, at the very post where George Washington once stood. I propose a toast to Herbert Hoover, President of the United States.

As the audience arose to drink this toast, the orchestra played the "Star Spangled Banner," and after Mr. Haeberle had proposed a toast to President von Hindenburg, "Germany's President of today, beloved and honored by his people and by the people of other nations," the orchestra again was heard playing the German national anthem, "Deutschland, Deutschland über alles."

ADDRESS OF CITY COUNCILLOR

The next place on the program was to have been occupied by the Lord Mayor of Dresden, Dr. Külz, but as before stated, the Mayor was detained in Berlin, and was represented by City Councillor George Köppen who made the following remarks:

Having been delegated to speak in place of the Lord Mayor of Dresden, Dr. Külz, who is prevented by official duties from being present, I wish first of all to thank the George Washington Bicentennial Committee for their invitation so kindly extended. We have attended the official celebration at the City Hall and are happy to join with the American colony on this brilliant social occasion.

In the thirty-three years of my public service I have never seen such a large gathering of Americans and Germans as this one.

Although Consul General Haeberle in his address of welcome stated that little was offered tonight in a material way, but much in a spirit of friendship, I yet feel that nothing could be added from a culinary point of view to make the evening a complete success. But we, the citizens of Dresden, take greater delight in a social evening spent in the company of the Americans here, and characterized by cordiality and frank exchange of opinion, than in its material pleasures.

The Lord Mayor, Dr. Külz, has previously stated that much German blood has emigrated to America and has shown how the German contribution to America's population was at one time so pronounced that the German language was almost chosen as the official language of state. The bond of common ancestry has doubtlessly contributed much to common thought and common sentiment. When we Germans go to other countries, say to France or Italy, or to the Slavonic countries, we are, to be sure, very cordially received, but we cannot but feel that we are foreigners. A very different sentiment is ours when we visit Northern Europe and the United States, where we soon feel very much at home.

I myself sojourned in the United States at one time, not long enough to write a book entitled: "I and America" as so many have done, but long enough to esteem all the Americans whom I have met. The strongest impression I carried away with me is that in America one can always discuss matters of vital interest openly and sincerely, simply and directly.

Before the war we were happy to welcome among us thousands of Americans as residents of this city, and despite the diminution of travel in the last years there have still been 9,000 Americans who have stood in wonderment before the Sistine Madonna, who have gazed upon the treasures of the "Green Vault," or enjoyed the porcelain works of art in Meissen. Nor do I forget the many who have sat, absorbed in the enjoyment of the performances in theater, opera and symphony halls of Dresden.

I sincerely hope the time is not distant when Americans will come in greater numbers to live for a longer or shorter period among us.

I wish to assure all that they will always receive a hearty welcome. The City Administration knows that in its endeavor to make pleasant the sojourn of Americans in Dresden, it has in our toastmaster of this evening, in Consul General Haeberle, a friend and connecting link. We thank him most heartily and hope that he will in future continue in his work of cooperation. In accordance with the old German custom, I propose a toast to the health of the American Consul General, Mr. Haeberle and to his wife.

When the toast to Consul General Haeberle had been drunk, United States Consul Maurice W. Altaffer arose and spoke as follows:

Our countrymen in general and the American colony in Dresden in particular are duly sensible of the honor rendered to the name of Washington by the City of Dresden through its distinguished representative, Lord Mayor Dr. Külz, who to our great regret could not be here this evening.

On this occasion, which will be memorable because it is perhaps the largest public dinner given by Americans and their friends in Dresden, we want to take the opportunity to thank the city, not only for its many attentions on this anniversary which we are celebrating, but also for the spirit of friendliness and hospitality which Americans find here at all times.

The homage done to the founder of our country by this city is especially gratifying to us and is regarded as a high compliment because Dresden represents to us one of the finest of the old world centres of the arts, whose museums and galleries, and its opera with its great traditions, have attracted thousands of Americans to it. I propose to you, therefore, the health of the Lord Mayor of Dresden and of Councillor Köppen, who represents him here this evening.

ADDRESS OF DR. BRUCE

It was the Reverend E. M. Bruce, rector of the American Church of St. John, who delivered the address of the evening, "A Portrait of George Washington." Dr. Bruce began by telling his audience that the celebration in honor of George Washington has been planned for no idle purpose and then went on to consider the character of America's First President. Quoting tributes from Lincoln, Chauncey M. Depew and others, the speaker introduced what he termed the unique testimony of a common soldier in the Revolutionary Army. This was taken from the diary of the man, who remained unnamed, and was of no little interest to the large audience. Dr. Bruce's speech in full follows:

It was for no idle purpose, but with fixed design that the Congress of the United States called on the American people in all lands to honor and pay tribute to the memory of the immortal George Washington; immortal they call him and immortal he surely is as he still lives in his works; it can surely be said of him as was said of another great maker of history who still lives in his works: "Er ist niemals gestorben, er lebt darin noch jetzt."

In times of international stress and national distress it is helpful and wholesome for us to look back upon the lives of those whom fate ordained to be leaders under just such conditions. That is what has brought us here together tonight; from all walks of life, from all conditions of individual struggle, we have come to do homage to greatness, to wisdom and integrity; attributes of a George Washington or an Abraham Lincoln; qualities of a Frederick the Great; it is qualities such as these men possessed that alone can lead the world out of the barren desert of national selfishness into the Paradise of fruitful international fellowship and cooperation.

I need not go into the historical facts connected with the founding of America by the hero of the day; others have done this fully and well, and history has written its approval across the centuries. Let me rather touch upon the character of the man in the estimate of his fellow-countrymen. It was Abraham Lincoln who said: "To add brightness to the sun or glory to the name of George Washington is alike impossible; let none attempt it; in solemn awe we pronounce the name, and in its naked deathless splendour leave it shining on." It was Chauncey Depew who said: "George Washington stands the noblest leader who was ever entrusted with his country's life. His patience under provocation, his calmness in danger, and lofty courage when all others despaired, his prudent delays when delay was best, and his quick and resistless blows when action was possible, his magnanimity to defamers and generosity to his foes, his ambition for his country and unselfishness for himself, his sole desire of freedom and independence for America, and his only wish to return after victory to private life, have all combined to make him, by the unanimous judgment of the world, the foremost figure of history."

The Rev. Dr. Carson was once asked in what position he would place Washington with other great men, such as Napoleon, Alexander and Hannibal; "I can tell you," he replied, "Napoleon, Alexander and Hannibal rose to great heights by stepping upon and putting down all others; Washington rose to fame by reaching down and lifting others up."

But the most unusual testimony of all I believe is found in the diary of a soldier who joined the bedraggled army of Washington when hope for the cause of the young colonies was at its lowest ebb. It was recently published by Irving Bacheller. In it we read:

"George Washington of Virginia! Those words have been flying around New England since John and Sam Adams returned from Philadelphia. Who has not heard of his wisdom, his noble spirit, his modesty; of his coat torn to rags by bullets in the French and Indian wars? I feared it was like the talk we have heard on the King's birthday, and was prepared for disappointment. But he has conquered me. I am like a man thrown and stunned, who is trying to think how it happened.

"He is a big man—at a guess two inches taller than I—; broad at the hip and shoulders; big bones, big hands, big feet, long arms, rather slender waist for one of his size. Yet all this is the smallest part of him. His head is no better shaped than others you have seen in Boston, but I swear I have never seen one so well set. I wondered why I felt a kind of awe in his presence; but I know now.

"The big thing is inside of him; it reaches out and touches you when you look in his eyes and when he moves his hands. It hits you again when you hear his voice. There are three words that come to me as I think of him; they are: Power, Vitality and Kindness. I think that he has a mind as strong as our best pair of oxen, and that God is driving it. He said little, and our minister could have said it as well as he did. He has a good-natured face, a bit weathered, with a pock-mark here and there—not handsome. His straight nose is a shade thick and large. His deep-set, blue-grey eyes are wide apart, and they look down into you. His brownish hair, brushed back and powdered and falling in a queue is a comely detail. His mouth is a trifle too large and firm when closed. Yet when he stood up, straight as an arrow, and smiled at us, he was magnificent; it's a big word, not carelessly chosen. He wore his riding boots. His blue and buff uniform with golden epaulettes and buttons was spotless and well fitted. From shoe to ruffles every detail in his dress was admirable. Still it was not his look or his manners, genteel as they were, that reduced me to a sense of smallness. It was the man under it all. I felt as I did the day I looked up at the big mountain in New Hampshire, uncomfortably little. He has doubled my faith in our cause and in our ultimate victory."

Let us peek for a moment behind the curtain of history and see for ourselves what that army looked like which George Washington led to victory; only a hero in character and a genius in strategy could have successfully undertaken such a task. Turning again to that same diary we read:

"The spirit of our Company is for friendship, not for war. Stern discipline excites a degree of resentment. The men address their officers as if they were all having a noon hour in the hay field. Even the captain is 'Amos' to every private. It surely is the most remarkable army the world has seen—a fair of good-natured gossiping, homesick, peace-loving pioneers, spread out over the hills and valleys. A disorganized mass of ill-clad, poorly armed soldiers, with no knowledge of what is expected of fighting men. Many of them do not know the difference between an officer and a broomstick. The New England troops feel that all men are equal, even in a regiment; that a uniform cannot create a caste. So there is little order, government or discipline among them. We have only raw material—a mound of ore to be fused and slagged and shaped into useful iron.

"The air is full of the shouted orders: 'Half-cock your fire-locks! Handle your cartridge! Prime your cartridge! Shut your pans! Return your rammers! Poise your fire-locks! Cock your fire-locks! Present your fire-locks!' Eighteen motions are needed in loading, aiming and discharging this weapon. The fire-lock is your friend when it is loaded, but the world can come to an end while you are loading it!"

A few pages further on we read in the same diary:

"The big chief was here 'bout ten minutes ago," said one of the soldiers, meaning George Washington. "He and a squad o' cavalry; been riding round the camp. My God, Sir! he's colder than an iron bar on a winter morning, like most o' them Southern officers. Been shiverin' ever since he was here. I was kind o' riled; spoke to him friendly like—not thinking—same as if I was to hum. Forgot I was in the army. 'Nice mornin',' says I, 'Salute, sir,' says he, cross as a bear; an' me gettin' no pay since I got here."

It was truly a gigantic task to undertake with such material; but George Washington with his strong belief in divine guidance stood his ground and led his army to victory. To quote his own words: "The determinations of Providence are always wise, often unscrutable; and though its decrees appear to bear hard upon us at times, they are nevertheless meant for gracious purposes."

Washington was first in war, but he was also first in peace; but one who was unwilling to patch up an inglorious peace. Peace must ever be a reaching out in friendship toward our fellow-man regardless of race or creed; a lasting peace must be built up upon the principles of justice and human liberty.

Let me close by quoting Washington's own words—words which though spoken one hundred and fifty years ago are repeated today with greater emphasis than ever for all the world to hear and take to heart. Listen: "My first wish is to see this plague to mankind [war] banished from off the earth, and the sons and daughters of this world employed in more pleasing and innocent amusements, than in preparing implements and exercising them for the destruction of mankind."

AMERICAN AND GERMAN SONGS

At the end of Reverend Mr. Bruce's address the entire audience sang "America," the melody of which, being used for a well known German song, was familiar to all the Germans present.

With this, the first or "official" part of the program was completed, and after a short intermission the second half of the evening's entertainment was opened as the orchestra played Sousa's "Stars and Stripes Forever." The orchestral selection was followed by an interesting feature consisting of a group of well known and typical American songs by a male quartet called the Utah Boys. The members of this group, M. A. Ashton, H. B. Summerhays, H. B. Sharp, and D. E. Tolman, were representatives of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, and Mr. Haeberle mentioned particularly the fact that they had traveled from distant parts of Germany to take part on the program. Mr. Tolman, who also played a violin solo, came a distance of 540 miles to appear on this and the program given earlier in the week by the Albert Theater. The newspapers of Dresden commented especially on this feature of the program, and praised also the other Americans who took part.

Mrs. Kate McBride, long a resident of Dresden, sang a group of American songs, the orchestra played a typical American composition, and "Yankee Doodle" was played as a flute solo by Fritz Rucker, noted flutist of the State Opera. Mrs. Elsa Wieber-Brack, an American with the State Opera, then pleased the audience with several soprano solos, and the program was ended with another composition of Sousa, "Liberty Bell." The remainder of the evening was spent in dancing.

The celebration resulted in such a "spontaneous outburst of friendship and good will," wrote Consul General Haeberle, "that a movement was started immediately upon the termination of the program to cable greetings to President Hoover, and a number of prominent German participants approached the Mayor, Dr. Külz, after his return from Berlin and asked him to send the following telegram on behalf of those present:

TO THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES,
WASHINGTON.

AFTER A CELEBRATION GIVEN BY THE AMERICAN COLONY IN HONOR OF THE FIRST PRESIDENT OF YOUR COUNTRY, IN WHICH MORE THAN FOUR HUNDRED DRESDEN INHABITANTS, INCLUDING REPRESENTATIVES OF CITY AND STATE, PARTICIPATED, AND WHICH LED TO A SPONTANEOUS EXPRESSION OF FRIENDSHIP BETWEEN AMERICAN AND GERMAN CITIZENS, I HAVE THE HONOR TO EXPRESS TO YOUR EXCELLENCY, AS THE PRESENT HEAD OF THE UNITED STATES, MY GRATIFICATION AT THE SUCCESS OF THIS PATRIOTIC CELEBRATION, AND MY HOPE THAT THE TRADITIONAL FRIENDLY RELATIONS BETWEEN YOUR COUNTRY AND OUR CITY WILL ALWAYS LAST AND EVER DEEPEN.

IN THE NAME OF THE DRESDEN PARTICIPANTS,

(SIGNED) OBERBÜRGERMEISTER DR. KÜLZ.

NOTABLE PERSONS ATTEND

Among the guests of honor at the celebration were, according to Mr. Haeberle, "the foremost as well as other high representatives of the various Government Departments, the Commander in Dresden of the 'Reichswehr' (German Army), the Chief and other high officials of the Police, a representative of the German Chamber of Commerce, the president of the Federal Railroads of Saxony, and representatives of the press. The University of Dresden was represented by Dr. Nagel, one of the foremost scientists of Germany."

The importance with which the celebration was viewed by the government of Saxony is shown in the fact that it was attended by two members of the Cabinet, Dr. Mannsfeld, Secretary of Justice, and Dr. Richter, Secretary of the Interior. This was a special honor for, according to established German precedent, usually only one such official represents the cabinet on public occasions of this nature.

The press accounts of the event, which appeared in all the leading newspapers of Dresden, only served to corroborate Mr. Haeberle's estimate of it as the most notable celebration ever held in the city by a foreign colony. "They spoke of the illustrious gathering," wrote the Consul General, "that represented not only the Saxon officialdom, but also art, science, commerce, industry and banking as well as the consular corps. They enumerated not only the numbers of the first part of the program, but also praised the young Americans, the Utah Boys, who had come to Dresden to render vocal and instrumental selections. They spoke of the absorbing interest of the portrait drawn by Reverend Edward M. Bruce in his address on George Washington. They criticised favorably the singing of Mrs. McBride and Mrs. Wieber-Brack, and spoke of the program as having been of genuine artistic value."

The final program of this series, given during "George Washington Week," was presented on March 2 by the Humboldt Club of Dresden, an organization numbering among its members scholars and intellectual leaders of the city. The program was featured by a lecture by Dr. Carl Wittke, professor of history at the State University of Ohio, who was travelling in Germany on a lecture tour under the auspices of the Carl Schurz Society. Many government officials, members of the consular corps, and other prominent people of Dresden attended the meeting. The lecture was followed by a social evening and the event formed a valuable addition to the other festivities in Dresden dedicated to the memory of George Washington.

DRESDEN HOLDS CEREMONIES ON JULY FOURTH

The celebrations in Dresden were continued on July 4 under even more difficult conditions than existed at the opening of the Bicentennial Year. Several American families had left the city, and the adverse economic situation was exerting a greater pressure than ever on many of those remaining. Despite all this, however, it was determined that the anniversary of America's Declaration of Independence should not be allowed to pass without proper recognition on the part of the American colony in Dresden. Being also a suitable occasion for further commemoration of George Washington's birth, a program dedicated to his memory was prepared.

Under the direction of a special committee consisting of Mrs. Maurice W. Altaffer, chairman, Mrs. Rudolf Kratina and Miss Cornelia E. Bedford, a Bicentennial reception and musical tea at the beautiful Bellevue Hotel overlooking the River Elbe, were planned as Fourth of July festivities; and the celebration, wrote Consul General Haeberle on July 20, 1932, "notwithstanding the great handicap referred to above, proved to be most worthy of the George Washington Bicentennial Year."

More than a hundred Americans and their friends were present to participate in the celebration. Among those in attendance were people of various nationalities and members of the consular corps in Dresden. Throughout the entire program an informal and a wholly friendly spirit prevailed.

AMERICAN CONSUL PRESIDES

Consul General Haeberle presided and opened the meeting by welcoming the guests and expressing his appreciation for the efforts of the committee in charge in their preparations for the event. Stating that the program was a continuation of the Bicentennial celebrations begun during "George Washington Week," Mr. Haeberle continued:

We, the citizens of the United States of America, are celebrating today the most significant event in the history of our country—the Declaration of our Independence. No future event can ever equal that in importance. It matters not how many heroic acts we or our descendants may perform on land, on sea, or in the skies; it matters not how many holidays posterity may incorporate in our political calendar to commemorate glorious deeds and illustrious names; it matters not how high we may climb in our fame as a nation, no event can ever dim the glory that surrounds the memorable date of July 4, 1776.

This is the reason why the sound of "Liberty Bells," the boom of cannon, the bursting of rockets have echoed and reechoed through the period of our one hundred and fifty-six years of national existence. They are expressions of joy that form one of the earliest recollections in our lives and awaken memories of our youth. We remember the impatience with which we awaited the arrival of the Fourth, and unconsciously we long for a peep into the circus tent of our childhood.

Our immature minds were impressed with the importance of the day, and whether or not we recall the details of history, we do recall that the birth of our nation was the result, not of peaceful negotiation or barter, but of a supreme fearlessness that far outweighed the doubt and despondency of the gloomy period of our strife for liberty—a fearlessness and endurance that the Gods give to those alone who fight for a righteous cause.

That is the real summary of the story of the Revolution. That is the one great thought, the fundamental thought to be emphasized in commemorating the names of the founders of our Republic. History is replete with examples of brilliant achievements based on selfishness. But triumphant careers have terminated in disaster and empires have crumbled into dust because they were constructed on self-aggrandizement. We glory in the fact that the struggle of 1776 was a struggle not for self-aggrandizement, but for the God-given right of liberty. We glory in the fact that not the training of our revolutionary armies won our victories, but their fearlessness and endurance—a gift that the Gods have given to those alone who fight for a righteous cause. Those are the virtues of our armies that we extol, for they alone could surmount the difficulties of Valley Forge.

During the many thousand years of human strife, history has never recorded more brilliant military achievements than those of Washington and his generals. The Old World marveled at the daring and consummate strategy of the New.

To us, however, who approach the Battle Ground of American Freedom today, the greatest inspiration of patriotism comes not from the splendor of arms, but from the consecration of our forefathers to a sacred cause.

That chapter of our history—our struggle for independence—was written to incite future generations to the loftiest aspirations conceivable in man. And if knowing and recalling the ordeals and vicissitudes of that epochal struggle, we are not stirred today into a new resolution to emulate the virtues of our forefathers who gained for us our independence, we fail in our tribute of gratitude. If knowing and recalling all this, we hesitate to place the welfare of our country above our personal interests, we are preparing our nation for its decline.

The blood of our forefathers placed a sacred obligation upon posterity, and each successive generation must liquidate this indebtedness anew. Each successive generation must perform its task, whatever it may be, for the perpetuation of the fabric of American Freedom.

Have our fathers paid their indebtedness towards our forefathers? The answer lies in the stars of our flag. They tell those who understand their symbolic language an eloquent story of national development. From thirteen colonies we have grown into a federation of forty-eight states representing millions of miles of territorial acquisition. The expansion of our frontiers has been accompanied by a relative expansion of material and intellectual wealth.

If we have not exaggerated our greatness, a deeper responsibility rests upon the present century than upon the past.

It became the lot of our generation not only to preserve our inheritance of high ideals, but also to meet the additional, hitherto unknown duties of one of the most restless of all periods.

Our country is involved this year in political conflict. It is a legitimate one provided for by our constitution. But the issues involved are so serious that we pray that it may be, as the constitution intended, an expression of patriotism and not selfish partisanship. The present time is fraught with dangers that cannot be wholly combatted by political creeds or controlled by Government regulations. May we, therefore, during the turbulence of the present day and may our fellow-countrymen at home recall the sterling qualities of our forefathers and, above all, the wisdom, unselfishness and patriotism that characterized the man whose 200th birthday we are celebrating this year; the man whose name is uppermost in our thoughts today; George Washington, the man who achieved for us our independence and who to this day has retained the foremost position in the hearts of his countrymen.

He has been pronounced the highest type not only of American citizen, but also of world citizen, and mindful of this fact, we will not fail to find our sphere of activity as American citizens residing abroad. We will not hesitate to declare our platform of true Americanism as an appeal to all our countrymen residing in foreign lands. Our platform promises to assist our Government and people in creating a new era of inseparable relationship between the various countries of the world; it promises that we will fulfill our mission as messengers of friendship from home; that we will not be hampered by prejudice in our regard for all that is good and noble in our fellow citizens of the world; it recognizes the difficulties encountered by all Governments in confronting new problems, and promises the same unselfish cooperation to others in the protection of their rights in our country that we receive abroad in the protection of ours; it promises to promote Americanism in the larger sense through export and import of the best that the commercial, intellectual and spiritual world can offer for the benefit of mutual advancement.

In brief, may we, may all who are exponents of American principles in foreign countries, may our nation continue to be guided by the standard of our forefathers. Their standard may be followed in every age and place; their standard is acceptable and welcomed in the remotest corner of the world. For theirs was the Golden Standard of "Man's Inalienable Rights,—Life, Liberty, and Pursuit of Happiness."

REMARKS OF JUDGE WELCH

Judge David Welch of New York, an American whose frequent visits to Germany made him well known among his countrymen there, happened to be present in Dresden on this occasion, and Mr. Haeberle called upon him to make a few remarks. Judge Welch responded with a brief patriotic speech in which he referred to the Declaration of Independence as one of the greatest documents ever penned by the hand of man. It was the efforts of George Washington, he asserted, more than those of any other man, which made the Declaration more than a mere show of empty words. Judge Welch expressed the hope that out of the trying conditions of affairs at that time, both Germany and America would emerge stronger and better equipped to meet the problems of the future. He closed his remarks by proposing a toast to the President of the United States.

Consul General Haeberle responded with a toast to the President of the German Reich, General von Hindenburg.

A very interesting feature of the program was supplied by Baron von Nettlebladt, a native of Dresden who had resided for some years in the United States. The Baron read two original poems, one of which described his first fourth of July in America and proved especially appealing to the audience. Cello solos by Rudolf Kratina, a member of the orchestra of the State Opera of Dresden, and a reading by Miss Cornelia Bedford contributed to the enjoyment of the program. The day's festivities were concluded with dancing.

On the Sunday preceding the Independence Day celebration, July 3, a patriotic service was held in the American Church of St. John under the direction of the rector, Reverend Edward M. Bruce, who delivered a patriotic sermon. The American flag was displayed in the church, and in addition to patriotic songs, special music for the service was provided by Gerhard Wiesenhuetter, a prominent organist of Dresden.

ECONOMIC PRESSURE FELT

The auspicious ceremonies with which the Bicentennial Celebration in Dresden was inaugurated will be recalled from what has been said in the foregoing pages. If the events which followed were less pretentious than the opening programs it was not because of any diminution of enthusiasm or any lessening of the desire to honor George Washington's memory; but rather because of the fact that the pressure of the adverse economic conditions prevailing throughout the world began to be felt more and more keenly in Dresden. Indeed, not a few Americans found themselves virtually stranded in a foreign country, and the plight of some of these made it necessary for their more fortunate countrymen to render assistance wherever possible.

Owing to these conditions and to the fact that some American families in the Dresden consular district were actually in need, the closing Bicentennial ceremonies in Dresden were held in the nature of a Thanksgiving Dinner which was made the occasion to collect money for the assistance of these people. It was felt by those in charge, stated Consul General Haeberle, that no "worthier way could be found to pay a tribute to the memory of George Washington than by ministering to the poor and needy on a day of general thanksgiving and rejoicing."

Reverend Mr. Bruce, Rector of the American Church of St. John in Dresden and a member of the Dresden Bicentennial Committee headed the committee named to supervise the Thanksgiving ceremonies. Associated with him were Mrs. Maurice W. Altaffer, Mrs. Rudolf Kratina, Mrs. Herbert Gutschow, Mrs. Gottfried Herpst and Mrs. Jordan Natscheff.

THANKSGIVING DAY DINNER

The Thanksgiving Day dinner was held in the Bellevue Hotel which was especially decorated for the occasion with American flags. In addition to the Americans present, there were a number of German friends and members of other foreign colonies in the city, as well as consular representatives of several different nations. The most informal and friendly spirit prevailed during the celebration of this typically American festive day.

Reverend Mr. Bruce was the only speaker on this occasion, and his brief remarks were entirely in keeping with the occasion. Identifying the dinner as the official closing event of the Bicentennial Year, the Rector asserted his belief that wherever George Washington's name is known, people had been bettered during 1932 by having their attention called to his courage, integrity and other virtues which made him one of history's greatest figures. The tributes to Washington's memory which he had witnessed in Dresden, said Dr. Bruce, had been most gratifying to him, as he knew they had been to his countrymen, as evidence of the deep and abiding friendship existing between Germany and America. After a short review of part of George Washington's official life, the speaker ended by expressing the hope that greater cooperation among all peoples would speedily bring about a return to more stable economic conditions throughout the world.

The "Star Spangled Banner" was sung at the conclusion of the dinner, and the rest of the evening was spent in dancing.

A very interesting feature in connection with the closing ceremonies in Dresden were the religious services conducted in the more than sixty branches of the German-Austrian Missions of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints. The program, which was presented on November 27, 1932, featured an address prepared especially for the occasion by Consul General Haeberle at the invitation of Dr. Oliver H. Budge, President of the Mission. Other numbers on the program were a reading, "To the Honor of George Washington," the patriotic anthem, "America," sung by a quartet, an address, "George Washington the Man," and another reading, "George Washington's Message to Us."

STREET NAMED AFTER WASHINGTON

As a permanent mark of Dresden's esteem and admiration for George Washington is the street, destined to become the main thoroughfare through the rapidly growing industrial section of the city, which was named in honor of the great American President. Dr. Külz, Lord Mayor of Dresden, and his associates in the municipal government, selected the new street for this honor rather than renaming an older one in the belief that such action would more fittingly express the sentiments of the city and its people.

Washington Street starts from the new Kaditzer Bridge over the River Elbe, and forms an important connecting link in the direct international highway system leading from Berlin through Dresden to the capitals of Czechoslovakia and Austria. It is 131 feet wide and will feature a promenade in the center, slightly raised above the street surface, with trees and shrubbery on each side. Special lanes will be provided to accommodate motor vehicles, bicycles and pedestrians so that all traffic may move with as great speed and safety as possible. Combining utility and beauty George Washington Street in Dresden will ever remain a fitting tribute to the memory of America's great leader, and a memento of the celebrations in his honor during the Bicentennial Year.

CELEBRATION AT FRANKFORT

The largest assemblage of Americans ever seen in Frankfort-on-Main, historic birthplace of the immortal Goethe, gathered to honor the memory of George Washington on the Two Hundredth Anniversary of his birth, in the largest banquet hall of the famous Palmengarten. Nearly 200 persons, including eminent Germans, members of the Consular Corps in Frankfort, and friends from other countries, were in attendance. A cordial spirit pervaded the entire celebration. The event was one of the most memorable functions ever held by a foreign colony in Frankfort.

The Americans in Frankfort were joined in the celebration by many of their compatriots in other parts of the district, who came from Wiesbaden, Rüsselsheim and Mainz. A retired officer of the United States Cavalry who had fought Indians many years before on the Western plains of America, made a long and difficult journey with his wife from their home in a snow-bound village in the Odenwald to take part in the celebration.

United States Consul General W. L. Lowrie presided at the celebration, and in a brief opening speech welcomed the guests to the banquet in honor of America's first President. Mr. Lowrie explained the purpose of the commemoration and told of the world-wide proportions it had assumed. Every American citizen, he said, was to be given the opportunity to honor in some manner the memory of George Washington during the Bicentennial Year. Quoting eulogies on the first President by Abraham Lincoln and Calvin Coolidge, the Consul General closed his remarks by bidding the guests to the feast.

At the conclusion of the banquet Dr. Landmann, Mayor of Frankfort, delivered an eloquent speech on the close relations long existing between his city and the United States. Similarities between President von Hindenburg and George Washington were referred to by the speaker who pointed out that both gave up old monarchical attachments to join the forces of democracy. Dr. Landmann was, according to Mr. Lowrie, "generous and complimentary in his address, which made an excellent impression."

The British Consul General in Frankfort, Mr. Bosanquet, next spoke briefly, considering for the most part the cordial relations and proverbial friendship between England and the United States. George Washington's British ancestry was specifically cited by the speaker who said that all Englishmen were proud of this fact.

Professor Louis R. Grote of the von Noorden-Klinik, an American by descent, was the speaker of the evening. Dr. Grote began by saying that the vision of George Washington the General, the Statesman and the true American, was "open to everybody"; but despite this fact the speaker expressed his belief that the average person was acquainted only with the barest outlines of Washington's life. One of America's chief contributions to the world, asserted the professor, was her conception of the true meaning of liberty and its practical application in daily life. The same conception of liberty was held alike by Washington and Goethe as the antithesis of that adhered to by "superficial people who identify liberty with the release of barriers of all kinds—freedom from burdens, from duty and from labor."

"It will never be possible," stated Dr. Grote, "to conceive George Washington as a pathetic, heroic figure, whose big gesture has whipped up the passion of a nation for a moment only. If one seeks, however, for the prototype of a self-denying, basically modest man, bent only upon fulfillment of duty, his name will always arise."

"Washington has become to the world the symbol of a will towards a duty, which is remarkably embodied in the American people of today."

The evening's program was concluded with appropriate music by one of Frankfort's leading orchestras, and was followed by dancing.

Special decorations for the occasion gave the banquet hall an exceedingly attractive appearance with German and American flags appropriately displayed. A picture of George Washington attracted much attention, occupying as it did a prominent place in the hall.

Included among the guests of honor were the Mayor of Frankfort and Mrs. Landmann, City Councilor Dr. Michel, Dr. and Mrs. Louis Grote, and the foreign consular officers in Frankfort with their wives. Twenty American students at the University of Frankfort were also guests of the committee.

The Frankfort Bicentennial Committee in charge of the celebration consisted of: Consul General W. L. Lowrie, chairman; Charles N. Powers; Dr. S. S. McFarlane; B. W. Randolph; and Edwin Van D'Elden.

DARMSTADT NAMES SQUARE FOR WASHINGTON

The next celebration within the consular district presided over by Consul General Lowrie, took place July 25 in Darmstadt, capital of Hesse-Darmstadt, when the prominent square in front of the Orpheum Theater was renamed "Washington Platz" in honor of George Washington. Darmstadt, according to Mr. Lowrie, "has a population of about 90,000, ranks among the finest of the smaller German capitals, and has long been a center of art and industry."

Considerable pride was shown by the people of Darmstadt in the fact that theirs was the second city in Germany to name a square in honor of George Washington, the first having been named in Berlin, capital of the German Republic.

On the morning of the dedicatory ceremonies a large crowd filled the square which was to be named in honor of Washington. American, German, Hessian, and Darmstadt flags all waved from tall flagpoles. The program began with music by the municipal band under the direction of Kapellmeister Schlupp. The male chorus of the Darmstadt Singing-Association, under the leadership of Director Etzold, sang the German song, "Wo gen Himmel Eichen rauschen."

Among the guests of honor were Consul General and Mrs. Lowrie, representatives of the State and Municipal authorities, and members of the Beethoven Tour from New York City. Mayor Müller welcomed the guests in the opening speech, saying:

Not only the American people celebrated the two hundredth anniversary of George Washington's birthday in February of this year. The whole world took notice of it. And the reason was certainly not just a courtesy to the American people. It was much more a desire to honor the memory of this heroic man, whose qualities and deeds as a soldier, statesman and as a man were a brilliant example for the whole world. I believe that now we Germans, in this moment in the history of our people which has led us into a deep, uneven valley and therefore have great need for real leaders, we Germans can find inspiration here from a person who personifies the ideal of man. His ardent desire for freedom inspired and enabled him under the most difficult circumstances to throw off a heavy yoke, to become free from a better organized, and much better armed, opponent, the British power, which unfortunately operated with bought German mercenary troops. I will use this opportunity to emphasize that the Hessian troops which fought together with the English army against the young American nation were not members of our Hessian State, but of the former Kurhessen. On the other hand, the chief of Washington's general staff was a former German officer, the well known General von Steuben, whose aid to American independence is well recognized in the United States. Washington was not only a victorious military leader against superior forces, but he was also a conspicuous statesman and politician who understood how to hold the gains with energy, tact and wisdom, and to judge the strength, opposition and possibilities of the young state and thus he laid the foundation for the powerful federation of states which now plays a large and important rôle in the affairs of the world.

When we determined to honor this great man, it was not only because of the admiration and respect for a man, who by his example belongs to the whole world, but the especially close and friendly relations which connect us with our American countrymen. This year's visit of the Beethoven Choir of New York gives us a welcome opportunity to emphasize the old bands of friendship and to strengthen them by the inauguration of this lovely place in the memory of a man who is dear and valuable to all of us.

I heartily greet our amiable guests from New York in the name of our city. I especially greet the Consul General of the United States, Mr. Lowrie, and the American in charge of the Opel Works Rüsselsheim, Mr. Paul Buerger, who together with their ladies have honored this celebration. I also greet our Darmstadt guests, especially the representatives of the State Government and municipal authorities with their ladies.

I therefore name this German place in honor of the great American Independence hero and I ask you to give this German honor a celebration note by singing the first verse of our Deutschlandlied.

Brief remarks were made by the representative of the State President and Mr. Strauss, head of the Beethoven Tour. The program was concluded with music by the Darmstadt Choir and the municipal orchestra.

opening remarks announced that a prominent street in the city would be renamed in honor of Washington. The speaker paid glowing tribute to George Washington as a man patriotic enough to sacrifice his own personal wishes for the good of his country, and likened President von Hindenburg to America's first President. Dr. Petersen also called attention to the fact that during George Washington's administration the first consul of the United States was appointed to Hamburg, and referred to the friendly relations which have ever since existed between that city and the country of George Washington.

HAMBURG HONORS GEORGE WASHINGTON

The Senate of Hamburg arranged a celebration in the city hall of Hamburg which took place on Washington's birthday. The large assembly hall at the Rathaus was well filled with especially invited guests including the entire consular corps of Hamburg, civic heads of the city, other officials, and citizens.

Dr. Carl Petersen, chief Burgomaster of Hamburg, presided at the celebration, and during his Adolph Rein, head of the Colonial and Overseas Section of the Historical College of the University of Hamburg, was next introduced by Dr. Petersen. Dr. Rein's address on the life of George Washington was broadcast and according to the report of United States Consul General John E. Kehl, was exceptionally well received.

That the celebration proved of considerable interest in Hamburg is shown by the fact that the leading hotels of the city were all appropriately decorated on Washington's birthday. The offices of the United States Steamship Lines and the Hamburg-American Steamship Line prepared window displays featuring portraits of George Washington and flags of the United States and Germany.

In honor of the occasion, all the liners in port that day were also appropriately decorated.

BANQUET AT HOTEL ATLANTIC

The main feature of the day's activities was a banquet and ball held that evening in the Hotel Atlantic under the auspices of the American George Washington Bicentennial Committee in

STREET IN HAMBURG NAMED FOR WASHINGTON. DR. CARL PETERSEN, CHIEF BURGOMASTER, ANNOUNCED THE NAMING OF THIS STREET IN HONOR OF THE GREAT AMERICAN AT THE BICENTENNIAL CEREMONY IN 1932.

Hamburg. The affair was attended by the highest city officials and representatives of the leading circles of Hamburg. Of this banquet Mr. Kehl wrote the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission on February 25:

From German and other non-American sources expressions of commendation were numerous, even to the extent of declaring the affair to have been the largest and most successful held in Hamburg by foreigners. The German participation, including as it did the highest officials and the best-known civilians, was most gratifying.

The American Bicentennial Committee for Hamburg, which was in charge of the banquet and other Bicentennial features, was headed by Consul General Kehl and consisted of the following members: John J. Meily; A. C. Landis; N. T. Lawrence; Dr. A. Mendelssohn-Bartholdy; and John G. Sawall. An honorary committee consisting of officials, educators, and statesmen of Hamburg, was also appointed by Mr. Kehl.

Under the joint auspices of the Society of Friends of the United States in Hamburg, the Institute of Foreign Politics, and the Bicentennial Committee, the next Bicentennial Celebration in Hamburg took place on March 8. This feature was a lecture on George Washington and the Foreign Policies of the United States delivered by Dr. Carl Wittke of Ohio State University at the University of Hamburg. It was reported that the lecture was well attended and favorably received. Following the lecture a dinner was given at the Hotel Alsterhof, which was attended by leading members of the American colony, professors, and students of Hamburg University, and officers of the Institute of Foreign Politics.

"It was," wrote Mr. Kehl, "a very pleasant and an interesting evening."

THANKSGIVING DAY PROGRAM

Although it was not possible to organize a Bicentennial Celebration for July 4, the Hamburg committee planned and carried out an excellent program for Thanksgiving Day which was an appropriate ending to the year of festivities. As was the case in the many other cities throughout the world where Americans were residing, the Thanksgiving dinner in Hamburg was a typically American celebration. There were 150 persons in attendance, including the officials of the city as well as other eminent Germans and other nationals. The American colony was present in a body.

The dinner was given in the Hotel Vier Jahreszeiten, the leading hostelry in Hamburg, and consisted of the usual turkey with cranberry sauce, sweet potatoes and pumpkin pie. Dr. Ruscheweyh, president of the city council, proposed a toast to the President of the United States, and United States Consul General John E. Kehl proposed a toast to the President of the German Reich. The speaker of the day was Charles B. Miller, a member of the American Club of Hamburg, whose interesting oration was interspersed with frequent and appropriate reference to George Washington. Mr. Miller's speech in full follows:

Thanksgiving, our most American festival day, is more indigenous than any other, as it antedates the birth of the Republic by a century and a half, and has its origin in motives which urged the Pilgrims on their journey before political independence was conceived. It was, in its inception, a devotional exercise, a service of thanksgiving offered by the Pilgrims for their first harvest. After the trials of that first terrible winter, any harvest at all must have seemed a bounty from heaven. Their action was all the more natural as it was in consonance with so much of their daily life. As one writer has expressed it, the "religious purpose" was the "dominant impulse" of the early colonists. It was this purpose which brought them to New England and its maintenance was the central feature of their organization for nearly a century. The search for geographical isolation, and as much political autonomy as they might obtain, were only means to this end. The Deity was a member of every household, and a constant companion in the life and thoughts of every person.

With the changes in political and social conditions, or more fundamentally, the changes in the motives which inspired the population, the religious element was maintained, though later without the preliminary fasting. The custom was prevalent in other than the New England states but not always observed on the same day, nor in the same period of the year. It was not always a feast in thanks for some benefit received, but might take the form of fasting and prayers to avert some threatened calamity. The Colonial Governors had always set aside a day to celebrate a military victory, or as a day of mourning for a catastrophe, and with the outbreak of the Revolution such occasions became more frequent.

On November 1, 1777, we have the first approach to a National Thanksgiving Day Proclamation. It designated December 18 of that year as the occasion, and it is significant that in the language of the proclamation, "It is recommended to the Legislatures or Executive Powers of these United States, to set aside Thursday the 18th day of December next, for solemn thanksgiving and praise." The proclamation was signed by Henry Laurens, as president of the Continental Congress. Although the issuing of the proclamation was left to the States, the celebration was unified. It was halfway toward assuming a national significance.

It is seldom that a custom such as this continues for over three centuries, without owing a considerable obligation to the foremost character of that period during which it rises from the level of a local observance to the dignity of a national ceremony. Such a debt Thanksgiving owes to George Washington. It may be of interest to read what Washington wrote on the occasion which prompted the proclamation just mentioned. On October 18 of that year, being in Worcester Township, Pennsylvania, at the time, Washington issued a proclamation announcing the surrender of Burgoyne's Army. He concludes, "The Chaplains of the Army are to prepare short discourses suited to the joyful occasion, and to deliver them to their several corps and brigades at five o'clock this afternoon." Later, when on the march to Valley Forge, Washington ordered the observance of the day previously noted. His order issued on December 17, reads: "Tomorrow being the day set apart by the Honorable Congress for public thanksgiving and praise, and duty calling us devoutly to express our grateful acknowledgement to God for the manifold blessings he has granted us, the General directs that the Army remain in its present quarters and that the Chaplains perform divine service with their several corps and brigades, and earnestly exhorts all officers and soldiers whose absence is not indispensably necessary, to attend with reverence the solemnities of the day."

This type of proclamation is indicative of Washington's character. For him the occasion was definitely a religious one, a service of thanksgiving, and the varying fortunes of the Continental Army, it is not to be doubted that he would regularly express himself in this way. Certainly his letters indicate a deep religious nature, and an abiding trust in a higher power, such that his conception of thanksgiving would be that of a devotional exercise rather than a festival. As President in 1789, Washington issued the first National Thanksgiving Day Proclamation designating November the 26th of that year. It is interesting to note that this time there was no recommendation that the States assume the responsibility. The General who had led a ragged half-starved army to victory, now as President spoke to the nation. Thanksgiving had come of age; it was now a national event. Subsequently presidential proclamations were issued at irregular intervals until 1864, when Lincoln named the last Thursday in November, which has remained the official date since that time.

Our debt to George Washington is not limited to his military achievements. The first steps of the new nation in peace were as hazardous as the commitments of the colonies in war. The union formed for defense against the enemy from without, had to be cemented against dissension from within. To the genius of Washington's leadership in this period of doubt, the nation will ever be obligated. It is a most happy choice which permits us to close the celebration of the Bicentennial of his birth on a day when thankfulness may be most fittingly acknowledged, a day to which he gave the seal of its national character.

But it is, perhaps, the more social element of the occasion which has perpetuated it, and made for its greater popularity. The memory of tribulations is dimmed with time, and our sense of gratitude that we were able to endure may be submerged in an interest of the moment. Yet there remain the ties of family and kinfolk, the social group, "you all" as they say in the South. These ties are ever present and are tightened not only in adversity but in times of festival. The Puritans showed a keen sense of human nature when to the religious observance, they added the element of family reunion. It is often in a circle of closely-related individuals that the intangible values of an ideal, religious or cultural, may best be nurtured.

I feel that it is some such kinship by which we, members of a great American family, have been drawn here this evening. For many of us the more intimate interests of the home are on the other side of the ocean, but residing in a foreign land, we may join in this festival on the basis of our larger kinship, our nationality, and from the ideals which it represents, the memories which it evokes, we may experience a greater thankfulness for the advantages which we enjoy, derive an added courage for the work of reconstruction ahead of us, and acknowledge a greater pride in the privileges and obligations of our citizenship.

BICENTENNIAL EVENTS IN LEIPZIG

The great hall of the Rathaus in Leipzig was filled to capacity on February 22, 1932, as 100 Americans and 600 Germans assembled to commemorate the two hundredth anniversary of George Washington's birth in a program presented under the auspices of the Bicentennial Committee of Leipzig. The assembly room was especially decorated for the occasion with the flags of Germany and America, and the gathering represented highest officialdom of Leipzig and the Province of Saxony in addition to leaders in the fields of education and commerce. The program was broadcast to all parts of central Germany, including the Prussian province of Saxony, and the free states of Saxony, Thuringia and Anhalt.

The program was opened with Haydn's Concert in D-major, played by the Collegium Musicum of the University of Leipzig, a famous musical organization of 32 university students, under the direction of Dr. Helmut Schultz. Mrs. Valeska Wagner, an American concert singer, then sang "The Star Spangled Banner" while the audience stood in respectful silence.

United States Consul Ralph C. Busser next delivered a brief speech of welcome, thanking the people of Leipzig, on behalf of his compatriots, for the cooperation and hospitality always extended to Americans who came to the city. The Consul reviewed the close relations existing between Leipzig and the United States, and told of the great service which Germans had rendered in America from the time of the Revolutionary War to the present. The historical importance of George Washington was emphasized and his greatest work, Mr. Busser said, was his constant effort towards "the peaceful settlement of international disputes and the cultivation of friendly relations with other countries." The following is a translation in full of Consul Busser's remarks:

My brief remarks are chiefly to explain the purpose and scope of this celebration of the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington, the first President of the United States of America and regarded everywhere as the "Father of his Country."

Under the auspices of the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission, which was created by Congress and of which the President of the United States is the honorary chairman, anniversary celebrations have been organized in every city and town in the United States, also in many cities abroad where Americans are residing or sojourning. It is considered fitting that we also hold a celebration in Leipzig where so many Americans are students at the world-renowned educational institutions, especially the University of Leipzig, the Conservatory of Music, and the State Academy for Graphic Art and Book-making. Large numbers of American business men are attracted to Leipzig as the European center of the world's fur trade and as the principal seat of the lithographic printing and book-making industry of Germany. Visiting American wholesale buyers are particularly numerous during the Leipzig Spring and Autumn Trade Fairs.

On behalf of my compatriots who are now here or who have taken part in the commercial or cultural life of Leipzig, I take this occasion to express heartily our sincere thanks for the cooperation and hospitality always extended to Americans by the authorities of the Reich, of the Free States of this great region, and of the City of Leipzig; by the heads of the educational institutions, and also by the citizens of this great city. Through the kind cooperation of the Broadcasting Company we are able to extend this celebration to all parts of Central Germany, including also the Universities of Halle and Jena as well as the famous "Bauhaus" (School of Architecture) in Dessau, which are likewise attended by young Americans. Other famous destinations in Central Germany for traveling Americans are the classic city of Weimar with its Goethe, Schiller and Liszt memorials, as well as Erfurt, Eisenach and Wittenberg—famous for their Martin Luther shrines.

Thus through the residence and visits of Americans in Germany and of Germans in the United States, and the exchange of ideas, works and achievements in science, industry, music, literature, the drama and other arts, economic, cultural and spiritual ties are formed which lead to a better understanding between the peoples of the two countries.

We are assembled here today to honor the memory of Washington not merely for his great military achievements during the seven years war for American independence, but rather on account of the leading part he took in the making of the Federal Constitution and in the building of a united nation out of the thirteen states whose divergent policies at that time had first to be reconciled. Washington should also be honored for his great services while First President of the Republic toward the peaceful settlement of international disputes and in the cultivation of friendly relations with other countries. Throughout his distinguished public career Washington was never actuated by political ambition or other selfish motives, but accepted the most difficult tasks and the heaviest burdens—first of the supreme military command, and afterwards of the Presidency—only in response to the will of the American people and for the sake of his beloved country.

The thoughts of all my countrymen are expressed when I refer with gratitude to the splendid services rendered not only by General von Steuben and other German officers associated with Washington in the organization and campaigns of the American Army, but also by that great statesman Carl Schurz and other distinguished German-Americans who have contributed so much to the cultural, political and economic welfare and progress of the American people from the Colonial era down to the present time.

It is a special pleasure for me to express my thanks to those who spared neither time nor trouble in contributing their part to the success of this celebration. Finally I extend my heartiest thanks to all of you who have shown by the large attendance your sympathetic interest and co-operation in honoring the memory of our greatest American statesman.

RESPONSE BY DR. LOESER

Mayor Ewald Loeser, representing Head Mayor Goerdeler who was detained in Berlin on State business, replied to the remarks of Consul Busser by asserting that the qualities which George Washington so eminently exemplified were the same qualities needed by the world in 1932. Dr. Loeser spoke eloquently, as the following translation of his words shows:

There are a great many reciprocal relations between German history and George Washington. If I do not stress the historical memories, it is because I feel the present distress in Germany. Now that we Germans are in the midst of our hardest struggle for the preservation of our nation, it appears to me that the spirit of Washington is near to us Germans, or so it should be, at least.

Are not the qualities, which are lauded as the cardinal virtues of Washington's character—unselfishness, wisdom and courage—the same as those we need today more than at any other time in our history? It was neither ambition nor thirst for glory which influenced Washington, for only his sense of duty obliged the taciturn, lordly and well-to-do aristocrat (who doubtless would have preferred to continue devoting himself exclusively to his farms) to accept the office of military commander-in-chief and later on, the Presidency. Never was his courage in doubt; but this courage had a certain refinement which I desire to emphasize especially with regard to the Germany of today.

We are able to recognize in Washington how far cautious reserve and a cool head, whereby decisions were made only after careful consideration, are necessary to overcome the gravest dangers to a country.

Under this clear-headed, cautious, courageous, unselfish and wise leadership of Washington, the Americans won their freedom from a powerful enemy. By the same qualities they built up a united nation. I believe that we Germans of the year 1932 can learn a great deal from this man's life. In Washington's greatness, which is recognized by Americans and Germans alike, I feel the importance of the present celebration. I trust that this fête will help to increase the mutual knowledge of the history and heroes of both countries, and thereby the understanding between our peoples in order to promote mutual esteem and self-respect, agreement and self-support, international cooperation and national character.

The speaker of the day was Dr. Erich Brandenburg, professor of history at the University of Leipzig, the author of several standard works on German political history and one of Europe's most distinguished authorities on modern European history. In his address, Dr. Brandenburg gave an impressive picture of the personality of George Washington and his importance against the background of American history. The audience was reminded that the problems Washington faced during the Revolutionary War were such as could have been surmounted by no ordinary man, and America's debt to him was increased thereby. Part of the professor's interesting discourse has been translated as follows:

Washington was everything but a revolutionary; he was an aristocrat, a quiet, earnest and taciturn man, who seldom and unwillingly talked in public. When twenty years of age, Washington for the first time took part in the historic events of his country. He served brilliantly at the time of the unfortunate campaign of General Braddock against the French. In the year 1774 the Congress of the thirteen States assembled in Philadelphia. Washington attended as a delegate from Virginia and received from Congress in 1775, the supreme command of the American army, then already in the field against the British at Boston.

He was immediately confronted with the most difficult of problems. He had to conduct a war in an enormous country, thinly populated and almost without roads, with an army that hardly deserved the name, against a disciplined European army which was equipped with all the necessary military supplies. But he solved this problem by carefully conserving his military strength and economizing his small resources. Thus Washington was the most suitable commander in the situation in which he was placed.

When with the help of the French the War of Independence came to a victorious conclusion for America, Washington was unanimously elected first President of the United States which had been established through his achievements. As a statesman he also succeeded by wise measures in guiding the young republic through the first difficult years. Thus Washington has become the Father of his Country and to all Americans is still the ideal of a true republican.

At the conclusion of Dr. Brandenburg's remarks Mrs. Valeska Wagner sang the ode "Die Allmacht" by Franz Schubert, and the Collegium Musicum played the overture from "Claudine von Villa bella" by the same composer to bring the commemoration to a fitting close.

The celebration was organized by the Leipzig Bicentennial Committee consisting of Consul Busser, chairman; Dr. H. Earle Blunt, Theodore W. Knauth, Dr. Samuel A. Nock, and Sidney Rosenthal. Associated with them was an honorary committee consisting of 21 distinguished citizens of Leipzig, mostly government authorities or heads of the leading educational institutions in the city.

MUNICH CELEBRATES BICENTENNIAL

In the city of Munich, seat of one of Germany's great universities, the 200th anniversary of George Washington's birth was commemorated on February 22, 1932, in a program which, according to the MUNCHENER STADTZEITUNG, leading Munich newspaper, "was more than an act of courtesy and had a deeper meaning than merely that of a gesture to the country across the ocean." The celebration was held in the "old Rathaus hall" under the auspices of the Bavarian State Government, the City Council of Munich, the American Consulate General and the Deutsche Akademie.

"The historic hall," continued the item in the paper named above, "was adorned with the American flag, surrounded by the colors of the old and new German Reich, Bavaria and the city of Munich. A picture of George Washington, copied from the painting in the White House, lent by the Municipal Gallery of Art, looked out from the laurel surrounding it over the distinguished assembly in which old political, economic and cultural circles of Munich were represented."

The Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra of Munich, under the leadership of Adolf Mennerich, opened the celebration with an overture from Mozart after which six five-minute speeches were given by eminent German officials.

The first speaker was Dr. Gürtner, Bavarian State Minister of Justice, representing the Bavarian State, who spoke of George Washington as a personality whose "light radiates far beyond his home country." "In every place where there are people who honor human greatness," Dr. Gürtner asserted, "they will share in this day. The Bavarian State Government congratulates America on its great son, of whom it has been truly said that he was 'first in war, first in peace and first in the hearts of his countrymen.'"

MAYOR SCHARNAGL'S ADDRESS

Dr. Karl Scharnagl, Mayor of Munich, then spoke in tribute to the "fine American Colony standing in close social and cultural relations with Munich and its inhabitants," and said further, "whenever we joyfully remember the successful cooperation of the American intellectual life with our own efforts, we will never forget the great leader to whom the United States owes its origin."

On behalf of the educational institutions of the city, Dr. Demoll, rector of the University of Munich, extended greetings to the Americans and voiced the expectation that in the celebration of George Washington's birth anniversary, Germany and the United States would be drawn nearer together.

World economy in connection with the name of George Washington was considered by Joseph Pschorr, president of the Chamber of Industry and Commerce. The cordial business relations existing between residents of Munich and Americans were cited as one of the bonds uniting the United States and Germany in international friendliness.

Interesting personal recollections of visits to America, which began in 1880, were then given by Dr. Oskar von Miller, founder of the German Museum in Munich. Every one who knows Washington's country, said the doctor, becomes an admirer of America; and every one who knows the Americans becomes the friend of America.

The reverend Dr. Frederick M. Kirkus, pastor of the American Church in Munich, spoke briefly of the sterling qualities which made George Washington one of the greatest figures in world history.

The speaker of the day was Dr. Carl F. Wittke of the history department of the Ohio State University. Dr. Wittke was in Germany on the invitation of the Deutsche Akademie to participate in the German celebrations of Washington's birth by lecturing in different parts of the country on the life of the great American. Giving a summary of the professor's address, the MUNCHENER STADTZEITUNG said:

Dr. Wittke drew a wonderfully portrayed picture of the historical development of the United States with George Washington in the center as the great moral force in the American Revolution and peaceful colonization. In thoughtful sentences the speaker challenged one to study the history of the United States, for a new spiritual horizon seeks to encompass the world. If America today is slowly coming to the consciousness that it can not live without Europe, the same is true of Europe. President Hoover once said that without order in Europe we will never be able to overcome our depression. Americans always value "fair play." No nation in the world in distress and misery has ever sought America's help in vain. America is, however, bound to the German people by closest interests. The speaker hoped that the celebration would give a happy occasion for mutual study of each other, the result of which would be a mirror of the truth in which one nation should see the other as it really is.

The impressive act of thrilling exchange of speeches reached its climax in these statements. As one man, the assembly arose and, deeply moved, took up the national anthems of the two nations, so far separated, so near in their wishes.

BANQUET IS GIVEN

After the celebration in the Rathaus, Munich society and the American Colony betook themselves to the Hotel Bayerischer Hof where a sumptuous banquet awaited them. The great hall was decorated appropriately as had been the room in the Rathaus, with German and American flags.

United States Consul General Charles M. Hathaway heartily welcomed the numerous guests, speaking first in German and then in English. Mr. Hathaway said:

For tonight we have had enough of speaking—hard as it is for us to admit that there can ever be enough of such friendly words of greeting and sympathy as we have heard at the Rathaus, such eloquent and scholarly discourse as Professor Wittke has given us. Yet there comes a time when we can not longer listen, when we remember that though speech may be silver, silence is golden, and food more precious than diamonds. I shall not then add much to our treasure of silver, but rather to our treasure of gold—even more suitable in these times of general scarcity of this international golden money, silence.

But I cannot let the occasion pass without expressing formally and publicly the gratitude and appreciation of the American community in Munich and of the American nation at home for all that has been done in Munich to make the occasion notable: first to the Bavarian State Government for their sympathetic cooperation, to the authorities of the city of Munich who have carried the main burden of the arrangements—especially to the Oberbürgermeister who has given it much personal attention, to the University and the other educational authorities who have so effectively cooperated in making the occasion a noteworthy success.

Last—but not least—I must be allowed a special word of appreciation to the Deutsche Akademie which conceived the happy idea of bringing an American scholar to Germany to deliver a series of lectures on Washington and his times in commemoration of this anniversary. Than this, it seems to me, no better way can be found, indeed no other means so valuable for the end in view, the better understanding of American life and character in Germany. I must therefore congratulate the Deutsche Akademie heartily on their fruitful initiative, and on their happy selection of a lecturer in Professor Wittke, whom it gives us particular pleasure to see among us tonight.

I want also to express my hearty sympathy with the further plan of the Akademie to perpetuate this seed corn of international comprehension—for comprehension is in the last analysis the basis of peace—by the establishment of a permanent professorship of American history and institutions in one of the German Universities—two even if the endowment could be had. That is the obstacle, an ample endowment must first be found. That notwithstanding the general collapse of values, which makes the most of us poorer than ever, somebody will appear, some specimen perhaps of that fabulous European animal, the traditional "rich American," who can and will endow these chairs to the permanent gain of both nations, I confidently hope.

And now I raise my glass and ask you to join with me in pledging the memory of him whom we call the Father of our country, that great symbol of solid character, George Washington.

TELLS OF AMERICAN TRAITS

Dr. Franz Goldenberger, Bavarian State Minister for Religion and Education, responded to the remarks of the Consul General in terms of hearty friendliness. He pointed out that two of the most prominent traits of every American were love of country and respect and admiration for George Washington. The speaker mentioned with deep appreciation the help which Americans had given to the promotion of art exhibitions in Munich and reminded his audience that the year 1932, anniversary of Washington's birth and of Goethe's death, symbolized the lasting friendship between Germany and the United States.

To conclude the program, Dr. Friedrich von Müller, President of the Deutsche Akademie, discussed the plans of the organization for promoting understanding between the two nations. A fitting climax to his remarks was reached in his presentation of an appointment as corresponding honorary member of the Deutsche Akademie to Dr. Wittke. Dr. Wittke fittingly responded and the Philharmonic Orchestra played the national anthems of Germany and America.

The lecture tour which Dr. Wittke made under the auspices of the Deutsche Akademie was referred to by Consul General Hathaway in a communication to the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission as one of the most permanently effective features of the observance of the Bicentennial in Germany. The Consul General reported that the programs in Munich were marked by good feeling and friendliness.

Munich also joined Berlin, Darmstadt, Dresden, and other cities which named or renamed streets and squares in honor of George Washington by selecting a street in the 23rd district of the city, connecting the Nibelungenstrasse and the Steubenplatz, to bear the name Washingtonstrasse.

The Bicentennial Committee for Munich was headed by Consul General Hathaway, as chairman, and consisted of Ross Parker, Dr. Franz Koempel, Professor Camillo von Klenze, and Dr. Charles E. Curry. The Consul General gave due credit, however, to the German officials under whose auspices the celebration in the Rathaus was held. Writing to the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission on May 18, 1932, Mr. Hathaway said:

"The prime mover in organizing this meeting was the Mayor of Munich, Dr. Karl Scharnagl, but he was ably seconded by representatives of the Bavarian State Government and received the hearty support, so far as I was able to observe, of the various elements which took part in the affair."

It was found impossible by the committee to hold further Bicentennial celebrations in Munich, and with these splendid observances the commemoration of George Washington's birth was concluded.

STUTTGART FOUNDS MEMORIAL LIBRARY

One of the most interesting features of the Bicentennial Celebration in Germany which, at the same time, is expected to prove of lasting value, was carried out in Stuttgart on Washington's birthday, February 22, 1932, when a collection of American books forming the nucleus of what is to be known as the George Washington Memorial Library was presented to the Technische Hochschule in ceremonies honoring America's First President.

This library was the result of the efforts of the United States Consul General at Stuttgart, Leon Dominian, together with Conrad Bareiss and Dr. Erich Rassbach, Americans residing in Stuttgart. Robert Bosch, prominent German industrialist of Stuttgart, also contributed substantially to the initial fund raised for the project.

The library, as presented to the Stuttgart school on Washington's birthday, consisted of 350 American books and $5,000. That sum was later increased, and Mr. Dominian wrote that it was the intention of the committee to add to this so as to create an endowment of $100,000. The interest from the fund will be used yearly to purchase American books and pay the expenses of a librarian.

"I have the impression," wrote Consul General Dominian to the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission on February 23, 1932, "that an American library in this section of Southern Germany will fill a real want and that through its founding the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington has been celebrated in appropriate fashion in this city. . . . There has come into being in this city an American institution which will afford opportunity for Germans to acquire knowledge of the work and achievements of Americans in all branches of human activity."

The selection of this means to honor the memory of George Washington was made after Mr. Dominian and his associates on the Bicentennial committee for Stuttgart, formed in May, 1931, had considered several alternate proposals, including the sending of German young men to an American university. The founding of the library, it was decided, would be of benefit to a greater number of people than any other project suggested.

bration had been sent out to the Württemberg State Ministry of Education, officials of the United States Consulate, faculty members, and students of the Technische Hochschule, and prominent residents of Stuttgart. The hall, especially decorated for the occasion, was well filled to attest the interest which the program awakened in Stuttgart.

A beautiful reproduction of the Gilbert Stuart portrait of George Washington, presented by the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission, was prominently displayed with the books comprising the library.

Dr. Rothmund inaugurated the ceremony with a brief introductory speech in which he stated the reason for the gathering and paid tribute to the memory of George Washington. The rector said:

The representatives of the Ministry of Education, as well as the Faculty and the delegation of students of the Technische Hochschule, have assembled here today with the members of the American Consulate and a few other guests in order to give the memory of the great American commander and statesman, George Washington, who was born on this date two hundred years ago at Bridges Creek on the banks of the Potomac, an imperishable abode in our institution. On this day the American nation in every part of its country is commemorating with a feeling of pride and adoration the greatest of its sons, who has been the first in war, the first in peace, and the first in the hearts of his fellow-countrymen. Those Americans who are at present residing in foreign countries are also desirous of seeing the memory of their great statesman worthily celebrated abroad. In this connection a committee for the two hundredth anniversary was formed two years ago in Berlin under the honorary presidency of the American Ambassador Sackett. In Stuttgart the committee consisted of Consul General Dominian, Dr. Rassbach and our honorary Senator, Mr. Bareiss. To the committee in Stuttgart we are indebted for the plan of establishing at our institution an extensive American library, accessible to the whole country and Reich, bearing the name of George Washington, to whose memory it is devoted.

On July 1 of last year we were first informed of this plan by members of the committee at a meeting of the Small Senate, and today we are permitted to accept the fruits of the work which has been done in the meantime to realize this plan.

On behalf of the Senate of the Hochschule I wish to welcome all our guests most heartily and thank them for honoring us with their presence. It is a great pleasure for us to be able to welcome in our midst on this festival day of the American nation Consul General Dominian and Mrs. Dominian and the other members of the festival committee, as well as the vice consuls of the American Consulate, whose presence at our celebration is highly esteemed.

TELLS OF TRIP TO AMERICA

At the conclusion of this brief address Dr. Rothmund introduced Dr. Paul Sakmann, a member of the faculty of the Hochschule who had specialized in a study of Emerson and who had visited in the United States. Dr. Sakmann gave an interesting account of his trip to America and spoke of the part played by American citizens of German descent in various periods of United States history. A translation of Dr. Sakmann's speech follows:

This is not the first time that America has been mentioned in this circle, for not long ago we were told by experts of the wonders of American technics which they had studied in the United States and especially of the manner in which the enormous volumes of traffic are handled by American cities. There are also men among us at this time who by reason of their education and experience are well qualified to speak of the marvelous economic life of the New World and the striking development of the machine age there. It is not for me, unfamiliar as I am with such subjects, to speak of them; it is more suitable that I should be satisfied with wondering at the miracle of them. On the other hand, it would be most presumptuous of me to speak exhaustively of my own theme: the American and the German mind and their points of contact. You will therefore, perhaps, kindly permit me to give a few personal reminiscences of my trip to America in a spirit which I hope will in no wise detract from the purpose of our meeting.

It was six years ago on a serene, sunny day in summer, which I shall never forget, that I stood on the bridge over the Concord River of which the poet sings:

"Where once the embattled farmers stood
And fired the shot heard round the world."

In this shot which echoed "round the world" the American farmers signalled the opening of "the most just and the noblest of all revolutions which the world has seen." They opened the war of principles out of which George Washington was to emerge the victorious hero. "If ever men in arms entered on a stainless cause, it was they—it was he."

Across the river stood the gray ivy-covered parsonage—the Old Manse of Hawthorne which Emerson's father had built; a spot as sacred to the American mind as the places where Goethe and Schiller have lived and worked are to the German. Mindful of the saying that whoever would understand the poet must go to the poet's home or his tomb, I turned my steps toward the quietness of Sleepy Hollow, the resting place of Ralph Waldo Emerson. To my mind came once again the admonitions of the great American philosopher to scorn trifles, to take high aims, and to do that which the weak heart is afraid to do. I seemed to hear his voice repeating maxims, many of which I have no doubt were inspired by the sublimity of George Washington's character.

Not far from Concord is the great city of Boston, the heart of the great state of Massachusetts, a commonwealth which Emerson called the "Germany of the States," because with all her factories she is still mindful of her culture, and like Germany has maintained a balance between her economic and mental life. There are the symbols of educational advancement and culture in the elm-shaded, spacious courts of Harvard University in nearby Cambridge, the alma mater of so many great Americans. There also are symbols of political growth such as Faneuil Hall, the historic meeting place where so often free speech has inspired brave deeds.

I journeyed to the west over the prairies, over the plains of Ohio, Indiana and Illinois. And if these great plains lack the romance and glamor one finds elsewhere, they possess that special charm which Emerson found expressed in the word "serenity." Westward I went to Wisconsin, and there in the university town of Madison, surrounded by hills and lakes, I found the palace of a library, the magnificent campus, and the shadowy avenues which made me feel content as if surrounded by the atmosphere of home.

But with all these new impressions of a new country, and I only name a few, they could never lead entirely away from the Old World. Too many ties there are leading back and forth and intertwining themselves in indissoluble bonds. Beginning with Washington himself we find these bonds being forged. He spoke of the "loyal Dutch belt" in which he included particularly the "Pennsylvania Dutch" who were in reality Germans with an already enviable reputation established in their defense of the colonial frontier. It was this type of Germans who formed Washington's bodyguard during most of the war; and twelve of these riders escorted the great Virginian to his peaceful home at Mount Vernon after his well-performed war service.

It has been said of one of Napoleon's marshals that he was "le bras droit de l'Empereur." Washington had a "right arm," also, in the person of the former adjutant of Frederick the Great, Baron von Steuben. A great American historian has written that the resistance which the provincial troops were able to offer to the first military power of Europe was nothing short of a wonder; and the sole explanation of this wonder is to be found in the personality of the man who was their leader. In the accomplishment of this wonder our own von Steuben had an important part—a fact which Washington himself appreciated as may be seen from his many expressions regarding the Baron. It was during the bitter and disconsolate winter at Valley Forge in the third year of the war that von Steuben hammered the desperate provincials into a well organized army, drilling the troops himself in the snow and mud. Later it was the doughty old general who stood in command in the American trenches before Yorktown when the enemy colors were lowered to the banner with the stripes and the stars.

Nearer to present times than these memories of the historic past are the ties of American-German friendship found in the city of Milwaukee, the most "German city" in the United States, the city of Karl Schurz. Karl Schurz it was who served as the "right arm" of another American President, the immortal Emancipator, Abraham Lincoln. The most prominent, Karl Schurz was still only one of the more than 500,000 native Germans or Americans of German extraction who fought in this war for the preservation of the union.

What a great number of Germans have gone to the new world to become loyal and valuable citizens of the United States. Many of them have left their homeland during times of distress to acquire modest prosperity in the land of their adoption. Under these happier circumstances many of them have returned to Germany to visit with relatives and to tell wonderful tales of the enchanted land of America. There is not a single Swabian village which cannot boast many such American cousins. The ocean which separates the two countries is deep and wide, but a warm "gulf-stream" flows from one to the other—a stream of intermingled blood which has poured a rich and valuable element into the "melting-pot" of the new nation.

There are other bonds between Germany and America—bonds of spirit and of a common fate. The poets and leaders of thought in the two countries have had much in common; and our two nations, perhaps more than any others, have passed through the greatest revolution of the occident at the same pace. We have not yet emerged from the revolution, this economic and industrial crisis, but we seem to be in the final phase. It has us involved in the same problem the rest of the world is facing. I do not doubt for a moment that we shall emerge from the conflict victorious; but we shall do so only through our joint efforts and by a mutual understanding.

The generous endowment with which our school is being presented today is one of those fine manifestations of friendship and good will which will do more than anything else to enhance this mutual understanding. We all know from our research experience in our own fields how highly valuable are the achievements of the American mind. Perhaps it is not too presumptuous to feel that we Germans have also contributed to the enrichment of American life; and in this interchange of ideas and experience lies the means of overcoming all misunderstanding and dangerous superficial conceptions. How splendid it is that in the gift of this memorial library, dedicated to the memory of America's great leader, the future leaders of Germany who will come from this school shall have the opportunity of acquiring such valuable knowledge of American achievements! We are proud of the fact that after Boston with its German Museum and Berlin with its Amerika-Institut will come Stuttgart with its George Washington Memorial Library of the Technische Hochschule.

AMERICAN CONSUL PRESENTS LIBRARY

At the conclusion of Dr. Sakmann's address United States Consul General Leon Dominian was introduced to make the formal presentation of the library to the school. Mr. Dominian told of the considerations which had led the Bicentennial Committee in Stuttgart, with the cooperation of the faculty of the Technische Hochschule, to select this means of honoring George Washington's memory in the Capital City of the State of Württemberg. Speaking of Washington himself, Mr. Dominian recalled that the great American was an engineer, a surveyor by profession—a fact of interest to the faculty and students of a technical institution of learning. The Consul General said:

The members of the Stuttgart Committee of the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission have great pleasure in finding that they are able to put into execution on this auspicious day the plan which they had conceived last summer and which was discussed in the Kleiner Senat of the Technische Hochschule on July 1 of last year. As you know, the Committee was formed to commemorate in Stuttgart in a fitting manner the Bicentennial of the birth of our first president and great statesman—George Washington. Among the many projects for an appropriate celebration the one that appealed to its members most was to found in this city a library which would bear the name of one who is inseparably connected with the founding of the first republic on the American continent and who because of his eminence has been recognized as one of the great figures of history.

The Committee is grateful to the authorities of the Technische Hochschule for its co-operation in providing space within its own Library for the books forming part of the George Washington Memorial Library, and it is a pleasure to think that this Library is to be part of the Library of the Technische Hochschule where the Committee feels it will be in safe and appropriate custody.

It is pleasant for me to recall here that in addition to the readiness with which the Senate of the Technische Hochschule expressed its willingness to accept this Library, the bringing together of these works and the laying of the foundation of a collection of American books in this city was made possible by the generosity of public-spirited citizens, among whom it is my pleasant duty to mention the names of my fellow-workers on the Committee, Mr. Conrad Bareiss and Dr. Rassbach. I also want to mention Mr. Robert Bosch, a grand figure in the industry of this State and a friend of your institute, whose generosity and interest were most helpful.

Above all, I find it gratifying to think that you, Magnificent Rector and the members of the Faculty of this institution, are in agreement with the idea which the donors of these books to the Technische Hochschule had in mind; namely, that they were providing a means for the enhancing of the friendly relations now existing between Germany and the United States. We must consider it of favorable augury that both American and German citizens have joined in the founding of this Library. The books which will form the George Washington Memorial Library are intended to give you a picture of the United States, of American life, history and manifold activity to the end that increasing familiarity with my country and the life of its citizens will lead to better appreciation of American ideals. We know that this must be so because in our own country there is no lack of collections of works on Germany and on Germans through which it has been possible for Americans to appreciate the development and the extent of German civilization and German progress.

That this library of American works should be founded on the day on which Americans honor the memory of their first president and great revolutionary leader and that this collection of books should find place in a technical school such as the Technische Hochschule must not be considered as a mere coincidence but as a connection which is eminently fitting since George Washington was by profession an engineer and a surveyor. The accounts of his early manhood give details of his activity first as a surveyor's assistant and later as a surveyor in a country in which colonization and settlement of land was going on at a rapid pace. His diaries of that period reveal the faith he had in the value of lands extending to the West into the heart of the continent.

I may therefore with propriety dwell today on some of his enterprises as an engineer. One of the earliest undertakings with which he was connected was a reclamation project of the marshes known as the Dismal Swamp to make fit for cultivation a large tract of land in southeastern Virginia through the building of one or more canals to carry off the surplus water. After the close of the Revolutionary War his records reveal his connection with the Potomac River Company, a public engineering enterprise of considerable importance in that day to clear the Potomac River of rocks and to build canals and locks around its several falls so as to promote navigation in that section. We may remember that he lived just before the birth of the machinery period and that engineering enterprises which he was interested in both as a business man and as engineer were carried on with methods which today would be considered very primitive. This period was one of canals and roads, and to the development of both he gave considerable impetus.

It is the characteristic of great men to be universal and comprehensive in their thoughts and Washington's great mind was no exception to the rule. Those who know him merely as a military leader should not overlook the fact that he was a patron of education and that, while not trained in any university or college, he was a man who constantly turned to books for new knowledge. He thus educated and improved himself throughout life. He had a remarkable library and we find the following statement in one of his letters: "I conceive that a knowledge of books is the basis on which all other knowledge rests." It was his interest in education which led him to contribute to the schooling expenses of nephews and the sons of many of his friends. The records we have of his life reveal that in many instances he had paid for the education of young boys, who, he thought, showed unusual promise. His interest for education was so great that he devoted six pages to the subject in his will. In that same will he made provision for schools, colleges and universities. These are generally unknown phases of his rich and active life which it is appropriate to remember today in founding the Library in this city which will bear his name.

In turning over this Library to the Technische Hochschule together with the funds donated for its use and amounting to $5,000, as I now have the pleasure to do, Magnificent Rector, I may be allowed to read the text of the resolution which was adopted by the Stuttgart Committee of the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission:

"In order to increase friendly relations between the United States and Germany, and to commemorate fittingly the Bicentennial of Washington's birth, the Stuttgart Committee of the George Washington Bicentennial Commission, consisting of American Consul General Leon Dominian, Dr. Erich Rassbach, and Mr. Conrad Bareiss, decided to found a Library of American books in the city of Stuttgart, to be known as the George Washington Memorial Library, and to present this Library to the Technische Hochschule. In witness whereof the members of the committee have affixed hereunto their signatures. Done in the city of Stuttgart the 22nd of February, 1932."

There are two points to which I want to make allusion before concluding my remarks. One is the hope of the founders of this Library that their desire to increase the friendly relations between our respective countries will always be borne in mind by its administrators. The other is that whatever has been done so far must be considered by you as a beginning. We are giving life today to a project which may eventually deserve more ambitious consideration and which, we believe, will provide opportunity for the creation of an institution of ampler proportion than the modest collection of books which I have had the pleasure of presenting to the Technische Hochschule in the name of the George Washington Bicentennial Commission for the use of its professors and students as well as any one else interested in American topics. In order to further the development of the Library in the spirit in which it was conceived the Stuttgart Committee of the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission proposes to resolve itself from now on into a Library Committee together with members of the Faculty of the Technische Hochschule, and I can only conclude by wishing the best of success to this enterprise which, I hope, will remain as a symbol in the city of Stuttgart of the friendship between our countries.

SPEECH OF ACCEPTANCE

Dr. Rothmund accepted, on behalf of the faculty and students of the Technische Hochschule, the gift of the memorial library. Expressing the appreciation of himself and his associates, Dr. Rothmund spoke highly of the service rendered by Consul General Dominian in pushing the enterprise to its conclusion. The speaker referred to George Washington's own interest in the education of young people, and told of his bequests, enumerated in Washington's will, to educational institutions. The rector called the attention of the audience to the fact that the University of Tübingen, situated so near Stuttgart as to be almost a part of the city, had that day conferred upon United States Ambassador Sackett the honorary degree of doctor of jurisprudence and political science to become one of the first German universities thus to honor the ambassador. Dr. Rothmund's words have been translated as follows:

The Technische Hochschule expresses through me its sincerest and warmest thanks to you and the other members of the Committee and donors for the generous gift which you have just presented to our University with the express purpose of advancing the friendly relations between the United States and Germany, and in this manner to commemorate in Württemberg the bicentennial anniversary of George Washington's birth. At the same time I wish to thank you cordially for the friendly words which accompanied the inauguration. They have found a keen response in us.

It is something unusual for the representatives of a state abroad to prepare and consummate the celebration of the memory of one of their great men with such zeal and devotion in a foreign country, and it is of especial significance that they desire his name also to be perpetuated abroad by means of donations. We are filled with the profoundest appreciation and the greatest respect for the exemplary faithfulness and boundless admiration with which they in this manner pay tribute to their greatest statesman, and we may conclude that they are placing an exceptional amount of confidence in us by instituting such a foundation with us. This foundation will be an institution of perpetual value for you and for us and therefore carries with it the confident expectation that the friendly relations which, since the World War have been re-established between our people, will always endure. It is likewise an expression of the high esteem in which our University is held by you. This is the great ideal value which we perceive in your donation and as we accept it gratefully at your hands we look into the future with you, full of confidence and trust. We are confident that the economic conditions in your land as well as in ours will improve in the near future and that it will be possible to continue what we have begun today. The hope to make our American library an institution known and used in all Germany as a medium for the knowledge of American institutions and life, science and research, aspirations and accomplishments, to be mentioned also with pride and pleasure in the United States as a scientific institution from which keen reciprocal relations will be formed between American and German scientists, investigators, engineers and economists. We have accepted your plan with pleasure and enthusiasm because we see a great end in its fulfilment which is worthy of all efforts. We are pleased that you are prepared to co-operate in a special committee in the further pursuance of this aim, and we hope that the Swabian tenacity which we are determined to put into the service of this undertaking will be a source of real pleasure to you.

We accept your generous donation with a feeling of profound gratitude to all donors but also with full realization of the responsibility and duties which come to us with it and with the determination to cherish and care for the tender offspring which we may, through your kindness, hand over to our alma mater on the day of George Washington's two hundredth birthday so that it will grow and flourish to be an honor to the man whose great name it bears.

I have a second idea in mind which I wish to convey to you and all present members of your country in the name of all present: your eyes are directed more than ever toward your home country on this holiday of the United States. You justly expect from us, amongst whom you have so long been active, that we share your admiration for your great statesman and the happy and lofty feelings which are filling you today. In this regard I may assure you that we are feeling the necessity of standing at your side today and partaking inwardly in your celebration and thus afford you a share of that "Native Land" feeling here with us. It is on the basis of such sentiments that I ask you to accept our sincerest good wishes for the great nation which you represent on this memorial day. We are pleased that the University of Tübingen is among the first German universities to grant Ambassador Sackett an honorary doctor's degree today and thereby express in an outward manner the declaration of the deep internal reaction of Swabia to the commemoration day of the American people and the respect and esteem for their official representatives in Germany.

You, Consul General, have in your speech been so kind as to show, from Washington's life, what he accomplished in engineering both by personal activity and inspiration; his work in draining and cultivating a large swamp region in southeastern Virginia by means of drainage canals, as well as the work of making the Potomac and James Rivers navigable, which was carried out at his instigation. I may add that this undertaking may also be traced back to Washington's great interest in science, as mentioned by you. Potomac and James shares, which had been presented to him by the legislative committee of Virginia, were included in his estate and designated by will to be used "in the erection of a University in one of the central regions of the United States."

In considering the life and work of this great man from every side we find not only points of similarity but also strong parallels to our own times. We are stirred by the faithfulness and devotion with which Washington was prepared to serve his people and fatherland as leader both during the most agitated war times and in peace, as long as they needed him. Modesty, strictest sincerity and sense of duty, tenacity and alertness, diligence, courage and endurance built up the great nature of this born leader who in spite of the greatest party enmity remained firm at his post and from his high moral watch-tower constantly kept in mind and successfully pursued the aim of leading his people to happiness, power and prosperity.

A comparison with our own times and the great concern about the successful leading of our people through the immense dangers help us to recognize more clearly the outlines and the luminous appearance of this leader of your nation and to unite our great admiration and veneration for him with yours. We therefore gladly and confidently join in your desire that peaceful and friendly relations may always exist between our countries and may further our work begun today in honor of George Washington's memory.

BUST OF WASHINGTON TO BE MADE

The presentation of the George Washington Memorial Library was favorably received by the citizens of Stuttgart, and the press of the city contained many articles referring to it as a "fine endowment." Throughout all of Southern Germany the gift was favorably commented upon.

Consul General Dominian advised the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission in a letter dated July 25, 1932, that the trustees of the Memorial Library had decided to have a marble bust of George Washington made by a talented young sculptor of Stuttgart. The bust was to be made of the finest marble and was to be given a permanent place of prominence in the library.

Cameron Forbes, American Ambassador; Prince Iyesato Tokugawa, President of the Japanese House of Peers, and Mr. E. W. Frazar, Chairman of the Executive Committee of the Central George Washington Bicentennial Committee of Japan.

JAPAN

JAPANESE in large numbers joined resident Americans in memorable celebrations of the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington in Japan. Prince Iyesato Tokugawa, president of the House of Peers, and Princess Iyesato Tokugawa, served with the American Ambassador, Mr. W. Cameron Forbes, and Mrs. Forbes, as honorary patrons of an elaborate and colorful central celebration in the Tokyo and Yokohama district, while similar celebrations were being held in many other parts of the Empire of the Rising Sun.

The Japanese celebrations were varied in character. There were public meetings, receptions, dinners, plays and pageants, special entertainments for children, radio addresses, musical programs, essay contests in the Japanese schools, and special editions of Japanese newspapers.

A composite organization, under the title of The George Washington Bicentennial Celebration in Japan, was organized in Tokyo with E. W. Frazar as chairman, R. Kurokawa and William Hirzel as vice chairmen, and Richard P. Aiken as secretary and treasurer.

This committee reported in 1931 that it had found every American society, organization and club "eager to lend its support."

"American business firms have aided greatly in such matters as importation of the various properties from the United States and supply of materials," declared the committee in a published announcement.

"Individual citizens from practically every section of society have freely offered and given their time and help, and most gratifying of all has been the generous support and whole-hearted cooperation of a large group of Japanese, whose participation in this celebration has been warmly welcomed by the Americans."

The participating organizations, with their delegated representatives, in the Tokyo and Yokohama district were as follows:

American-Japan Society, Y. Iwanaga, Lt. Col. J. G. McIlroy; American Association of Tokyo, William Hirzel, Richard P. Aiken, W. R. Farley; American Association of Yokohama, E. W. Frazar, G. N. Coe, E. J. Dorsz; Columbia Society, J. R. Conrad, W. R. Devin, S. J. Albright; American Club, Tokyo, C. F. Thomas, J. R. Reifsnider, W. K. Fowler, Jr.; American Merchants Association, C. F. Thomas, E. L. Pennell, R. B. DeMallie.

CENTRAL CELEBRATION IN TOKYO

The principal celebration in this district was held on February 22 at the Hibiya Kokaido, or Public Hall, in Tokyo. THE JAPAN ADVERTISER, of Tokyo, on February 23, published a detailed report of this opening celebration. This account which was sent to the Department of State by the American Ambassador as part of his official report, began as follows:

The George Washington Bicentennial, which has been so long anticipated by the Tokyo community, was held with outstanding success yesterday afternoon and evening at the Hibiya Public Hall.

The patrons, Prince and Princess Iyesato Tokugawa, the American Ambassador, Mr. W. Cameron Forbes, and Mrs. Waldo Forbes, were all present at the affair, and Mr. E. W. Frazar, chairman of the executive committee, to whom the success of the affair was due in large measure, was on hand to welcome the guests who came to both the afternoon and evening performances.

Many other prominent persons were present, including the Belgian Ambassador and Baroness de Bassompierre, General Gaishi Nagaoka, Viscountess Berryer, Mrs. Teixeira de Mattos, the Misses Mary and Alice Lindley, several others of the British Embassy and nearly all the members of the American Embassy. The American army and navy officers all came in full dress uniform, which in combination with the period costumes of the women, added much to the picturesqueness of the occasion.

The children, according to the account in the JAPAN ADVERTISER, began arriving at 5 o'clock in the afternoon and were greeted by ushers in full costumes of the eighteenth century. They were led through a lobby, strikingly decorated with red, white and blue with crossed American and Japanese flags forming the central note, and downstairs to the supper room.

Supper for the children was served shortly after 5 o'clock. They were then treated to a series of sound picture cartoons in the Little Theatre, which is in the basement of Hibiya Hall. The movie program began at 7 o'clock, in the main auditorium. This was a picture entitled "George Washington,

His Life and Times," and was sent to Japan by the Eastman Kodak Company, having been especially prepared by that organization at the request of the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission. The newspaper comments:

The scenes of the Battle of Lexington, the holding of Concord Bridge and of Washington crossing the Delaware were especially outstanding, and the entire film was an education to witness.

ROOMS GAYLY DECORATED

After the movie program, guests began arriving for the evening program. This started with supper served in two of the dining rooms, because the crowd was too great to be handled in one, as was originally planned. The dining rooms were gayly decorated, the centerpieces on the tables being composed of red, white and blue flowers. A special table was reserved for the honorary patrons, who were seated with the American Counsellor, Mr. E. L. Neville; the American Military Attaché and Mrs. J. G. McIlroy; Bishop and Mrs. C. S. Reifsnider, and others.

Attractive hand-painted menu cards were found on each table, these being the work of Mrs. R. S. Bratton, Mrs. Elmer Pennell, and Miss Seko, all members of the supper committee, the chairman of which was Mrs. E. L. Neville.

During the supper for the grown-ups, a marionette show was given for the children in the Little Theatre by the Osaka troupe of marionette performers, who were hired especially for the occasion.

The evening performance began shortly after 8 o'clock and was preceded by a short address of welcome from Mr. E. W. Frazar, who called upon both the American Ambassador and Prince Tokugawa to say a few words.

Mr. Frazar, dressed in a Colonial costume of blue satin, greeted the guests in the main auditorium, acting in his capacity as chairman of the function. He began his address by saying that the guests had assembled for the American Jimmu Tenno, the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of the Father and Founder of the United States. He remarked upon the fact that cities and towns all over the United States were celebrating this anniversary of America's great patriot, and that at the suggestion of the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission, created by Congress, Americans abroad were taking part in commemorative ceremonies.

Mr. Frazar said that when the Bicentennial Committee was appointed in Tokyo many plans were proposed and discussed, and the present one finally evolved as being the most typical American celebration. He spoke of the cooperation of the America-Japan Society, without which the celebration would not have been possible. He then mentioned the other American organizations which had agreed to cooperate in the enterprise—the American Associations of Tokyo and Yokohama, the Columbia Society, the American Club, and the American Merchants Association.

He said that the outstanding purpose of the committee, formed of members of the six organizations, was to have a function which might be a memorable one to the children of the community. Hence the early hours were decided upon and the features of entertainment were those which would not only prove enjoyable but educational in recalling the life and times of George Washington. The children themselves, said Mr. Frazar, were so interested that they decided to cooperate in the enterprise, and thus the American School children were giving one of the most delightful features of the program, the series of Living Pictures dealing with various stages of Washington's career.

ADDRESS OF AMBASSADOR FORBES

Mr. Frazar then called upon the American Ambassador, Mr. W. Cameron Forbes, to say a few words. Mr. Forbes spoke as follows:

Americans the world over are gathering and uniting with men of other countries in honoring the foremost and greatest American citizen, George Washington.

We are very happy to welcome our Japanese friends to join with us on this occasion, and their presence here is a pleasing proof that when it comes to honoring the great qualities of head and heart and hand, peoples of all nationalities are of one mind.

George Washington excelled in the possession of many admirable qualities. He was simple, skillful, systematic, thorough, devoted, courageous, sagacious, faithful, patient, indomitable, persistent and patriotic, and all to a superlative degree. All of these are qualities we seek in men to whom we desire to trust the direction of our affairs. In no one person in our history have all these qualities been combined to the extent that we find them in Washington. As a simple citizen, he loved his home.

Washington never sought office and refused pay for his services as a soldier, taking only enough to satisfy a scrupulously economical expense account.

Called to be the first President of his country, he again revealed all the qualities which had made him the first citizen, and added to his laurels as a soldier, those of a statesman.

Throughout his life he comported himself with a dignity that became his high estate.

After the American Ambassador's speech, Mr. Frazar called upon Prince Tokugawa, the president of the America-Japan Society, to address the audience.

Prince Tokugawa said that the Japanese were honored to cooperate in the celebration for so great a patriot as George Washington. He said that qualities as great as those possessed by Washington were subjects for the admiration of all mankind, and could not be limited to one country only. Washington, said Prince Tokugawa, stood out as an example of liberty and justice, and he hoped that the Bicentennial celebrations would do much toward the promotion of international friendship.

LIVING PICTURES BY CHILDREN

The first part of the evening's dramatic entertainment was a series of four living pictures given by the children of the American School. The first of these dealt with George Washington's youth, including games and songs of the period. The outstanding feature was the singing of negro spirituals, with a guitar accompaniment by William Yamamoto. Some of the children were dressed as negroes in effective colorful costumes, and they sang the songs with true zeal, and also did some clogging and tap dancing which drew hearty applause from the audience.

The second picture represented George Washington as a lieutenant in the British Army, making a treaty with the Indians. This scene began with the solemn smoking of the peace pipe which was presented to George Washington by the Indian chiefs. Realistic war cries and Indian dances closed the picture.

The third picture represented Valley Forge with the soldiers clustered around the fire for warmth, and a blue-coated sentry marching up and down. The lighting for this was extremely effective, and the blowing of taps at the end a significant touch.

The final picture showed Washington as President, and was a scene on the lawn of Mount Vernon, where a graceful minuet was danced by ladies and gentlemen in the picturesque costumes of the days of George Washington.

The JAPAN ADVERTISER said:

The pictures were all a tremendous success, both as to action and grouping, and most of all because of the effective and artistic costumes. For these, Miss Marie-Jeanne Brooks and her sister, Mrs. Antonin Raymond, deserve great credit. Not only were the costumes exactly right for each scene, both as to period and harmonious arrangement of color combinations, but they were all made in a most ingenious fashion from very inexpensive materials, the appropriation having been 200 yen to cover the costuming of 76 children. The Colonial soldiers were particularly effective, with their long blue coats and black cocked hats, and the girls in the last scene were charming in their crinolines, pannieres and ruffles.

The committee in charge of the American School pictures, besides Miss Brooks, were the principal, Mr. Charles Mitchell, Mrs. T. D. Walser, Miss Elizabeth Wainwright, Mrs. Bernard Gladieux, Miss Editha Stone, and Miss Eloise Cunningham. The girls in the clog dancing learned some of their steps from Miss B. L. Wilcox at the Y. W. C. A., and Miss Editha Stone was responsible for training the boys in the Indian war dances. The excellent make-up was done by Mr. and Mrs. J. Day Mason, and Miss Caroline Schereschewsky, who also made up the characters in the historical play.

The children in the living pictures were: George Washington, William Johnson; Martha Washington, Felicia Gressitt; Stage Property Agent, Vera Scott; officers or soldiers, Murray Cunningham, Frederick Gilbert, Edward Horn, Gustav Swanson, John Reifsnider, Walter Clarke, Robert Perkins; ladies, Jean Iglehart, Margaret Walser, Edith Tsunoda, Eva Down, Irene De Graw, Brunnie Rolfe, Molla Siwertz, Natasha Yusha, Lucile Clarke, Margaret Kriete, Frances McCall, Katharine McIlroy, Meta Stirewalt, Sophie Lury, Marguerite Graham; children, John Holtom, Elizabeth Iglehart, Robert Schmidt, Mary Yamaguchi, Molly Poole, Homer Pierce, Oleg Troyanovsky, Trevor Gauntlett, Frances Mayer, Elida Bauer, Eleanor Poole, Kenneth Linn, Dan Holtom, Elizabeth Jorgensen, Ruth Stirewalt; gentlemen, Robert Clark, John Erskine, Bertrand Kriete, Hubbard Horn, Edwin Iglehart, Bernard Miura, George Imai, Harold Zaugg; Indians, Florence Gressitt, Hajime Onushi, Scribner McCoy, Haru Matsukata, Hans Kramer, Victor Takata, Seiichiro Katsura, Kenneth Tsunodo, Walter Scott Chapman, William Fisher, Margaret Moss, T. Nakano, Lawrence Durgin, Tadashi Arakawa, Gerald Holtom; negroes, Frank Huggins, Irene Lord, Garfield McIlroy, Jacquelin Reifsnider, William Yamamoto, Betty Pierce, Marion Iglehart, Eleanor Childs, Betsy Fisher, Akira Okuyama, Leslie Bratton, Louise Horn, and Wesley Schmidt.

JAPANESE GIVE CHERRY BLOSSOM DANCE

The second feature of the evening's dramatic entertainment was a Japanese performance, Hanami Odori, which depicted a cherry blossom dance of the period of 200 years ago corresponding to the days of George Washington. This was exquisitely staged and performed, the costumes and scenery being quite as lovely as many of those in Kabuki performances. It was put on by a group of thirty-five members of an organization known as the Wakaba-kai, which was especially formed for the George Washington Bicentennial Celebration, under the leadership of Mr. R. Kurokawa, secretary of the America-Japan Society, who gave invaluable help and cooperation throughout the whole enterprise.

The newspaper report of the play follows:

The Japanese play started with a series of incidents, all cleverly enacted, involving a young couple out flower viewing, a monkey and its trainer, a woman proprietor of a sake shop and a Samurai. Before the sake shop, the monkey becomes restive and jumps against the Samurai, who in turn becomes angry and attempts to slay the monkey trainer. He is prevented by an Otokodate (chivalrous person) and then a geisha girl comes to patch up the quarrel. The geisha's attendant, becoming intoxicated, bumps into one of a group of footmen who appear carrying a palanquin. When the footman becomes excited, the noble lord within the palanquin opens the door and announces that the day is a festival, and that there should be no petty quarreling on such an occasion. So all join together in executing a dance under the cherry blossoms, a truly gorgeous and unforgettable spectacle which won just applause from the enthusiastic audience.

WASHINGTON PLAY ENTHUSIASTICALLY RECEIVED

The final part of the evening's dramatic entertainment came with a one-act historical play, "Washington Takes the Risk," which was one of the printed plays sent to Japan by the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission. It deals with an incident at Mount Vernon, when Washington makes his momentous decision to stand with the Colonies and to assume the command of the Continental Army when the call comes. The JAPAN ADVERTISER continues:

It is following a dinner party at the Washington Mount Vernon home, that messengers arrive from the North with the news of the battle at Lexington, telling Colonel Washington that the war is on, that already His Majesty's troops have suffered their first defeat at the hands of the Massachusetts rebels.

The play opens with all the guests seated at a long dining table, elegantly costumed according to the days of the late eighteenth century. As the conversation waxes political, the suggestion is made by Madame Washington that the ladies leave the gentlemen, a toast is gracefully drunk to their departure, and the men settle down to talk of the most poignant question of the times—the rebellion which is smouldering in the Colonies against the mother country.

The main parts in the after dinner discussion are taken by Colonel Washington, played by Mr. Samuel Walter Washington (Secretary of the United States Embassy), and Lord Fairfax, played by Mr. J. R. McKenlay. Lord Fairfax is indignant at the mention of rebellion and filled with rage and disgust over what he considers to be the insane actions of the Colonists in the north. Colonel Washington expresses his faith and idealism in the new country, in whose future he earnestly believes.

In the midst of the discussion, other guests arrive, Mr. and Mrs. George Mason, their little daughter Claire Mason, and Mr. Edmund Pendleton. Mason and Pendleton both belong to the Virginia delegation of the Continental Congress and come to tell Colonel Washington that it is rumored that he will be asked to take command of the Continental Armies should war with England become a certainty. Previous to their negotiations, there is a very pretty scene between Colonel Washington and little Claire Mason, whose part is taken by Miss Julie Shathin. The little girl rushes into the dining room and sits on Washington's knee, and he and the child talk together, oblivious of the rest of the gathering until Claire is adjured by her father to make her prettiest curtsy to the Colonel and not to take any more of his time.

The table discussion is again interrupted, when Madame Washington comes in to say that messengers have arrived with portentous tidings from the North. These messengers enter to announce the news of Lexington, to establish the fact that war has started "beyond doubt." Guests at the table become highly excited, shouting with newly kindled patriotism on behalf of the Colonial Army. Washington, however, bids them to be silent, saying that the situation is too grave for mere noisy demonstrations.

When a toast is proposed to the Colonial Army, Lord Fairfax starts to withdraw, fairly bursting with anger at what he deems an unseemly and traitorous demonstration against His Majesty, George III. Madame Washington tactfully suggests, however, that all the others withdraw, leaving George Washington and Lord Fairfax to settle the dispute alone.

The scene which follows is both dramatic and moving. Fairfax recalls to Washington that he feels like a father toward him, that he has watched his progress in the new country to a position of leadership and distinction, and he implores him not to do anything so rash as to accept the command of the rebel troops. He further points out that the result is bound to be a losing fight in the pursuit of a "phantom liberty," and that it means the certain destruction of Mount Vernon, grave disaster for Washington's wife, and the ignominious death of a traitor for Washington. He points out that Washington is an aristocrat, a descendant of one of the best English families, and has no business mixing himself up with the rough and ready troops of the rebel army.

But to all Fairfax's arguments, Washington responds with his own firm convictions, which express his faith in the destiny of America. He reveals the fact that his hopes and ideals are tied up with those of the new and growing country and that he cannot condone the continued injustices of England. In response to the black future painted by Fairfax in regard to the personal disgrace to be suffered, Washington points out that results cannot be considered while principles are at stake.

The entrance of Martha Washington precedes the conclusion of the play. Fairfax appeals to her to stop her husband from taking such a momentous risk as to throw his lot in with that of the Colonists. This fills her with dismay, but she does not waver or attempt to dissuade her husband from his decision. Fairfax starts to leave in high dudgeon, but Washington pleads with him for a last sign of friendship, and Fairfax agrees to shake hands, conceding that friendship between them is stronger than the widely diverging paths which they will travel in the future. This dramatic leave-taking between Washington and Fairfax, met with a spontaneous burst of applause from the audience.

The characters in the play all took their parts well, Fairfax perhaps standing out more than the others. Mr. McKenlay has had wide dramatic experience in Tokyo. The character of Fairfax was well suited to his abilities, and he infused the part with fire and life, all of his gestures and by-play bearing the marks of a finished actor.

GEORGE WASHINGTON BICENTENNIAL EDITION OF THE YOMIURI SHIMBUN.
THIS TOKYO NEWSPAPER ISSUED A SPECIAL ILLUSTRATED CHILDREN'S EDITION ON FEBRUARY 21, 1932, DEVOTED LARGELY TO GEORGE WASHINGTON AND THE BICENTENNIAL CELEBRATION.

Washington was excellently played by one of his collateral descendants, Mr. Samuel Walter Washington, secretary of the American Embassy. Mr. Washington interpreted the part in a manner which idealized the revolutionary leader and yet there was nothing sentimental or overdone about his performance. He achieved in the personality of America's great patriot a dignity and simplicity which was most appealing. Mr. Washington's voice carries well and his slightly Southern accent added all the more realism to the part.

The part of Martha Washington was most satisfactorily taken by Mrs. Mona Tait, who was charming and gracious, and imparted a distinct individuality to her role as the wife of an aristocrat and the mistress of Mount Vernon.

Little Miss Julie Shathin, though her part was very slight, played it in a most successful fashion. She was delightfully natural and appealing in her encounter with Colonel Washington, and her quaint crinoline costume was most becoming. Her episode well served its purpose of bringing out the kindness in Washington's otherwise firm and unbending nature.

Both Fielding Lewis, taken by Mr. William Turner, and John Parke Custis, played by Mr. Bradford Smith, were outstanding. Both have excellent voices and enthusiasm for the Colonial cause was stimulated by their fervent speeches.

The other characters all played their parts well, and showed remarkable stage presence, which they needed to carry off the elegant and stately costumes, which might have tended to make them look awkward had they been less graceful about their entrances and exits.

The costumes, which came from Hollywood, were all elaborate and authentic of the period. The one worn by Mr. McKenlay as Lord Fairfax was used by Emil Jannings in his picture, the Patriot. It was of old velvet, resplendent with gold braid, brass buttons and lace ruffles at the neck and wrists.

Washington was costumed in a suit of rich maroon color, with cream lace ruffles and a white wig, and Martha Washington wore a ravishing creation of green brocaded silk, puffed and ruffled with a soft white lace fichu, matching the long trailing ruffles of her half length sleeves.

The rest of the cast in the play were as follows: Mrs. Fielding Lewis, Miss Caroline McMahon; Mrs. John Parke Custis, Mrs. George Marshall; George Digges, Lieutenant Thomas Cranford; Mrs. George Digges, Mrs. J. R. Wolf; Miss Jennifer, Mrs. Thomas Cranford; Ben, the butler, Mr. Howard Buffington Titus; George Mason, Mr. L. D. Sturgeon; Mrs. George Mason, Mrs. Glenn Babb; Mr. Edmund Pendleton, Mr. James Perkins; Mr. John Cunningham, Mr. Elmer L. Pennell; Jeremiah Townsend, Mr. N. H. Briggs; negro servants, Lieutenant J. R. Sherr and Lieutenant Harold Doud.

The stage manager and director of the play was the American Consul General, Mr. Arthur Garrels; the assistant stage manager, Mr. David Tait; property chairman, Mr. MacFarland Hale; mistress of wardrobe, Mrs. Glenn Babb; and chairman of lighting, Mr. F. S. Thomas.

In addition to the patrons, the officers of the Washington Bicentennial celebration in Tokyo included, Mr. E. W. Frazar, chairman; Mr. R. Kurokawa, vice-chairman; Mr. William Hirzel, vice-chairman; and Mr. Richard P. Aikin, secretary and treasurer.

The sub-committees included: general building arrangements, Mr. R. Kurokawa, chairman, Mr. Y. Iwanaga and Lieutenant-Colonel J. G. McIlroy; George Washington play, Consul-General Arthur Garrels and Mr. David S. Tait; Japanese play, Mr. R. Kurokawa, Mr. Y. Iwanaga and Mr. Y. Takeda; children's living pictures, Mr. Charles A. Mitchell and Mrs. T. D. Walser; motion pictures, Mr. R. B. DeMallie and Mr. Tom D. Cochrane; supper, Mrs. E. L. Neville; general technical committee, Consul-General Arthur Garrels, stage manager, and Mr. D. D. McGregor, Mr. MacFarland Hale, Mrs. Bradford Smith, Mr. F. S. Thomas and Mr. David S. Tait; music, Mr. R. F. Moss and Mr. J. R. Conrad; publicity, Mr. B. W. Fleisher and Mr. Y. Iwanaga; finance, Mr. C. F. Thomas and Mr. K. Fukui; program and tickets, Mr. W. R. Devin, Mr. S. J. Albright and Mr. Y. Takeda; seating, Mr. Halleck A. Butts; decorations, Mrs. Burton Crane; children's games, Lieutenant-Commander Melendy, the Rev. H. C. Spackman and Miss B. L. Wilcox.

Organizations participating in the celebration, together with their representatives, were as follows: America-Japan Society, Mr. R. Kurokawa, Mr. Y. Iwanaga and Lieutenant-Colonel J. G. McIlroy; American Association of Tokyo, Mr. William Hirzel, Mr. Richard P. Aikin and Mr. W. R. Farley; American Association of Yokohama, Mr. E. W. Frazar, Mr. G. N. Coe and Mr. E. J. Dorsz; Columbia Society, Mr. J. R. Conrad, Mr. W. R. Devin and Mr. S. J. Albright; American Club of Tokyo, Mr. C. F. Thomas, Mr. J. R. Reifsnider and Mr. W. K. Fowler, Jr.; American Merchants Association, Mr. C. F. Thomas, Mr. E. L. Pennell and Mr. R. B. DeMallie.

The committee of the celebration has extended thanks to the following for help given in furthering the affair: The Japan Advertiser, Asahi Shimbun, Nichi Nichi Shimbun, Columbia Phonograph Company, Victor Talking Machine Company of Japan, Eastman Kodak Company, Paramount Films, Dollar Steamship Lines, Imperial Hotel and Hotel New Grand.

GEORGE WASHINGTON BICENTENNIAL POSTER IN TOKYO. THE PROGRAM, IN THE ENGLISH AND JAPANESE LANGUAGES, FOR THE OPENING CELEBRATION IN JAPAN.

TOKYO CELEBRATION A BIG SUCCESS

Mr. Frazar, in a letter to the Honorable Sol Bloom, Director of the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission, made these comments on the celebration in Tokyo:

The present is therefore to advise you that a very successful affair was held at the Tokyo Hibiya Kokaido (Municipal theatre) on February 22nd, in which six Associations connected with the activities of Americans and Japanese in this vicinity were concentrated. A reference to the head of this letter will show you their names.

The first event, "Living Pictures of Washington's Life," by the children of the American School in Japan was very good and I think constitutes the first big public entertainment of the kind in Tokyo, in which the children of a foreign school have taken part. As there are over twelve nationalities amongst the children, you will understand how international is its character. The children were most enthusiastic making their costumes themselves and carried out their dances with grace and colorful effect.

The second event, "Hanami-Odori," a Japanese Dance, was given by our Japanese friends and done in a most correct and beautiful old fashioned style, showing life as it existed in the capital of Japan at the time when George Washington lived.

The third event, "Washington Takes the Risk," was taken part in by many members of the American Embassy and other Society leaders. The costumes were brought from Hollywood and were truly beautiful. You will be interested to learn that the principal part of George Washington was taken by Mr. S. Walter Washington, Third Secretary of the Embassy, who tells me that he is the fifth grand nephew, descendant from George Washington, his ancestral parent being Samuel Washington, brother of George. The important part of Lord Fairfax was taken by Mr. J. Roy McKenlay, a member of the British community, and he proved to be a most finished actor beside taking a very keen interest in the play. The part of Miss Jennifer was taken by the wife of Lt. Thomas Cranford of the Embassy, and I am told she is a direct descendant of the Pendleton family.

A large audience attended and the article in THE JAPAN ADVERTISER of the following day which I send you, together with three of the programs, will show you how successful it proved to be. I also send three photos.

In closing may I take this opportunity of expressing the thanks of the Committee for the many pamphlets, literature and suggested programs which your Commission has provided and which we have found invaluable in the work.

CHILDREN'S NEWSPAPER POPULAR

The Japanese newspaper YOMIURI SHIMBUN, of Tokyo, on February 21, 1932, published a special four-page children's section devoted largely to the life of George Washington and the celebration of the 200th anniversary of his birth. It was illustrated with pictures of Washington and Wakefield in colors. In response to a request for one additional copy of this newspaper, Mr. Leo D. Sturgeon, the American Consul at Tokyo, wrote to the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission under date of July 27, 1932:

The request contained in your letter was transmitted to this newspaper, which saw fit to publish it. The response was immediate and very generous; seventy-six copies reached this office either directly or through the "Yomiuri Shimbun." In many cases the donated copies from various parts of Japan were accompanied by cards and letters expressing admiration for the character and life of Washington. Although only one additional copy was requested in your letter, 75 copies are being forwarded, since it is thought that useful distribution may be made of them—perhaps to schools or libraries in the United States. . . .

This incident is one of the most interesting that has come to the attention of this office, particularly because of the way it demonstrates the unselfish interest shown in the life of Washington by people residing in widely separated sections of this country.

PROGRAMS IN KOBE, OSAKA, AND KYOTO

A meeting was held at the American Consulate at Kobe January 27, 1931, at which it was decided that the various American and American-Japanese societies in Kobe, Osaka, and Kyoto would cooperate in the George Washington Bicentennial Celebration. These societies were the American Association of Kobe, the Washington Society of Kobe, the Japan-America Society of Kobe, the Pan-Pacific Club of Osaka, the Pan-Pacific Club of Kyoto, and the Japan-American Society of Kwansai.

A joint committee was appointed and named the George Washington Bicentennial Celebration Committee, with Consul E. R. Dickover as chairman, and Consul Howard Donovan as secretary. As the result of plans made at this meeting, tree planting ceremonies in honor of Washington were held at Osaka, Kobe, and Kyoto, an essay contest on the life of Washington was conducted in which Japanese pupils of the Middle and Girls' Schools in the Kobe-Osaka-Kyoto district competed, with appropriate medals for the winners, and motion pictures descriptive of the life of Washington were exhibited at various times and places throughout the district. Funds for these ceremonies were raised by direct subscription among American residents and by lump sum contributions from some of the societies sponsoring the celebrations.

RADIO ADDRESS BY AMERICAN CONSUL

Consul Dickover announced the opening of the celebration in this district in a radio address on the life of Washington delivered on February 21, 1932, and broadcast from the Osaka Central Broadcasting Station JOBK as follows:

Ladies and Gentlemen: Tomorrow, February 22, 1932, is the two hundredth anniversary of the birthday of the Father of our Country, George Washington, and I have been asked by the Osaka Broadcasting Office to tell our Japanese friends something of the significance, to the American nation, of this day. In order to understand the background of our veneration of the memory of George Washington, I thought that I would first tell you something of his life and work.

George Washington was born on a plantation on the banks of the Potomac River, on February 22, 1732. His father was of an old, aristocratic English family, and in America carried out, as far as possible, the traditions of an English country gentleman, with negroes to work the plantation and act as servants in the house. The living conditions in Virginia at that time, however, would be considered as very primitive to the people of today. There were no railroads, practically no highways, no telegraphs and almost no postal system. The principal means of transportation from city to city and from city to plantation was by sailing vessels. Almost all articles of daily use, such as foods, clothing, farming tools and household furniture, were produced and manufactured on the plantations. Each plantation was a little self-contained world of its own, cut off from the outside world to a degree which would surprise modern Americans.

In this environment George Washington passed his boyhood. The active, outdoor life of the country developed his body, so that he grew into a tall, strong young man, six feet two inches in height. He received, however, very little schooling, as there were few facilities in America at that time for scholarly training. But the problems of the plantation developed his mind and his power of decision. He had remarkable powers of observation and of self-education, and by reading and thinking he eventually became one of the best-educated men in America of his time.

At sixteen years of age George Washington, then a tall, strong youth, decided to earn his own living. He studied land surveying, and at seventeen years of age, after passing an examination, he became the official surveyor of one of the Virginia counties. He had to work in the almost untrodden wilderness west of the Allegheny Mountains, laying out roads and fixing boundaries. Working, eating and sleeping in the forests and on the plains, he learned woodcraft and the ways of the American Indians—a knowledge which served him well in later years. He gradually acquired an excellent knowledge of civil engineering, a profession which had a great fascination for him. He laid out many roads which later became highways, built two barge canals and drained a part of a great swamp. He was the first professional civil engineer in the colonies which afterwards became the United States of America.

At the age of 20, Washington entered the Virginia militia—a volunteer military corps—and received a commission as a major. At the age of 21 he was entrusted with a delicate and dangerous diplomatic mission to the French army, which at that time was endeavoring to occupy the Ohio Valley. The next year he led a detachment of the militia against the French, but he was badly defeated and had to march back home again. Apparently, however, he had a considerable amount of military genius, because the next year he was commissioned as a colonel and appointed aide to General Braddock in the campaign against the French and Indians. On this campaign Washington nearly lost his life—by fever, not by bullets. After the war he resigned his commission and returned to farming and civil engineering, but in the war he had acquired a good knowledge of military tactics, which stood him in good stead in the war to come.

In the meantime, George Washington had inherited the estate of Mount Vernon. He married Martha Custis, a wealthy widow, and for fifteen years he was able to lead the quiet life of a gentleman farmer. With his active, keen mind, he was never content to continue to do anything in the old ways of his fathers, but always endeavored to effect improvements. So with his farming. He constantly experimented with different crops, new fertilizers, and various methods of cultivation, and invented new farming implements. He enjoyed farming and wrote, later in his life, "agriculture has ever been amongst the most favorite amusements of my life, though I never possessed much skill in the art. I am led to reflect how much more delightful to an undebauched mind is the task of making improvements on the earth, than all the vain glory which can be acquired from ravaging it by conquest."

But during this quiet period in Washington's life, while he was living the life of a gentleman farmer and a leading citizen of the Colony of Virginia, the seeds of rebellion against the mother country, Britain, were being sown in the American colonies. Dissatisfied with the treatment accorded by the British Government, heavily taxed without having any vote in determining the taxes, and burning under insults, the people of the colonies were calling congresses to discuss the situation, and in 1775 Washington was elected a delegate to the Second Continental Congress. For the next six years Washington was making momentous history. Through his sound judgment and power of decision, he soon became a leader of the Congress and was elected General and Commander-in-Chief of all the armed forces which the United States might raise to resist the forces of Great Britain. He was only 43 years of age at this time, and the fact that such a heavy responsibility was placed upon the shoulders of so young a man speaks volumes for his native ability. For more than six long years Washington, the lover of peaceful agricultural pursuits, was compelled to live amid the alarms of war. Without sufficient men to fight the battles for the land he loved so well, without money for food and clothing for his troops, and oftentimes with little sympathy and support from those for whom he was fighting, Washington continued the struggle. Inured to hardship by his early training, conscious of the justice of the cause for which he was fighting, and filled with high ideals and noble aspirations which he succeeded in conveying to his men, he did not become discouraged but carried the struggle to a successful conclusion. In 1781 the last of the British forces in the United States surrendered at Yorktown.

As soon as he could settle the affairs of the armies under his command, Washington retired again to his home on the banks of the Potomac "free from the bustle of a camp," where he planned, as he wrote to a friend, to "move gently down the stream of time until I sleep with my fathers." But again the affairs of state called him away from his beloved Mount Vernon. In 1789, after much debate, the thirteen American states decided to adopt a republican form of federal government, and unanimously elected Washington as the first President of the new-born United States of America. During his two terms of office he formulated the policies, both domestic and foreign, which were to endure for many years. It was a time of turmoil, with many new and untried plans of government, and it was Washington's task to lead his country through the birth of a government until it had settled down into a quiet and orderly routine. With calm and wise determination, with unbounded patience, and with unswerving faith in his cause, he led the nation into those paths of co-operation, tempered with rational liberty, which have built up the greatness of the American nation. He believed firmly that the will of the majority should rule and that military preparedness was essential to the continuance of peace in the land. He succeeded in harmonizing the conflicting interests of the northern and southern states, and opened the vast plains of the West for settlement. In foreign relations his task was perhaps more difficult than in domestic relations, as the newly-born republic had to meet the natural antipathy of the older monarchies of Europe. But through his calm and prudent attitude and his noble ideals, he succeeded in winning the respect and esteem of Europe for the new republic. His most prominent policy toward foreign nations, a policy which endured for some hundred and twenty years, was that of refusing to enter into entangling alliances with any European nation. As he wrote in 1793, "I believe it is the sincere wish of United America to have nothing to do with the political intrigues, or the squabbles, of European nations; but on the contrary, to exchange commodities and live in peace and amity with all the inhabitants of the earth."

Washington also had a firm conviction that the nations of the world were constantly growing more fraternal and that they would eventually be united into one great family, with universal and lasting peace.

There is not much more to tell of Washington's life. When he retired from the Presidency of the United States in 1797, he returned to his life as a gentleman-farmer at Mount Vernon and again took up his old interests. He did not have long to enjoy this peaceful life, however, as he died in December, 1799, a little over two years after retiring from the Presidency.

I have tried to paint you a word-picture of Washington, in order that you may understand why it is that we so revere the man whom we call the "Father of our Country." I can do no better in describing his character and what he means to the Americans than to quote the words of Henry Lee, who, in writing of Washington after his death, said:

"Possessing a clear and penetrating mind, a strong and sound judgment, calmness and temper for deliberation, with invincible firmness and perseverance in resolution maturely formed, drawing information from all, acting for himself, with incorruptible integrity and unvarying patriotism; his own superiority and the public confidence alike marked him as the man designed by heaven to lead in the great political as well as military events which have distinguished the era of his life.

"First in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen, he was second to none in the humble and endearing scenes of private life: Pious, just, humane, temperate, and sincere; uniform, dignified and commanding; his example was as edifying to all around him as were the effects of that example lasting."

The Americans have always celebrated Washington's birthday on February 22nd, but as February 22, 1932, is the two hundredth anniversary of his birth, it was decided some years ago to have a special celebration this year, and Congress appointed a special Commission, headed by the President of the United States, to make plans for the celebration. This Commission decided not to have any one large celebration in one place, but to carry the celebration to the American people, wherever they might be, so that every city, town, village and hamlet in the United States might do homage to the memory of the man whom we all honor as "First in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen." It was decided, moreover, not to limit the celebration to the United States, but to invite American residents in foreign lands, and the people of foreign countries who might be interested, to join in the celebrations.

As I know that many of my Japanese friends would like to do honor to the memory of the great American, George Washington, I called a meeting of representatives of the Japan-America Society of Kansai, the Japan-America Society of Kobe, the American Association of Kobe, the Washington Society of Kobe, the Pan Pacific Club of Osaka, and the Pan Pacific Club of Kyoto, when it was decided to form a joint committee for a George Washington Bicentennial Celebration in the Kobe-Osaka-Kyoto district. This committee has decided to celebrate the occasion in several ways. On February 25th the American Ambassador will visit Osaka and Kobe and will plant cherry trees in Sakuranomiya Park in Osaka and in the Recreation Ground in Kobe. Cherry trees will also be planted at Kyoto on the 22nd. We decided to plant cherry trees for two reasons. One is that the cherry tree is associated with a well-known story of George Washington's boyhood and is therefore a symbol of Washington. The other is that the cherry tree is symbolic of the spirit of Japan, and it seemed a happy thought to combine the two ideas of the cherry tree as an expression of the friendship existing between the two nations.

In addition to the planting of cherry trees, there will be essay contests on the subject of Washington in all of the middle schools and girls' schools which may care to take part. It is hoped that special commemoration medals, supplied by the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission, will be available as awards to the winners of the contest in each school. We hope that many Japanese boys and girls will take part in this contest and, by learning more of the man whose memory we honor, will learn better to understand the ideals and aspirations which animate the American nation. Thank you.

TREES PLANTED TO HONOR WASHINGTON

Tree planting ceremonies in Kobe and Osaka on February 25 were reported in the JAPAN ADVERTISER as follows:

Kobe, February 25 (By a Staff Correspondent).—The United States Ambassador, Mr. W. Cameron Forbes, today officiated at the planting of the first of a group of 80 cherry trees at the Kobe Recreation Grounds, to commemorate the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington. Mr. E. R. Dickover, United States Consul in Kobe, accompanied the Ambassador, who arrived from Tokyo together with Mr. Hiram Bingham, Jr., Third Secretary of the Embassy, by the morning train.

The ceremony was held under somewhat adverse weather conditions, snow lying more than three inches in depth, but it formed a pretty background for the ceremony, which was held at the southwest corner of the Recreation Ground. However, the weather kept away many who otherwise undoubtedly would have attended.

Flags of the United States and Japan formed a canopy over a small pedestal from which the Ambassador spoke. Owing to the weather, the singing of the American and Japanese national anthems, which was to have been done by students of the Canadian Academy, was cancelled.

Among those present were Mayor H. Kurose of Kobe; Mr. R. A. May; Mr. F. N. Jonas; Mr. D. G. Young; Mr. H. Tamura, president of the Japan-America Society; Dr. Hori; Mr. B. W. Brown; Mr. Fred Taylor; Mr. Erle R. Dickover and Mr. H. Donovan, both United States Consuls in Kobe, and others.

Before the tree-planting ceremony, Ambassador Forbes addressed the gathering as follows:

"In planting these trees in memory of America's first citizen, George Washington, I do so in the hope and expectation that they will grow to full size and live for many years, each year flowering in such a way as to be a beauty spot, and bringing pleasure to many generations of Japanese citizens of Kobe yet to be born. It is very gratifying to Americans to feel that the Japanese people join with their brothers overseas in honoring the memory of this great American. It means that those great qualities for which George Washington was celebrated are also admired by the people not only in Japan but in the world over, wherever his name has come to be revered and wherever solid worth is valued and men's achievements are known and their history studied.

"I am shortly to return to America, and while there, it will give me great happiness to tell my friends of this ceremony and of the consideration shown to our people by yours; and particularly at this time when there are certain to be differences of opinion about some matters of major policy. It is pleasant to dwell on things whereon we think alike, as that is the best way to strengthen the ties which unite our two countries.

"I hope that the annual flowering of these trees may be a symbol of the perennial flowering of the strong ties of national interests which unite our two peoples."

Mayor Kurose replied briefly and mentioned that the Japanese people had always respected the name of George Washington. He felt that they had in some measure learned of honesty from the great statesman's example, and that George Washington's association with the cherry tree had always been one of the reasons why Japanese remembered him. The Mayor felt it was a great honor to have a part in the planting of the cherry trees which were to be a standing memorial to a great statesman of America, whom Japan held as her friend.

Mr. Forbes then went through the planting ceremony, shoveling part of the earth over the roots of the tree. He was followed by Mayor Hirose, Mr. Dickover, Mr. F. M. Jonas, Mr. Tamura and Mr. Brown.

A similar ceremony took place this afternoon at the Sakurano-Miya Park in Osaka. It was attended by officials and members of the American-Japan Society of Osaka and many others.

The American Ambassador on February 25 delivered an address on George Washington at a dinner at Osaka given by the Japan-America Society of Kwansai. Motion pictures descriptive of the life of Washington were shown after the Ambassador's address.

CONSUL SPEAKS AT KYOTO

A cherry tree planting ceremony, at which Consul Donovan delivered an address, was held at Okazaki Park at Kyoto, February 22. Mr. Donovan said:

Ladies and Gentlemen: On this 22nd of February, 1932, we are celebrating the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington, and are gathered here today to do honor to the memory of the man who, through his military genius, his wisdom of action, and his high-minded statesmanship, has rightly come to be known as the Father of His Country.

The Americans have always celebrated Washington's birthday on February 22nd, but as February 22, 1932, is the two hundredth anniversary of his birth, it was decided some years ago to have a special celebration this year, and Congress appointed a special Commission, headed by the President of the United States, to make plans for the celebration. This Commission decided not to have any one large celebration in one place, but to carry the celebration to the American people, wherever they might be, so that every city, town, village and hamlet in the United States might do homage to the memory of the man whom we all honor as "First in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen." It was decided, moreover, not to limit the celebrations to the United States, but to invite Americans resident in foreign lands and the people of foreign countries who might be interested, to join in the celebrations.

The American Associations in the Kansai District, together with the Pan-Pacific Club of Kyoto, the Pan-Pacific Club of Osaka, the Japan-America Society of Kansai, and the Japan-America Society of Kobe, have decided to celebrate the occasion in several ways. On February 25th the American Ambassador will visit Osaka and Kobe and will plant cherry trees in Sakuranomiya Park at Osaka and on the Recreation Ground at Kobe. We decided to plant cherry trees for two reasons. One is that the cherry tree is associated with a well-known story of George Washington's boyhood and is therefore a symbol of Washington. The other is that the cherry tree is symbolic of the spirit of Japan, and it seemed a happy thought to combine the two ideals of the cherry tree as an expression of the friendship existing between the two nations.

In addition to the planting of cherry trees, there will be essay contests on the subject of Washington in all of the middle schools and girls' schools which may care to take part. It is hoped that special commemoration medals, supplied by the George Washington Bicentennial Commission in the United States, will be available as awards to the winners of the contest in each school. We hope that many Japanese boys and girls will take part in this contest and, by learning more of the great American whose memory we honor, will learn better to understand the ideals and aspirations which animate the American nation.

There has been but little left unsaid in the countless tributes to Washington's greatness. I shall, however, read to you an extract from an address on Washington delivered by ex-President Coolidge on the occasion of the establishment of the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission. Mr. Coolidge said: "We all share in the benefits which accrued from the independence he won and the free Republic he did so much to establish. We need a diligent comprehension and understanding of the great principles of government which he wrought out, but we shall also secure a wide practical advantage if we go beyond this record, already so eloquently expounded, and consider him also as a man of affairs. It was in this field that he developed that executive ability which he later displayed in the camp and in the council chamber.

This ceremony today, in which the people of two great nations join, is one of thousands which will be held throughout the world in commemoration of this, the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of Washington. Let us hope that all who participate in these ceremonies will work for the development of international understanding, and of international sympathy, remembering that these must be based on the fullest realization of those ideals of loyalty and sane, far-sighted patriotism which are the most important possessions of clear-thinking men and women in every nation. On this self-development, coupled with sympathetic understanding, rests the peace of the world. Let us hope that in the planting of this tree, so symbolical of the national spirit of Japan and of the man whose memory we are honoring today, we may further develop the spirit of mutual understanding and friendship between Japan and the United States.

JAPANESE SCHOOL CONTESTS

The most important activity in connection with the George Washington Bicentennial Celebration in the Kwansai district, according to a report of Consul Donovan, was an essay contest arranged for the public and private schools. This was announced by Consul Donovan in an address delivered on May 28, 1932, at Osaka before a large gathering. He said:

I assure you that it gives me a great deal of pleasure to address so large a gathering of members of the Japan-America Society of Kansai, the Pan-Pacific Club of Osaka, and teachers and students of the middle schools of this district on an occasion which so highly honors the memory of our great statesman, citizen, and soldier, George Washington.

The tributes paid to the memory of Washington in Japan on the occasion of the two hundredth anniversary of his birth are a source of gratification to all Americans, indicating as they do the admiration of the Japanese people for those qualities with which his name will forever be associated in his own country.

The various Japan-America Societies in the Kansai district established a joint committee early this year, known as the George Washington Bicentennial Committee, with the idea of arranging appropriate ceremonies at various times throughout the year 1932 in honor of Washington's birth. You are, of course, acquainted with the activities of the committee, the most important of which is the essay contest arranged for the public and private middle schools in the Kansai district. The object of this contest is to encourage among Japanese students the study of the life and character of George Washington in the hope that many Japanese boys and girls, by learning more of the great American whose memory we honor, will learn better to understand the ideals and aspirations which animate the American nation.

George Washington was born on February 22, 1732, on a plantation situated on the banks of the Potomac River not far from the city which now bears his name. His father came of old, aristocratic English stock and led, so far as was possible in America at that time, the life of an English country gentleman. Conditions of life, as compared with those existing today, were primitive. There were no railroads, no telegraphs, practically no highways, and almost no postal system. Sailing vessels which traversed the seacoast and the rivers were the chief means of transportation, while away from the rivers and the seacoast pack animals were the chief means of transport. Articles of daily use, such as foods, clothing, tools, and household furniture, were made on the plantation, chiefly by negro slaves. Each plantation was a self-contained unit of its own and had but little contact with the outside world. Hunting, riding, and fishing were the principal amusements.

George Washington's boyhood differed but little from that of other sons of good families in Virginia. Educational opportunities were limited in Virginia in those days but Washington received as much schooling as could be obtained in the district in which he lived. The active outdoor life developed his body and he grew into a tall, strong young man, six feet two inches in height. As a student Washington was industrious and made the most of his limited opportunities, aided at the same time by remarkable powers of observation and self-reliance.

At the age of sixteen Washington studied land surveying, a profession highly esteemed in the American colonies at that time. At the age of seventeen he passed the required examination and became an official surveyor for one of the counties in the State of Virginia. For three years Washington worked in the pathless wilderness of the Allegheny Mountains, laying out roads, mapping boundaries, and performing the numerous tasks required of him. Washington was one of the first civil engineers in the colonies and much of the work which he did in the laying out of roads is still in existence, while the accuracy of his land surveys has never been questioned, and they still serve as the boundary lines of many counties in Virginia. The three years Washington spent as a surveyor were years of hard work, replete with danger from hostile Indians, and in this, his first achievement, we see evidence of those qualities of industry, perseverance, courage, and keen observation which were to stand him in such good stead in the years to come.

At the age of twenty Washington entered the militia of the State of Virginia—a volunteer military corps—and received a commission as major. A year later, in 1753, Washington was entrusted with a dangerous and delicate mission to the French headquarters in the Ohio country. To deliver this message it was necessary to travel through 300 miles of trackless wilderness, beset with savage Indians. One or two other men had essayed the journey but had turned back before reaching their destination. Washington set out on the same day that the Governor's orders reached him and accomplished the journey in record time.

In the acceptance of this mission we see one of Washington's outstanding characteristics, which was his desire to be different from other men, not in fundamental character, but always within the conventional pattern. What he wanted was to be different by being on a higher level. This may be called vanity, but it is vanity with a creative force, a quality which so often goes with strong characters.

Another feature of Washington's character was his matter-of-fact coolness in the presence of danger. On the return journey to Virginia, after he had delivered his message to the French commander, he was deserted by his Indian guides and the heavy snows made it necessary to abandon his horses and to continue through the mountains on foot. The situation was perilous to the utmost degree but Washington devoted only one sentence to it in his official report to the Governor.

In 1755 Washington accompanied General Braddock on his expedition against Fort Duquesne and nearly lost his life through fever. His fearlessness and military skill were displayed in his covering of the retreat of Braddock's army, which was utterly routed by the French and Indians. Washington had four horses shot from under him in this engagement. For three years more Washington remained in military service, during which time he commanded the Virginia troops on the frontier. In 1758 he retired to his estate at Mount Vernon, married, and for fifteen years led the life of a country gentleman. He was keenly interested in agriculture and devoted much time and effort in the improvement of his crops, in the invention of new farming implements, and in improving methods of cultivation.

But during this quiet period of Washington's life, while he was living the life of a country gentleman and at the same time taking an active part in civic affairs, the seeds of rebellion against Great Britain were being sown in America. It is unnecessary for the purposes of this brief address to discuss the events leading up to the Revolutionary War since Washington played but a minor part in them. However, in 1775 he was elected a delegate to the Second Continental Congress, where by reason of his sound judgment and power of decision he soon became a leader of the Congress and was elected Commander-in-Chief of all the armed forces which the United States might raise to resist the armies of Great Britain. Washington was only forty-three years of age at that time and the fact that such a heavy responsibility was placed upon the shoulders of so young a man speaks volumes for his native ability.

It was during the six years from 1775 to 1781 that Washington, as Commander-in-Chief of the American armies, made his name immortal. Without sufficient troops, often without money to buy food and ammunition for his army, and at times without the whole-hearted support of the people for whom he was fighting, Washington persevered and brought the war to a successful conclusion. While we must not minimize the part played by other patriots in the Revolution it is not too much to say that without Washington's breadth of vision, perseverance, high ideals, and military skill, there would have been no American nation. Another characteristic of Washington which belongs only to the truly great was his magnanimity. At one of the most critical periods of the war several of his officers, misled by a dissatisfied adventurer named Conway, conspired to have him removed from his post as Commander-in-Chief. Washington took no action against the conspirators and the plot collapsed of its own weight. In later years as President Washington appointed some of these men to high positions in the government, realizing as he did that they were men of high character and ability who had been merely led astray at a critical moment when only the strongest willed could maintain a balanced judgment.

At the close of the war Washington retired to his estate at Mount Vernon where he hoped to spend the rest of his years in peace and quiet. But in 1789 the Colonies decided to establish a Federal Government, and Washington was the unanimous choice of the people as the first President of the United States. It was here that his great constructive abilities shone most brightly. The problems of the new republic were many and pressing. There were conflicting claims of the various colonies to be settled, many of which were jealous of the prerogatives of the Federal Government. Questions of currency, coinage, taxation, and all of the multitudinous details of a new state were thrust upon Washington, all of which he met with a breadth of vision, soundness of judgment, and a spirit of conciliation which rarely, if ever, have been equalled.

But perhaps his greatest contribution to the American nation was his well-defined policy with respect to foreign affairs, a question of paramount importance to a new and struggling nation which encountered the natural antipathy of the older monarchies of Europe. Efforts were made to involve the newly established nation in the wars and intrigues of Europe, all of which were met by Washington with such foresight, tact, and prudence that he not only succeeded in avoiding these entanglements but at the same time won the respect and admiration of Europe for the United States.

Washington retired from the Presidency in 1797, honored and respected by the American people. There is but little more to be said about his life. The next two years he lived quietly at Mount Vernon, where he died in 1799, a little more than two years after he retired from the Presidency.

I have endeavored to give you some idea of Washington's life and work in order that you may understand and appreciate why he ranks above all in the estimation of his countrymen. Perhaps the best explanation, and one which will help you to understand why Washington is revered by all Americans as the father of his country, is found in the words of Calvin Coolidge, who in his oration on Washington at the time of the establishment of the George Washington Bicentennial Commission, said:

"We have seen many soldiers who have left behind them little but the memory of their conflicts, but among all the victors the power to establish among a great people a form of self-government which the test of experience has shown will endure was bestowed upon Washington, and Washington alone. Many others have been able to destroy. He was able to construct. That he had around him many great minds does not detract from his glory. His was the directing spirit without which there would have been no independence, no Union, no Constitution, and no Republic. His ways were the ways of truth. He built for eternity. His influence grows. His stature increases with the increasing years. In wisdom of action, in purity of character, he stands alone. We can not yet estimate him. We can only indicate our reverence for him and thank the Divine Providence which sent him to serve and inspire his fellow men."

In a letter to the Secretary of State from Kobe, November 30, 1932, Mr. Donovan reported:

Medals were awarded in November to fifty-seven prize winners in an essay contest on the subject of the life of George Washington. The participants were students of the various middle schools and girls' schools in the Kobe-Osaka district, institutions which correspond to high schools in the United States.

NAGASAKI CELEBRATIONS

At Nagasaki the observance of the George Washington Bicentennial began on February 22. That evening the members of the American Association of Nagasaki gathered at the home of the Kwassui Teachers, each member in costume to make it as nearly as possible like an evening of the American Colonial period. They were both actors and audience in what might have been entitled "A Birthday Party for General Washington."

A Nagasaki dispatch to the JAPAN ADVERTISER, of Tokyo, February 23, says:

The large drawing room with its fireplace of Colonial type was a perfect setting. The numerous lighted candles and the flags, with the thirteen stars of the first flag, added to the illusion of a sudden reversal in time.

The guests as they arrived were greeted at the door by a brisk colored butler (Mr. Krider) and a no less impressive colored mammy (Mrs. Mason). Upon entering the drawing room the guests heard themselves announced with names of Revolutionary memory. Whether they remembered their history perfectly or not, and the names fastened upon them, they at least gave the impression of fully valuing their dignities. A most stately assemblage had gathered when the guests of honor, General Washington (Mr. Bruner, American vice consul) and Mrs. Washington (Mrs. H. B. Hitchcock) were announced.

As the president of the association Captain Truman M. Martin was host and master of ceremonies at the festivities that followed. The dinner was, as nearly as a close study of history could make it, a purely Virginia dinner of the era and was as much appreciated as dinners in those days seem to have been.

After the dinner the guests stepped out of character to sit down and listen to an interesting summary of the life of Washington given by the Rev. Willis G. Hoekje. The chief incidents of the story were illustrated by living pictures, posed by different members. There followed a short program of vocal and instrumental music, introducing songs and tunes of Colonial and post-Revolutionary days.

After the music a minuet was danced, which seemed more than anything else to bring a sense of the courtly manners in the unhurried times when the Father of his Country lived. All of the guests joined in the rest of the dances, the Virginia Reel and the other oldtime steps which have never died in spite of the years and the advanced tempo of modern days.

The association is indebted to the ladies of the American community for a delightful evening with an atmosphere reproducing Revolutionary times. The initiative of Captain Martin is also to be remembered in getting arrangements made in time to give the party on its proper date.

The committee of the American Association in charge of the George Washington Bicentennial Celebration in Nagasaki consisted of Mrs. Henry B. Hitchcock, chairman; Mrs. Walter W. Krider, Miss Caroline S. Peckham, and Captain Truman M. Martin.

Captain Martin forwarded to the Commission in Washington an account of the Bicentennial Celebration at Nagasaki on May 14 prepared by Mrs. Krider, as follows:

The second Bicentennial Celebration of the American Association of Nagasaki was a George Washington Tea, with members and children in costume, held in the garden of the American consulate on May 14, 1932. As the program was given by the seven American children of Nagasaki, the other foreign children of the city and friends were guests of the association.

The program consisted of two short plays depicting episodes in the life of Washington, the dancing of the stately minuet and a tree-planting ceremony of unusual interest.

While planning for the new garden of the American consulate, beech, walnut and magnolia seeds had been received directly from Mount Vernon. They were planted in the garden and by the time the Bicentennial plans were matured, the beech had become a fine young sapling. Captain Truman M. Martin, the president of the association, dedicated and named the tree, while the children, pulling red, white and blue streamers, opened a large white paper balloon and released the branches of the "Washington Beech." May it stand for years as a living record of the Bicentennial spirit of the American Association of Nagasaki!

Special mention is due the consul, Mr. Henry H. Hitchcock, and to Mrs. Hitchcock; for it was their careful planning that made possible the successful carrying out of these programs in Nagasaki.

EVENTS AT NAGOYA

Mr. J. Holbrook Chapman, American Consul at Nagoya, reported to the State Department the following events in his Consular District in connection with the George Washington Bicentennial Celebration:

February 21.—A George Washington commemorative service was held at St. John's Church Higashi Kataha, at 3.45 p. m. It was attended by about 60 local resident Americans and others. The special George Washington sermon was delivered by the Reverend R. E. McAlpine, D. D., who is the American longest resident in Nagoya.

February 22.—The American Consul and Mrs. Chapman gave a reception at the Nagoya Chamber of Commerce and Industry from 4 p. m. to 6 p. m. About 100 persons were present including the Governor of Aichi Prefecture, the Mayor of Nagoya, the Commanding General of the 3rd Army Division and his staff, the Director of the Nagoya Railway Bureau, the Chief Judges of the Nagoya Courts, the officials of the Chamber of Commerce, various prominent industrial and business men of the city, and members of the American, British and other foreign colonies.

In a letter to the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission November 29, 1932, Mr. Chapman said:

Although circumstances did not permit the small colony of Americans residing in Nagoya to realize any Bicentennial commemorative events other than those already reported to you through the Department of State, I have pleasure in informing you that the reading of President Washington's first Thanksgiving Day Proclamation, as contained in President Hoover's Proclamation for 1932, was a special and impressive feature of the annual Thanksgiving Day church service which was held here on November 24, 1932. The service was conducted by the Reverend Arthur C. Knudten. There was an attendance of about 40 persons. I had the honor of reading the President's Proclamation.

AMBASSADOR TELLS OF CHERRY TREES

The Japanese Ambassador, Mr. Katsuji Debuchi, wrote an article for a special Bicentennial edition of THE WASHINGTON TIMES, May 30, 1932, in which he gave the history of the famous Japanese cherry trees in Washington, D. C. The Japanese Embassy also inserted the following announcement in this newspaper:

JAPAN IS PROUD TO JOIN IN CELEBRATION OF THE MEMORY OF GEORGE WASHINGTON

Ambassador Debuchi's article follows:

It gives me great pleasure to participate in the United States George Washington Bicentennial celebration. On this auspicious occasion, I am happy to say a few words concerning the history of the Japanese cherry trees here in Potomac Park.

It was in 1909 that the late Miss Eliza Ruhamah Scidmore, sister of the late Mr. George Hawthorne Scidmore, long American consul general in Yokohama, conceived the idea of bringing cherry trees from Japan and planting them in Potomac Park, the cost to be met by private contributions.

Mrs. Taft, then the First Lady of the Land, who had visited Japan several times on her way to and from the Philippines, and had seen the Japanese cherry blossoms, in all their glory, heard of Miss Scidmore's plan and became an enthusiastic supporter.

When the news of this movement reached Japan, the city of Tokyo took keen interest in it and offered to donate 2,000 trees to the city of Washington as a token of the deep affection cherished by the Japanese people for the people of the United States.

The 2,000 cherry trees reached Seattle on the Japanese steamer Kaga Maru on December 10, 1909. But on arrival and examination at Washington, the trees, to the great disappointment of all, were found infected with various tree diseases and had to be entirely destroyed.

The Americans concerned were deeply grieved over this misfortune, and in January, 1910, the Hon. Philander C. Knox, then Secretary of State, expressed to Baron (now Count) Yasuya Uchida, the Japanese ambassador, the keen sense of regret of the Government of the United States and of the District of Columbia that this unfortunate measure had to be taken in the case of such a handsome gift and one so greatly appreciated by the authorities and people of the city of Washington.

He particularly recognized, in expressing his profound regret, the fact that the municipality of Tokyo selected old trees which were well known to be the most artistic in shape and the most brilliant in blossom, and that these, the finest and most valuable, were also, in the nature of things, trees most likely to be victims of various diseases and insects.

Baron Uchida immediately wrote to his government suggesting that the city of Tokyo be asked to send another consignment, this time taking the necessary precaution to keep the trees free from disease. Not only did the city accept this suggestion but it sent 3,000 carefully inspected trees to replace the previous ill-fated shipment of 2,000.

The preparation of so many young trees for trans-Pacific shipment in wholesome condition required considerable time. However, in February, 1912, the 3,000 trees reached Washington and passed the inspection of the authorities.

On March 27, the ceremony of official planting was performed by Mrs. Taft and Viscountess Chinda, wife of Ambassador Chinda, who had succeeded Baron Uchida. The site chosen for this function was a spot near the Tidal Basin some hundred yards to the west of the statue of John Paul Jones.

The ceremony was simple and was witnessed by a small group including Miss Eliza R. Scidmore, who originated the idea of beautifying Potomac Park with Japanese cherry trees, and Col. Spencer Cosby, the superintendent of public buildings and grounds. This done, the rest of the 3,000 trees were immediately planted along the Tidal Basin and the Potomac.

The spot where the ceremony of official planting took place long remained in obscurity, as there was nothing to indicate the historic scene. Regretting this, Col. Ulysses S. Grant, 3d, Director of Public Buildings and Public Parks of the National Capital, thoughtfully placed on that spot early last year two bronze tablets with appropriate inscriptions.

Such is the brief history of the Japanese cherry trees. We are very happy to see that during the past 20 years they have grown so well under the good care of the park authorities and that they have now enshrined themselves in the hearts of the American people.

Year by year their beautiful blossoms are attracting tens of thousands, perhaps hundreds of thousands, of admiring visitors from every part of the country. Who could imagine at the time when these trees were so unostentatiously ushered in, that they would soon become the pride of the National Capital?

As I wend my way through Potomac Park on early spring mornings, I am always deeply impressed by the wonderful harmony of the scenic beauties of the Washington Monument rising amid the masses of beautiful cherry blossoms. The serenity of their beauty is beyond description as they are reflected in the calm waters of the Tidal Basin.

THE CHERRY TREE STORY IN JAPAN

TO THE AMERICAN FOREIGN SERVICE JOURNAL, September, 1932, Yuki Otsuki, a clerk in the American Consulate General at Tokyo, contributed an article entitled "The Americanization of Japan," in which he gave a Japanese version of the famous

George Washington cherry tree story. It is quoted here in part to show the interest which was aroused in Japan by the Bicentennial Celebration:

In the business world, the modern Japanese business man is assuming American ways, and is brisk and business-like in act and speech. In line with the modern trend, the practical in life is more or less replacing the ideal which formerly ruled in most of the walks of life in Japan. This may be seen in the following George Washington cherry tree story.

George Washington has for about half a century been quite universally known among the Japanese, and the well-known stories connected with his childhood and youth were taught the Japanese children in school. One day a little boy called So-chan, hearing of Washington's cherry tree exploit, was inspired to repeat the incident.

In his father's garden there were some old and treasured Japanese cherry trees, and he went out and after much labor chopped down the choicest one. Then he ran to his father and confessed his sin, starting out with:

"Father, I cannot tell you a lie."

"So-chan," said his father sorrowfully, "I am grieved to hear about the tree. I'd rather have you tell a thousand lies than to cut down that cherry tree."

CELEBRATION ENDS THANKSGIVING DAY

The Honorable Joseph W. Grew, who succeeded Mr. Forbes as American Ambassador to Japan, wrote on November 30, 1932, to the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission:

I am glad to tell you that the President's Thanksgiving Day Proclamation, incorporating the Thanksgiving Proclamation of President Washington, was read by me in St. Mary's Church of Kyoto in the presence of the American community of that city, and by Mr. Neville, Counselor of the Embassy, before representatives of the American community of Tokyo in Holy Trinity Church here, special services being held in both churches which fitly marked the official termination of the Bicentennial celebration.

Owing to my own necessary absence from the capital on that date on important official business, it was impossible for us to hold a reception at the Embassy as we otherwise would have done. However, a reception was held at the Embassy by Mrs. Grew and myself on the Fourth of July. You are already aware of the observance in Japan marking the opening of the Bicentennial celebration on February 22 which was organized by my predecessor, Mr. Forbes, as I at that moment was carrying out a similar observance in Turkey.

CHOSEN

CHOSEN, formerly known as Korea, a country with a history extending back to the twelfth century B. C., and now a colony of Japan, celebrated the George Washington Bicentennial enthusiastically.

George Washington observances were held in Pyengyang, Junten, Koshu, Soonchun, Kwangju, and Seoul, the capital of Chosen. American citizens, British residents of the country and many natives joined in the festivities. Hon. John K. Davis, American Consul General, in a dispatch to the Department of State, May 5, 1932, said:

Although the number of Americans in Chosen is not large and they are mainly scattered in widely separated and small communities, the celebration of the Bicentennial of the birth of George Washington was entered into with enthusiasm. It is believed that much was done to impress upon the minds of the American children the significance of the life of the father of his country.

A religious event inaugurated the celebration in Chosen. On the afternoon of Sunday, February 21, a divine service in memory of George Washington was held at the Morris Hall in Seoul, attended by most of the English-speaking residents of the city. Rev. H. H. Underwood devoted his sermon to the Christian characteristics of the Great American and averred that Washington not only believed in God, but lived according to his belief. Washington's example is worth of world-wide emulation, the preacher said, and might well be followed by Orientals as well as Occidentals with profit.

The American colony in Seoul and many Koreans gathered around the flag staff at the American Consulate General early on the morning of February 22, 1932, at a flag-raising ceremony saluting the dawn of the Bicentennial Year. Boy Scout and Girl Reserve units were present in uniform and sang American patriotic songs.

ADDRESS OF CONSUL GENERAL DAVIS

Consul General Davis addressed the audience on the symbolism of the American flag as follows:

It is particularly appropriate that we should commence our Celebration of the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington with the ceremonious raising of the national colors, for the flag of our nation is very closely associated with Washington in several ways. The first official flag of the union of the American colonies was selected by Washington and was first flown over his headquarters on January 2, 1776. In the upper left hand corner of that flag there were the crosses of St. Andrew and St. George; in marked distinction from the British colors of that day, however, there were 13 red and white stripes. A year and a half later, on June 14, 1777, the Continental Congress determined that the flag of the United States should consist of a union of blue bearing 13 white stars and 13 stripes alternately red and white.

It is supposed that the composition of this flag was inspired by the stripes and the stars in the Washington coat of arms.

The symbolism of the flag has been interpreted in various and pleasing ways. It is interesting to note, however, that the following is the interpretation sometimes attributed to Washington: "We take the stars from Heaven, the red from our mother country, separating it by white stripes, thus showing that we have separated from her, and the white stripes shall go down to posterity representing liberty." Thus the stars in our flag, representing each state, were inspired by the stars of heaven; the red stripes mark our kinship with the mother country, and the white, our liberty.

When two more states were admitted an additional star and an additional stripe was added for each, and from 1795 to 1817 the flag consisted of 15 stars and 15 stripes. However, realizing that a continuation of this plan would soon cause the flag to be out of proportion, in 1818 the Congress decided that, while the addition of each new state should be marked by the increase of the number of stars by one, the number of stripes should remain constant at thirteen.

Incidentally it is interesting to recall that, while the United States of America constitute one of the youngest of the great nations, its flag is one of the oldest, for at different times and for various reasons the flags of other countries have been changed since ours was fixed.

As both the Boy Scouts and the Girl Reserves presumably are thoroughly familiar with the rules governing the treatment of the national colors, it is not necessary at this time to mention that point in detail. It is sufficient to say that the flag should be regarded not merely as a combination of colored bunting but as a living symbol of all that the American people stand for.

Too often we are prone to associate our flag only with our armed forces on land and sea. While this is right and proper it does not go far and deep enough. The flag represents not only our loyal sailors and soldiers. It stands for 120,000,000 people—loyal, hard-working and God-fearing—their civilization and their every ideal. As such the flag should always be regarded and treated carefully and reverently.

ENTHUSIASTIC GATHERING AT SEOUL

During the afternoon of February 22, 1932, the name of Washington was commemorated at an invitational gathering in the Post Chapel of the John D. Wells School. According to THE SEOUL PRESS, an English-language newspaper printed in the capital city:

"Customary American hospitality coupled with American 'pep' prevailed throughout the celebration."

In answer to invitations from the American Association of Seoul and Americans living in Chemulpo, five hundred persons "representing various nations and all walks of life" were present on this auspicious occasion. In honor of the function the Post Chapel was profusely decorated with American flags which covered the four walls of the building. Two cherry trees in full bloom flanked the sides of the platform and directly behind the pulpit was a large picture of George Washington draped with the flags of America and Japan. Prior to the entertainment the guests passed along the reception line and conveyed their felicitations to the American Committee. This formality was followed by a box luncheon. The boxes, containing delicacies of all descriptions, were appropriately decorated with silhouettes of George and Martha Washington and the American national colors.

The program included opening remarks by Mr. Whittemore; a selection by S. F. S. Orchestra from Haydn, who it was noted, was born in 1732, the year of Washington's birth; announcement of winners in a George Washington essay contest by the Consul General; reading of the essays; a solo, "Yankee Doodle" sung by Howard Rhodes; a solo, "Beneath a Weeping Willow's Shade," by Francis Hopkinson (dedicated to George Washington, 1788) sung by Miss Dameron; a minuet by the International Quartet—Mrs. Dennis (American), Miss Bennett (British), Miss Martel (French) and Miss Tulkin (Russian); and singing of "America the Beautiful" by all. Following this part of the program a moving picture was screened by courtesy of the Paramount Corporation and the local theater, Chosen Gekijo.

THE SEOUL PRESS remarked:

The spirit of '76 was instilled in all present by the snappy singing of "Yankee Doodle" by Howard Rhodes. So enthusiastic were the audience in the catchy tune that all joined in singing the refrain to the song.

The winners of the George Washington Essay Contest, as announced by Consul General Davis, were, for the high school, Barbara Koons and Muriel Frampton, who won first and second prizes, respectively, with honorable mention to Frank Barnhart; and, for the grammar school, Thomas Winn and Margaret Martin, with honorable mention to Jeonnette Oberg.

Consul General Davis reported:

The film, "George Washington—His Life and Times," was secured from the George Washington Bicentennial Celebration Committee in Japan and shown in Seoul to American and other English-speaking children and their parents on April 8th, 1932, and to the foreign consular officers and a number of Japanese officials and the American and foreign business community on April 11th. On both occasions the American Consul General and his wife were the hosts. The film was also shown to the American communities at the Oriental Consolidated Mining Company's mines at Unsankinko and at Heijo.

INTERNATIONAL CELEBRATION AT KOSHU

Only nine adult Americans were resident in Koshu, Chosen, at the opening of the Bicentennial Year, but these nine, together with their English-speaking friends and native citizens, numbering more than 150, gathered in true Bicentennial spirit on the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington and were addressed by Hon. Tetsuro Okasaki, Governor of the South Chusei Province of Chosen. The following translation of Governor Okasaki's address was sent to the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission by Consul General Davis:

Today being the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington, who was born in the United States of America and is one of the world's great men, the American residents in this place, with Mr. William and Mr. Amendt as their representatives, assemble in celebration for the occasion. Having been honored with an invitation, I take pleasure in presenting congratulations in a few words.

As to the greatness of Washington, there is a story, although it may be a fiction, in which it is said that when he was very young he directly told his father that he had cut down a cherry tree. Through this story of his honesty the children of Japan deeply feel his estimable personality and receive profound instruction. Although Washington was a man of distant America, he lives very close to the hearts of the children.

According to history, although not much is known of his youth, Washington received only elementary education, and was not, therefore, very prominent in his learning. It was, therefore, his innate character that made him the best of representative statesmen and leaders of America; and I believe that he must have, unknown to men, persevered in his search for education and culture in the meantime.

In this I respect and esteem Washington as a man and at the same time think that his perseverance and straight-forward life teach us the lessons of immortality.

As historians allege, Washington was the greatest man in war, in peace, and in the hearts of his people. He was born on February 22, 1732, and went to everlasting sleep in 1799. He was childless when he left the world, but the people one and all said that he left a child called the United States. Washington is still respected therefore as the great and only father of America.

The celebrations held by the Americans in various places in the world today for the birth of this great man are only recompenses paid to him as sons do their father, and are also displays of gratitude to the mother country by you who are living far away from home. Herein I sincerely express my respects and at the same time pray with all my heart, in thanking you for your cordial feelings, that your fatherland may continue prosperous to the everlasting time.

SCHOOL TAKES LEAD AT PYENGYANG

The Foreign School, under the principalship of Mr. R. O. Reiner, took the leading part in the Bicentennial Celebration in Pyengyang, Chosen. There was presented to this school by the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission, through Consul General Davis, a large portrait of George Washington, which was framed and hung with appropriate ceremony. On February 22, the same school inaugurated a George Washington essay contest, a prize being offered for the best essay by Consul General Davis, who wrote with respect to this contest and that in Seoul:

Owing to the fact that the students in these two schools are roughly half American and half British, no restrictions as to nationality of contestants were imposed. A very lively interest was manifested in both institutions and the British students also took an active part and won some of the prizes.

On May 7 the same school staged, as another Bicentennial project, a pageant entitled "America Must Not Fail," which featured Washington prominently and was widely praised and patronized.

The churches of Pyengyang joined with the Foreign School in making the Bicentennial Celebration a success in the city. On Sunday, February 21, the subject of the day in the community church was "George Washington as a Christian Gentleman."

PROGRAM AT KWANGJU

No obstacles were allowed to stand in the way of the Bicentennial Celebration in Kwangju. From the Mission of the Southern Presbyterian Church in that city the following information regarding the Bicentennial was received in the form of a letter of Flora McNeill Boyce, teacher in the Kwangju School for American children:

Having only seven children, the eldest ten years old, I found that none of the plays sent out from home fitted our needs, so we wrote an original one of our own, incorporating within it several suitable poems, songs, and the little play "The Making of Our First Flag."

The children and I certainly enjoyed this activity more than any other during the whole school year, and I consider it the most valuable not only as a creative project in English and self-expression but also in bringing America and American ideals into the daily life of these little Americans so far removed from the homeland. The play was called "Celebrating for George Washington."

PLAY GIVEN AT SOONCHUN

In Soonchun the mission of the Southern Presbyterian Church, under the direction of Miss Nanette Walker, staged a Bicentennial program for the Parent-Teachers' Association. The event was held in the School for Missionary Children and was widely patronized. The principal part of the program was an original George Washington play, written by Mignon Quaw Lowt, titled "When Martha and George Return."

POLAND

POLAND celebrated the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington with a wholehearted enthusiasm that demonstrated the sincerity of the friendship between the Polish and American peoples—a friendship that has grown with the passing years since two gallant Polish soldiers, Thaddeus Kościuszko, and Casimir Pułaski, unsheathed their swords in the cause of American freedom.

Notable and impressive ceremonies in honor of the First President of the United States, sponsored by the highest officials of the Polish Government, were held in many parts of Poland on American and Polish national holidays during the year 1932. American residents participated in all of the exercises as the guests of the Polish people.

The keynote of the celebration was sounded in the following cablegrams to President Hoover:

CELEBRATION ON NATIONAL SCALE

Preparations for the celebration in Poland were begun in the summer of 1931, mainly through the efforts of Leopold Kotnowski, president of the Polish-American Society, and the affiliated Polish-American Chamber of Commerce. A George Washington Bicentennial Committee for Warsaw, consisting of members of these two organizations, was formed in September, 1931, but it soon became apparent that the observance was of sufficient importance to the Polish people to warrant a celebration on a national scale. The Central Committee for the Celebration in Poland of the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington was then organized, with the President of Poland, Ignace Mościcki, and the First Marshal of the Polish Army, Joseph Piłsudski, at its head.

The United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission was advised of the organization of the central committee in a letter dated December 16, 1931, from Mr. Kotnowski, from which the following was taken:

"This Committee is the outcrop of a small tentative committee which was originally formed solely of members of this Society and the Polish-American Chamber of Commerce. The idea of celebrating the George Washington Anniversary met with such a warm response in Polish circles that various governmental and municipal officials as well as heads of social organizations and prominent individuals offered their assistance and co-operation in the organization of the celebration. At a meeting held in our headquarters in which representatives of the interested governmental offices and social organizations participated, a resolution was passed to the effect that the anniversary is of such significance that it merits observation on a national scale and that whenever possible the public at large should take part in the exercises. It was furthermore decided that in view of the general character given the celebration, the original committee be re-organized along the lines of a National Polish Committee with the Polish-American Society prominently represented by Polish members and with Ambassador Willys as member of the Honorary Committee. In conjunction with this decision it was unanimously agreed that Americans in Poland be considered as guests of the Polish community and be invited to participate in all the exercises that will be held in connection with the Washington Anniversary."

It was definitely decided also that the celebration in Poland would be entirely financed by the Polish people themselves.

Besides the President of Poland and the First Marshal of the Polish army, the honorary members of the central committee were:

August Zaleski, Minister of Foreign Affairs.
John North Willys, American Ambassador to Poland.
Władysław Raczkiewicz, Speaker of the Senate.
Casimir Świtalski, Speaker of the Diet.
Zygmunt Słomiński, Mayor of Warsaw.

The acting committee consisted of:

Leopold Kotnowski, Chairman, President of the Polish-American Society.
Stanislas Arct, Vice-President of the Polish-American Society.
Helen de Bisping, Vice-President of the Polish-American Society.
Mary Brun, Member of Board of Directors of the Polish-American Society.
Stanislas K. Centkiewicz, Secretary of the Polish-American Society.
General Gustavus Orlicz-Dreszer, Inspector of the Polish Army.
Peter Drzewiecki, Former Mayor of Warsaw.
Colonel Bronislaw Gembarzewski, Director of the National Museum.
Dr. Marcel Handelsman, Professor of Warsaw University.

Constantine Hejmowski, Vice-President of the Polish-American Chamber of Commerce.

Captain Stanislas Klak, Representative of the Ministry of War.

Michael Kwapiszewski, Polish Consul General.

Dr. Alfred Lauterbach, Director of State Art Collections.

Stephen Lenartowicz, Representative of the Society of Friends of the Polish National Alliance.

Baroness Helen Lesser, Member of the Board of Directors of the Polish-American Society.

Prince Stanislas Lubomirski, President of the Union of Industry, Mining, Trade and Finance.

Władysław Michalski, Professor of Warsaw Polytechnical Institute.

Francis Niemiec, Chief of Educational and Cultural Section, Warsaw City Hall.

Richard Ordynski, Theatrical Director.

Leon Orłowski, Counselor of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs.

Victor Podoski, Assistant Chief of the Anglo-American section in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs.

Francis Pułaski, Ex-Minister of Poland to the United States.

Professor Adolf Suligowski, Ex-Mayor of Warsaw.

Venceslas Szymański, Member of the Board of Directors of the Polish-American Society.

Leopold Tomaszewicz, Member of the Diet.

Dr. Mieczysław Treter, Director of the Society for the Promotion of Polish Art Abroad.

Dr. Jacob Vorzimmer, Representative of the Organization Council of Poles Abroad.

Thaddeus Woytkowski, Counselor of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs.

The first celebration in Poland to commemorate the Bicentennial was a George Washington ball held in Warsaw January 9, 1932, under the auspices of the Polish-American Society at the Hotel European. More than 200 guests were present, including, according to the newspaper KURJER WARSZAWSKI, "the best Warsaw society, representatives of the government, the diplomatic corps, and the whole American and foreign colony."

An artistic program of songs and dances was given by Polish artists who were dressed for the occasion in American Colonial costumes.

Following closely the plans made by the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission for the celebration in the United States, the Central Committee in Warsaw named Washington's birthday, February 22, as the date for the official opening of the Bicentennial in Poland. With all the appearance of a great Polish national holiday, the celebration in honor of George Washington began with programs and ceremonies conducted in all the principal cities of the republic.

OPENING PROGRAM IN WARSAW

In Warsaw the ceremonies on February 22 were held under the auspices of the Central Committee as an "academy" or assembly, and took place in the Town Hall, the most pretentious building in the Polish capital. The meeting was attended by the President of Poland, the Premier, the Acting Minister of Foreign Affairs, the Cardinal of Warsaw, chiefs of diplomatic missions in Warsaw, other governmental, municipal, and religious officials, and prominent citizens of Poland and other countries. A leading orchestra of Warsaw furnished music for the occasion, playing the American and Polish national anthems.

Mr. Kotnowski presided at the assembly and delivered the opening speech.

"It would be difficult to find an individual in the records of the past who symbolizes a whole nation to such an extent as Washington symbolizes the American people," said Mr. Kotnowski, in summing up the character of the First President of the United States. "He moulded his nation into a picture and likeness of himself."

Mr. Kotnowski's speech in its entirety follows:

In behalf of the Central Committee for the Celebration of the Washington Bicentenary in Poland I have the honor of opening this public mass-meeting.

Let this day therefore pass in Poland, as in the United States and in other countries of the world, under the slogan of homage to Washington.

Why is the memory of Washington worshipped so solemnly by the nations of the world today?

You will soon hear the answer to this question from the Honorable Władysław Raczkiewicz, Marshal of the Senate, and from the Honorable Zygmunt Słomiński, President of the City of Warsaw, who though pressed by their high official duties have found time to lend authority to this gathering and to express the thought and sentiments that actuate the Polish community today. A more detailed answer will also be given by Professor Szymon Askenazy, who will draw upon his wealth of historical knowledge to mould the figure of Washington against the background of American history and of certain periods of Poland's past.

My answer to the question can be congested into one sentence: The whole world worships the memory of George Washington because he was the founder of a New Nation. Christopher Columbus discovered the New World. In that New World Washington brought to life a New Nation.

Indeed, it would be difficult to find an individual in the records of the past who symbolized a whole nation to such an extent as Washington symbolizes the American people. He moulded his nation into a picture and likeness of himself.

Practically self-educated, he applied himself from early youth to hard work—work that was purposeful, practical and remunerative. Missions and tasks calling for pioneering, investigation and invention had the greatest attraction for him. Later on he took upon himself the difficult task of organizing an army and of leading it against great odds to victory. Still later on in life he devoted himself to civic, social, administrative and legislative work. Work for the sake of work, just as others pursue art for art's sake. And with all this an astonishing calmness and equanimity; an always clear, fresh and active mind; a simpleness, orderliness and steadfastness in undertakings and in means of attaining aims. These are the elementary properties of Washington, the characteristics of the American nation.

How great were the pains and how hard the task of forming that nation in the heat of battles for independence, in adversities and victories, under the hardships of war, under the necessity of uniting various dissentient social groups, villages, cities, entire regions—of all this we learn from history.

It is therefore only natural that the American people should deem Washington "The Father of Their Country" and should worship him with such love and devotion as no other nation is capable of in the veneration of its great heroes.

That worship is joined in today by the Polish nation which is represented by the Central Committee for the Celebration in Poland of the 200th Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington, over which extends the protectorate of the President of the Republic and Marshal Piłsudski.

I take the liberty of briefly describing how Washington's anniversary will be celebrated in Poland. The Washington exercises were begun by a concert and ball of the Polish-American Society held on January 9. The Ministry of Posts and Telegraph will issue a postage stamp, bearing the likenesses of Washington, Kościuszko and Pułaski, which will soon be offered for sale. The first imprint of the stamp was sent in a suitably decorated album to the Polish Embassy in Washington for presentation to President Hoover. A street running along one side of Paderewski Park will be named after Washington. Paderewski Park has also been chosen for the site of the planting of a "Washington Tree." Thanks to the efforts of the Central Committee, the Czartoryski Museum in Cracow lent a volume of Washington autographs to the Historical Loan Exhibition in Washington. The United States George Washington Commission received as a gift from the Polish Committee Professor Konopczyński's work about Pułaski and Professor Korzon's work about Kościuszko, the latter volume in a specially decorated binding. The Central Committee, moreover, published a pamphlet entitled "George Washington," by Captain Karol Koźmiński, which was widely distributed among soldiers and school children. An article entitled "Poland's Tribute to Washington" was sent to the Americanization School Association for publication in a magazine which will include similar articles contributed by all the principal nations of the world. In addition, the Warsaw radio station will mainly devote its today's program to Washington.

Outside of Warsaw, in all the palatinate seats of Poland, in schools and garrisons, there are being held today gatherings, lectures, parades, and other celebrations. Entire Poland reverberates today to the outcry:

Honor to Washington!

The next speaker on the program was Władysław Raczkiewicz, president of the Senate of Poland, who pointed out the value of George Washington's example of public honesty and integrity to all men in official life today.

"Great men form the touchstones of great ideas throughout the ages. Great virtues are personified by great men," were Mr. Raczkiewicz's opening words. He then continued:

It is the individual man who elevates himself and becomes for millions of others the ideal towards which they strive. The great men of history are either the incarnation of some dominant idea of their time, or else they form the personification of a great quality, or a great virtue. Some are instruments of supernatural forces, others impose their personality through the harmonious co-ordination in their minds of all human feelings and aspirations dormant in man's soul.

At a period of crisis and transition in our modern times, the power of simplicity and frank relation to the truth in life found its perfect, bronze-cast expression in the great figure of George Washington.

Today's celebration in Washington's honor is a day of rejoicing for the United States and therefore for all the friends of that country. George Washington's figure in history is also a source of hope for the ultimate victory of truth and courage for all those working in public life. Washington's memory gives meaning to everything which in public life stands for character and nobility. Washington's name will for all time be a war cry against that pride, that love of intrigue, and that smallness of mind which hinders politicians from seeing the truth.

In his diary, during the first years of public life, Washington's thoughts used to dwell on the necessity of keeping alive within one's soul that divine spark called conscience. And when the struggle for independence had been won, and he stood there as President of a free nation, in the full development of his personality, he wrote to Lafayette with the same youthful simplicity that peace, honesty and industry were the means by which his country could become a great and happy nation. He added that the way to a nation's happiness was as clear as a ray of light.

Washington was indeed great in this unswerving march towards truth and in facing great realities in a straightforward way.

Washington never swerved from the path he had chosen for himself and for his nation. For him there was reserved a joy denied to many others; that of seeing his work mature.

He left this life surrounded by the respect and consideration of his fellow countrymen. He served as an example of the fact that the straight path is the road to great results.

Washington entered public life as a mature man. The early years spent in retirement had taught him to love nature and to understand man's social life set against the background of nature's laws. Young Washington learned to understand the beat of his fellow citizens' hearts as he listened to the voices of nature. When the hour of battle arrived he stood in the front rank of his fellow countrymen and led them to victory. On his standard there were written no narrow political or economic aims, but the words: Independence and Unity. The arduous life of a soldier was the second great school in which his mind received its formation. It is thanks to that harmony of civic and military qualities, steeled in the changing fortunes of battle, that Washington brought with him into public life those values of mind and character which made his contemporaries at once recognize him as a man superior to other, though also worthy, political leaders.

Washington's historians note as a salient trait of his character his wish not to be eternally present at the helm of affairs. While exerting the greatest possible influence over matters, at the same time, he gave his subordinates full scope for their initiative and independence. He, himself, when carrying on his own tasks, always worked far and away above and beyond the narrow limits of duties fixed by the letter of the law. He looked at problems a long way ahead. This explains his temperance in forming opinions about current matters and his forbearance in regard to the opinions of others. A lover of truth in the life of the community, he understood the role of the State as a factor of political unity and moral cohesion for the nation. Full of respect for democracy and political freedom, he was able to find for his country the golden mean between the unity and sovereignty of the State and the freedom of the individual and his independent existence.

It is to Washington's wisdom that the United States owes that peculiar trait of the Constitution which has enabled the American nation to collaborate closely and in unison not only in moments of great enthusiasm but also in every day life.

Washington's historians must have noted that whenever Washington undertook the study of foreign forms of government, he did not always act with the desire to notice this or that peculiar form of government in a given state. On the contrary, he tried to see the realization in every case of the vital ideas and necessities of each nation. This realism of thought he applied to finding a form of government suited to his country. In this way he created a stable edifice which became the cornerstone of the present power of the United States.

Poland while paying tribute to Washington's memory can not tear her gaze away from her own history; namely, from that part of it which was contemporary to his period. The end of the Eighteenth Century was for Poland a period of decline. Oppressed from abroad, our country did not find a man who could waken the slumbering forces of the nation by improving its political condition. Kościuszko's action and the Constitution of May 3, remained the symbols of a rebirth that was to come. Thanks to them the suffering of foreign domination steeled the soul of the nation, until after 150 years there came the day of the resurrection of the State, the day when in battle and in the hardships of a great struggle, as in America in Washington's days, the cornerstones of the State edifice began to crystallize, welded together by forces acting in unison with a great will.

The time of our suffering united Poland closer than ever to Washington's tradition.

Millions of Poles, exiled by fate from their once free native country found in Washington's country their new home and became a living tie with the old motherland.

George Washington is the symbol of all those qualities of the American Nation, which make Poland rejoice in the fact that it is in his country that Polish emigrants have settled and remain its faithful citizens.

It is with this conviction that independent Poland today pays tribute, on the 200th anniversary of his birth, to the qualities of the great man, whose character, loyalty, and patriotism should be for all an ideal towards which to strive. Poland today pays tribute to the great American, to the great and victorious General, to the national hero of a country in which millions of Polish hearts today beat in unison with us here.

Poland with all her heart today reveres the name of George Washington.

The orchestra then played in stirring manner the American national anthem, "The Star Spangled Banner." Mayor Zygmunt Słomiński, of Warsaw, spoke briefly of the friendship existing between the United States and Poland and emphasized the deep appreciation of the Polish people for the freedom they now enjoy. Mr. Słomiński said:

The United States of America today celebrates a great national holiday, the Bicentennial Anniversary of the birth of George Washington, its greatest hero and the creator of independence and power. In the hearts of Poles, in the hearts of the citizens of Warsaw, this anniversary wakes a resounding echo. The nation which itself endured over a hundred years' slavery, often trying to get rid of the trying fetters, must worship such a warrior who fought for freedom. Furthermore, with the name of this great American patriot are closely connected the names of the Polish national heroes, Kościuszko and Pułaski, whose noble love of freedom led them to the battlefield of the nation fighting for independence on the other side of the ocean.

Today Poland celebrates this anniversary as a free nation. This same America for whose independence Poles fought at Washington's side gave to Poland assistance in its regeneration. That is why the American holiday is also a holiday for us. The street which the city is naming after Washington will render imperishable to the citizens of Warsaw the memory of the great hero. But in our hearts we will maintain a still more lasting memory, as before George Washington's name every Pole will bend his head with deep respect.

Professor Szymon Askenazy, eminent Polish historian, followed with a highly interesting biographical sketch of George Washington declaring that Washington "was not blinded by hatred toward the old country," but that he "rather kept for her a filial sentiment." Washington, he said, was not one of those who started the Revolution, but "his lot was to become its savior."

Professor Askenazy's entire speech follows:

The centennial celebration of George Washington's birthday coincided for Poland with the tragic time which followed the failure of the national insurrection of November, 1831; hence Warsaw was at that moment a city of silent sorrow. But the Bicentennial finds her doing her share in the honoring of the greatest American as behooves the capital of a free sister Republic.

George Washington was descended from three generations of immigrant planters. The scion of a family of modest means, he had little to help him at the start yet—prompted by his hunger for more possessions and his love of the soil—he gradually came to own a 3,000 acre estate which meant uncommonly large property in those times, in that part of the country. A daring Virginia settler, pioneering close to the Indian frontier, Washington bears a certain psychological resemblance to those strong men of the Polish gentry in the eastern borderland who kept guard both with the sword and plough along the "Black Trail" of the Tartar inroads. Washington's farming diaries telling of the novelty change from tobacco planting to the growing of wheat (quite probably from imported Polish seed), dwelling on his favorite horses, mentioning the riding to hounds and the ever so frequent frontier skirmishes, impress one as somewhat reminiscent of the Polish home and farm chronicles of old.

He was a thorough farmer but along with that a clever business man. Having resigned his post of honor as commander of the Virginia militia as soon as the need for war was over, he early established a home and soothed the ever present scar of his secret love with the comfort of a sensible and financially helpful marriage. There followed years devoted to agricultural pursuits. When a young man his temper was easily upset, he was sensitive and liable to fits of anger. In the course of time, through will power supported by clear thinking, he achieved inner resistance, concentration and self-control. He turned reserved and reticent, especially in his older age; the feature which never changed in him was innate subtlety. His was not a quick mind but possessed of stableness and great precision. A born realist, he would closely calculate both things material and spiritual. Was not his last minute attention given on his death bed to feeling quietly his own waning pulse?

He was six feet tall, of a heavy build although spare of flesh, big-boned and muscular. Large hands and feet, an oblong face, a prominent nose and firmly set jaw. There was a keen look to his grayish blue eyes.

At the ripe age of over forty he was caught in the controversy between the colonies and the mother country to be carried on to the lofty destinies commensurate with his mental and moral caliber.

Recent researches in American history resulted in a milder judgment on the legal angle of the fault and mistake of the London government but there is no vindication of the essential political error. Lord Chatham rightly denounced it at the time of the controversy. Its consequences taught England a useful lesson instrumental in changing the British policy in regard to the Dominions.

George Washington was not blinded by hatred toward the old country; he rather kept for her a filial sentiment. He did not belong to those who started the revolution; his lot was to become its savior. Picked by a most fortunate choice to be the leader of the insurrectionary forces, he shouldered the gigantic responsibility of a fight against amazing odds. To the overwhelming numbers of British regulars he could oppose but the hurriedly drafted revolutionary army, poorly equipped, apt to melt away any time on practically no notice. He was subordinated to the power of Congress, a body ignorant of things military, inefficient, suspicious, jealous in matters of authority. Impediments and insult would continually come to him from those quarters. His own subaltern officers would cause him unending trouble, inclusive of the notorious "Conway's Cabal." Sheer treason was not lacking among the means devised to bring about the ruin of the great chief. According to his own words, George Washington was tortured by the dilemma before his mind, to remain at the cost of his reputation or to leave and let the cause perish.

During the first and hardest three years he walked on brittle ice, as it were, with everything liable to collapse and sink any minute. Later, upon the securing of French alliance and support, he found himself on solid ground. Finally, after the defeat and surrender of the English the scales of Fate tipped decidedly in favor of America. The victorious chief was then confidentially approached by army delegates with the offer of a crown. Washington declined. He termed the proposal the greatest insult both to himself and the country.

Peace, a period of relaxation, followed the hardships of war. George Washington resigned the office of commander-in-chief in a magnificent address to the Congress. He duly expressed thanks to those from whom he had been taking orders; he recommended his well deserving army and the cause of the people to their care; he never mentioned all he had suffered at the hands of these very same masters; never told a word about himself. Then he quietly withdrew to his home in the countryside.

Within a short time, however, he had to be at the helm once more to serve the people in matters of administration. The new Union was undergoing a severe post-war crisis. The difficulties to be faced were both of the political and economic kind. The bonds uniting the states were still loose and fragile while anarchy undermined things at the bottom. On the morrow following the hard-won Independence there had already emerged hideous features of disintegration. At the head of the Federal Convention George Washington was directing the work of rescue, the building up of national legislation. This he had to do amidst a general chaos of cross ideas and conceptions. The extreme Puritan traditions of the Pilgrim Fathers and the world-upsetting slogans of Rousseau, the progressive tendencies of the forerunners of the Democratic Party and the conservative opinions heralding the Republican Party to-be clashed all over the country. Nevertheless Washington's firm hand guided the legislative efforts on and up to the successful completion of the Constitution which is still, in these days, the basis for the prosperity of the United States.

Elected first president of the Union, he made the Constitution stand its "baptism of fire," the test of the exigencies of life. Charged with allegedly monarchist inclinations, he proved himself the mainstay of the Republic. To him the constitutional Chart was a thing holy, based upon the foundation rock of independent exercise of justice. He was for the government of the people, for the people, and by the people through the agency of free representatives and the factor of lawful executive power. In all administrative matters he was every inch a gentleman. He would invite his adversaries to share in the government; he appointed Jefferson, the foremost among his opponents, secretary of foreign affairs (state secretary). He respected the opinions of other people. He had self-respect. Above all things he felt respect for his country, the land and the people from which he sprang and to whom he owed his exalted position. He made his two-term administration the ever living model to all the line of his successors. "His integrity was most pure," says his great successor and antagonist, Jefferson, "his justice the most inflexible I have ever known, no motives of interest or consanguinity, of friendship or hatred, being able to bias his decision. . . . For his was the singular destiny and merit . . . of scrupulously obeying the laws through the whole of his career, civil and military, of which the history of the world furnishes no other example."

At the end of his second-term administration George Washington issued his ever famous Farewell Address to the Nation and retired to his quiet home on the Potomac. He did not, however, cease to watch over the Union. His last efforts were instrumental in warding off the menace of a new war.

This is for Poland the year of two coinciding bicentennials; the one which we are celebrating this day is the glorious anniversary of the first President of the United States; the other evokes remembrances of dusk and sadness attached to the name of the last king of the old Polish Republic.

George Washington for quite a long time knew nothing about Poland. He didn't even know that, scores of years before the landing of his own forebears on the American soil, immigrant Polish craftsmen taught the first colonists of Virginia the way to produce tar from forest trees and potash from lumber cinders. The first time he heard of Poland was when Poles came to him to share in the fight for the independence of America. The solitary Kościuszko was the first to come, then Pułaski with his group of companions, lastly, the first Polish volunteers headed by Mieszkowski, all of them having already served in the French Foreign Legion. They were the sons of a distant land bleeding from the recent wounds of the First Partition.

Simultaneously with the arrival of these volunteer fighters for the cause of freedom Washington could see plenty of German hirelings in the British ranks. He learned how Frederick of Prussia had turned disgustedly from the message of the "American rebels," how Catherine of Russia had offered England to help punish these "criminal insurgents." Seized with apprehensions he would inquire of the Congress whether the Russians were already on their way to these shores? Since those moments of agonizing worry he began to take interest in the fate of Poland. He watched with genuine sympathy the valiant efforts of the Great Polish Diet and the Insurrection under the leadership of Kościuszko desperately opposing the Second Partition. Upon the failure of those efforts he cordially welcomed Kościuszko on the second visit of the Polish hero to the United States.

Soon after, the great George Washington passed away. The shock of his death united the whole American nation in a common feeling of reverence for the Father of Their Country. The other nations realized at the same time what George Washington meant to the world at large. The recognition of his merit was first heralded by a young leader, the new rising power across the seas. "George Washington is dead," reads the order of the First Consul, Bonaparte, to the French army.

"This great Man fought tyranny. His name will be for ever cherished by all the free men in both hemispheres."

There were at that time in Paris three Polish heroes "without a country," all three of them nursing in turn hope and sorrow, Kościuszko, Dąbrowski, and Kniaziewicz. At the news of Washington's death they donned signs of mourning. The same was done by all the Polish political exiles in Paris. The order was issued by Dąbrowski to the Polish Legion in Italy to pin emblems of mourning to their uniforms and to shroud their banners.

There passed by over a century. The American Union grew to be the foremost world power. Conquered and partitioned Poland survived in spite of calamitous conditions. Finally, at the advent of the day of her liberation the first signal for it rang in the country of George Washington. Woodrow Wilson, an enthusiastic biographer of Washington and one of his most eminent successors, did not forget his duty toward the cause of Poland amidst all the various obligations resulting from the World War. In the name of the one who achieved freedom and unity for the American states, Woodrow Wilson proclaimed the reconstruction of a united and independent Poland. Carrying his message of peace he left for Europe on board the steamer "George Washington" purposely selected for the occasion. He entered Paris amidst enthusiastic ovations on the day he had chosen, again in commemoration of the first President (December 14, the anniversary of the passing away of Washington). Under the auspices, as it were, of Washington's spirit, Woodrow Wilson carried out the work of universal pacification on the basis of which took place an all-important work of justice, the reconstruction of Poland.

The monument of the Father of the United States towers above the city of his name, the capital city on the Potomac. The monument of the honored victor in the fight with Great Britain stands in Trafalgar Square in London. The Poles admire the great things George Washington did for his own country and they remember all he meant and does mean to humanity. Washington built for himself a lasting monument in the hearts of the Polish nation.

In the absence of the United States Ambassador, John North Willys, then in the United States, Joseph Flack, Chargé d'Affaires ad interim of the United States Embassy, represented his country on the program. Mr. Flack first expressed the deep regret of the Ambassador at not being able to be present and his own appreciation for the privilege of participating in the Polish tribute to George Washington. He said that no American could "fail to be deeply touched and be sincerely appreciative of this evidence of the thoughts that exist in Poland with regard to the memory of George Washington."

Mr. Flack then continued:

An examination of the pages of history readily establishes that all of the world's difficult problems have not been crowded into our own times. You have heard Professor Askenazy describe the difficulties and vicissitudes encountered by Washington in his earlier years, which did not cease even after he was unanimously elected as our first President. Of this period Thomas Paine, one of his contemporaries, said in 1776, that it was a time which tried men's souls. However, Washington's hopes were based on the loyalty of his collaborators and on his confidence in his fellow citizens in whose future he believed and in this belief he was rewarded by witnessing some measure of realization during the closing years of his life.

In those troublesome times there came to America several gallant gentlemen to assist his country in its struggles and among those from your nation, were two who became closely associated with him.

Kościuszko arrived in America in 1776 with a letter of recommendation from Benjamin Franklin, then at Paris. Washington asked him what he wished, believing that like many other foreigners he had come to ask for some favor. Kościuszko replied that he had come to fight as a soldier for American independence. He was commissioned a colonel of engineers and the facts of his distinguished career and the building of the West Point fortifications, now the site of the United States Military Academy, are very well known.

At the personal suggestion of General Washington, his friend Kościuszko was awarded the rank of honorary Brigadier General in 1783, and in addition, the thanks of Congress.

You will recall that just before Kościuszko's death in 1817, he released all the serfs on his Polish estates. An earlier impulse of this generous-hearted man occurred in 1798, when on his final departure from the United States, he left a document in the hands of his friend, Thomas Jefferson, directing that in the event of his death, unless otherwise disposed of, his property in America should be sold and the proceeds used to buy negro slaves and then present them with their freedom.

The young Pułaski, a brilliant cavalry officer, who came across the seas also with a letter from Franklin, received a somewhat cooler welcome from the Continental Congress, to which he bore an added recommendation from Washington. Washington also wrote to John Hancock, then President of the Continental Congress, recommending Pułaski's plan for a mounted corps.

Meanwhile, Pułaski grew impatient and joined the army without any command. Later, when General Howe was marching to capture Philadelphia with 20,000 troops, Washington found himself in a difficult position without any cavalry and without reliable information regarding the British movements. He then gave Pułaski command of his own bodyguard comprising 30 horsemen and Pułaski so distinguished himself with this small troop that the Congress named him "Commander of the Horse, with the rank of Brigadier." Pułaski, in organizing the small cavalry force available, was in fact the first Chief of the United States Cavalry.

Dissatisfied with the condition of the cavalry and feeling the criticism of himself because he did not speak sufficient English, Pułaski resigned his command in March, 1778, but instead of turning his back on America, he enlisted an independent force which later became famous as the "Pułaski Legion."

Far from seeking to enhance his own fortune, it is a matter of record that Count Casimir Pułaski spent at least $50,000 of his own money in raising and equipping troops for this war in far-off America.

At the age of 31, Pułaski died in battle at Savannah, after a life so aptly epitomized by King Stanislas II of Poland in the words, "Pułaski died as he lived—a hero."

Washington never knew Poland, but he knew much of her spirit through his association with Kościuszko and Pułaski, who came to assist him and became his valued friends and companions in arms, and the honors which you are conferring upon his memory are dedicated not only to Washington, the great American patriot, but are also a tribute to Washington, the friend of those gallant Polish gentlemen, who with their fellow countrymen earned the gratitude of the United States Government for the loyal assistance rendered in the Revolutionary War.

It is a very great pleasure for me to be able to convey on this occasion the personal greetings of the Secretary of State, Mr. Stimson, and to express my Government's deep appreciation of the friendly and spontaneous participation of Poland in the celebration of the 200th Anniversary of the birth of George Washington.

The program in the Town Hall was closed with the playing of the Polish National Anthem.

The celebration in Warsaw was continued that evening by a Bicentennial broadcast relayed to all radio broadcasting stations in Poland. Mr. Kotowski was the featured speaker on this program.

The day was concluded with a reception given at the United States Embassy by Mr. Flack and attended by Polish government officials, members of the diplomatic and consular corps, and prominent Polish and American citizens in Warsaw.

GDYNIA RENAMES STREET FOR WASHINGTON

In the city of Gdynia the celebration began on the morning of February 22 with commemorative services in honor of George Washington at the Catholic Church of the Virgin Mary and at the Evangelic Church of the Naval Commercial Institute. Following these services, detachments of marines, frontier guards and state police paraded before civil and military officials and spectators assembled at the offices of the State Commissary.

In a special conference held that day, the municipal council of Gdynia voted unanimously to rename the principal street of the city, "Ulica Jerzego Waszyngtona" (George Washington Street), in honor of the First President of the United States. Adam Bederski, State Commissary, was in charge of the meeting, and the president of the Gdynia Chamber of Commerce, Napoleon Korzon, delivered an address on the Life of George Washington.

The pupils of the State Public School participated in the exercises which terminated these ceremonies. The school was decorated with the flags of Poland and the United States and a group of about 100 children made a striking impression as they sang "The Star Spangled Banner."

The United States consulate general at Warsaw was represented by Vice Consul John H. Madonne.

LIFE OF WASHINGTON PUBLISHED

Desiring that the people of Poland should have a better understanding of George Washington, the Central Committee published a booklet on his life, written by Captain Karol Koźmiński, noted Polish soldier-author. Giving in smooth, interesting style, a brief and instructive outline of the great American's career, the pamphlet was received with enthusiasm throughout the country. Several thousand copies of the little biography were distributed by the Central Committee.

NATIONAL HOLIDAY DEDICATED TO WASHINGTON

Poland's national holiday, May 3, the anniversary of the promulgation of the Polish Constitution in 1791, was also dedicated to the observance of the George Washington Bicentennial in Warsaw. This date, so important in Poland, was regarded as a most appropriate one on which to honor Washington, for the proclamation of the Constitution of 1791 marked a new era in Polish history, the instrument providing for the education and uplift of the masses in a liberal manner then unknown in Europe.

The ceremonies on May 3 began with a luncheon given by the Central Committee at the Merchants' Club which was attended by the Minister of Posts and Telegraph of the Polish government, the Mayor of Warsaw, and other officials and prominent people. At the conclusion of the luncheon the guests, numbering more than a hundred, proceeded to Paderewski Park where a large crowd gathered to witness the exercises held there in connection with the planting of an oak tree dedicated to George Washington.

GEORGE WASHINGTON AVENUE NAMED

After the tree planting was completed, a street adjoining Paderewski Park, expected to become one of Warsaw's most beautiful thoroughfares, was named "George Washington Avenue." This street, which leads to the new residential district of Poland's capital, is bordered on one side by Warsaw's International Fair Grounds and on the other by beautiful Paderewski Park. At the end of Washington Avenue it is planned to erect the buildings for the International Fair and an exposition park.

"Both the planting of the Washington Oak and the dedication of Washington Avenue," said Mr. Kotnowski in a speech delivered at the Park, "are added expressions of the admiration and esteem felt by Poles toward a great leader, a great citizen, and a great statesman, whose name has always been synonymous to the Polish mind with the word 'Independence'—a word that represented the most sacred aspirations of this nation during 150 years of bondage, and for the past 14 years represents that which of all things is the dearest and most cherished to every Pole.

"I am confident that today's manifestations will become another strand in the time-tested, 150-year-old bonds of friendship which exist between Poland and the United States."

COMMEMORATIVE POSTAGE STAMP

The great national holiday was also selected as the most appropriate date for the issuance of a special George Washington commemorative postage stamp by the Polish government. This postage stamp bears a portrait of George Washington flanked by pictures of his two great Polish comrades in the Revolution, Kościuszko and Pułaski. The first stamp printed was inclosed in a special album and presented to President Hoover by the Polish Ambassador to the United States, Tytus Filipowicz.

This was the first strictly commemorative postage stamp in honor of George Washington and bearing his portrait ever issued by a foreign government, and the only bicentennial postage stamp issued outside the United States. The only other foreign postage stamps bearing Washington's image were issued by Brazil in 1909 and by France in 1927 to commemorate events connected with America but unrelated to George Washington.

A gracious gesture was made by Mr. Kotnowski when he presented to Representative Sol Bloom, Director of the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission, a plaque made from wood grown in Poland and bearing a remarkable likeness of George Washington.

In a letter accompanying the gift, Mr. Kotnowski expressed his warm appreciation for the assistance and cooperation which Mr. Bloom and the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission had extended to the Polish Central Committee.

"I have learned," wrote Mr. Kotnowski, "of the truly impressive scope and character of the exercises held in the United States and in other countries on February 22 from press reports which were a source of much satisfaction to me; and I avail myself of this opportunity to tender you and your confrères of the Commission my heartiest congratulations."

OBSERVANCE IN CRACOW

In the historic city of Cracow great interest was shown in the Bicentennial Celebration, for the people of that city feel bound to the United States and George Washington by reason of their connection with both Kościuszko and Pułaski. It was from Cracow that Pułaski left for the country over the sea where he was to sacrifice his life on the altar of American freedom; and it was in the marketplace of Cracow that Kościuszko stood in the uniform of an American General and pledged himself on the sword stained with blood shed in defense of the United States to fight for Poland's independence.

The observance in Cracow really began on February 20 with the exhibition of a motion picture film entitled, "America." The picture depicted the struggle for American independence and was shown at the Municipal Industrial Museum. So enthusiastically was it received by the public that it was given a second showing on the next day, preceded by a lecture by Lieutenant Colonel Tadeusz Piotrowski.

On Washington's birthday, the Cracow City Hall was the scene of a great public gathering. The Polish Republic, the army, and the municipal government were all officially represented by distinguished officials. The large numbers in attendance attested the friendship which the people of Cracow have for the United States and their deep regard for the memory of George Washington.

The speakers were Dr. Roman Dybowski and General Dreszer. Both paid high tribute to the memory of George Washington and praised his magnanimous character. The famous Echo Chorus of Cracow and the Cracow Municipal Band supplied the music for the occasion.

At the conclusion of this program Władysław Belina-Prazmowski, Mayor of Cracow, sent the following message to American Ambassador Willys at Warsaw:

"In the name of Cracow and the Cracow District, from where Tadeusz Kościuszko, the hero who fought for America's freedom, announced Poland's right to freedom and sealed it with his blood, I send to the United States homage and greetings."

WILNO PARTICIPATES

The memory of George Washington was honored in the city of Wilno on February 28, 1932, when a commemorative program was presented in the City Hall. This event was exceptionally well-attended by official representatives of government, military, and civil life and by a large number of Polish citizens.

The program began with an address of welcome by Mayor Folejewski in which it was pointed out that the occasion was important as indicative of the ties of friendship existing between the two republics of Poland and the United States. Mr. Folejewski paid high tribute to the memory of George Washington.

Poland's national anthem and the "Star Spangled Banner" were then played by the band of the Union of Municipal Workers.

As speaker of the day, Dr. Ryszard Mienicki, of the University of Wilno addressed the assemblage on the life of George Washington. Dr. Mienicki spoke eloquently of the prodigious efforts by which Washington kept the Revolutionary army together during the long struggle for freedom and emphasized the greatness of his character as shown by his return to private life after freedom had been won.

A group of Polish songs was rendered by choruses from the Men's Seminary and the Women's Seminary. A poem, "George Washington," by the Polish poet Ostrowski, was read by Mrs. Marecka, of the Wilno Theatres.

The program was concluded by the playing of "The Stars and Stripes Forever," by the symphonic orchestra of the Union of Municipal Workers.

At the end of this program Professor Czymański, chairman of the Bicentennial Committee of Wilno, and Mayor Folejewski, sent the following message to United States Ambassador Willys at Warsaw:

"The Wilno Committee for the Celebration of the 200th Anniversary of George Washington's Birthday has the honor to inform Your Excellency that the citizens of Wilno and of the Wilno District join the noble and worthy American people in paying deep and sincere homage to the great Hero of Freedom."

PROGRAM IN POZNAN

A Bicentennial program was presented in Poznan on March 6, 1932, in the Polish Theatre, under the auspices of the Polish-British Association.

The speakers on this occasion were Dr. Bronislaw Dembinski, president of the Polish-British Association, who outlined the purpose of the program; Baron Stefan Ropp, who delivered an address in Polish on the subject "Washington Against the Background of an Epoch," and Gaither P. Warfield.

A prominent orchestra of Poznań furnished music, playing the national anthems of Poland and the United States as well as a number of well-known Polish compositions including the "Kościeszko Polonaise" adapted from the original score of 1792. Compositions of the famous Polish pianist, Ignace Jan Paderewski, were played by Professor Gertrude Konatkowska, and a group of American songs was sung by Gertrude Linckowna.

The program was attended by government, municipal, and military officials as well as by prominent citizens of Poznań. The United States, Great Britain, and other countries were also represented at the gathering.

JULY 4 IN WARSAW

The anniversary of America's Declaration of Independence was the occasion for a noteworthy program presented in Paderewski Park under the auspices of the municipal officials of Warsaw when a monument to Colonel E. M. House was unveiled and dedicated. Colonel House was the personal representative of President Woodrow Wilson during negotiations preceding the signing of the Peace Treaty at the conclusion of the World War when Poland's complete independence was secured. His services in this capacity and his interest in the welfare of Poland have been deeply appreciated by the people of that country, and the erection of the monument to him was a tangible expression of this appreciation.

Addresses were made at the celebration by Mayor Zygmunt Słomiński, United States Chargé d'Affaires at interim Sheldon L. Crosby, and the Vice President of the municipal government of Warsaw, Mr. Borzęcki. A telegram and a letter from Ignace Jan Paderewski, world-famed musician and former President of the Republic of Poland, in whose honor Warsaw's chief park is named, were read during the program. Mr. Paderewski expressed his own gratification at the friendliness his countrymen thus exhibited toward the United States and her citizens.

Every speech on this occasion reflected the mutual esteem and admiration existing between Poland and the United States. The address of Mr. Crosby, according to advices reaching the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission, was especially happily phrased. Mr. Crosby spoke of the significance of the anniversary being celebrated and the appropriateness of dedicating part of the program to the memory of George Washington. Kościeszko and Pułaski were also remembered by the speaker, who paid them high tribute for their services to America during the Revolutionary War.

Mayor Słomiński and Mr. Borzęcki spoke eloquently of the long standing ties between Poland and the United States, and pledged anew their country's friendship for the country of George Washington.

CLOSING CELEBRATION ON THANKSGIVING DAY

The Bicentennial Celebration in Poland came to a close on Thanksgiving Day with services conducted in the American Methodist Church at Warsaw. The program on this occasion, wrote United States Consul General J. Klahr Huddle, was simple and sincere as George Washington would have liked it. There was appropriate music followed by the reading of President Hoover's proclamation incorporating the original Presidential Thanksgiving Day proclamation issued by George Washington in 1789.

Mr. Huddle delivered an address referring particularly to the character of Washington in his capacity as president of the Constitutional Convention. It was his known integrity, courage and stability, said the Consul General, that influenced the members of the Philadelphia convention to settle their differences on vital issues and finally to ratify the Constitution which grew out of the long summer of discussion. It is generally believed, Mr. Huddle pointed out, that the framers of the Constitution had Washington in mind as the ideal type of President when they created the executive office and vested it with greater power than the majority of the delegates at first favored.

"The world-wide interest which has been evinced in the Washington commemoration," said Mr. Huddle, "cannot but strike a deeply responsive chord in an American. Truly there has been amazing evidence that the people of all countries realize to the full that George Washington was not alone an American striving to create a United States of America, but that more than that, he marked an epoch in the development of the aspirations of mankind.

"Poland particularly has shown its understanding of and sympathy with Washington's character and achievements and those of us who have experienced here the manifestations of this feeling have been deeply touched thereby. It is, therefore, with a feeling of the greatest pleasure and a sense of honor conferred that I find myself on this day of Thanksgiving in a position in which I am permitted to speak of George Washington in the very home of two of his most ardent heroic companions, his sincerely trusted friends and counselors, Thaddeus Kościuszko and Casimir Pułaski."

POLISH-AMERICAN RADIO BROADCAST

To commemorate the 153rd anniversary of the death of Casimir Pulaski, who was fatally wounded while fighting for the independence of the United States of America at the Battle of Savannah, an international radio broadcast was arranged, as a joint activity of the Governments of Poland and the United States, by the National Broadcasting Company. The program was given in Washington, D. C., October 11, 1932, and was one of the outstanding features of the world-wide George Washington Bicentennial Celebration. It was broadcast by short wave to Europe.

Addresses were delivered by Mr. Władysław Sokolowski, Chargé d'Affaires ad interim of Poland, and the Honorable Sol Bloom, Director of the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission. The national airs of Poland and the United States were played by the United States Marine Band.

Mr. Bloom, representing the Government of the United States as host, spoke first. His address follows:

We may search the pages of history in vain for a more heroic, adventurous and patriotic spirit than that of Casimir Pulaski, whose memory we honor today. This great Polish hero, glowing with enthusiasm for liberty, came from his own distressed land to fight upon our shores for those ideals of freedom that, for the time being, were crushed in his beloved Poland.

Many brave and colorful foreign soldiers were enlisted under the banner of George Washington. Also, many of these were inspired with a passion for the ideals for which the colonists fought. Some of these men of foreign birth contributed important services to our cause and helped to mold out of the untrained, undisciplined, but determined men of George Washington's army, a fighting force which carried on a struggle that was the admiration of the world.

Against the very pick of Great Britain's veteran troops and veteran German mercenaries, these men of America were fitted to contend on grounds of equality, and it was due in large measure to the experienced military experts from other European countries that George Washington was enabled to marshal his forces with effectiveness.

Brigadier General Casimir Pulaski was a dashing and romantic soldier, who had already achieved a reputation for patriotism, heroism and strategy that made him an outstanding figure in Europe. After having seen his father and his brothers treacherously made victims of that conspiracy of Russia, Austria and Prussia to crush and dismember Poland, Pulaski fought upon his native soil, until, having exhausted the last remnant of his strength, he was forced to flee, as Poland lay helpless at the feet of the three conspiring sovereigns.

It was not surprising that the noble Pulaski should be fired with new enthusiasm for freedom in a nation that symbolized something of Poland's heroic struggle. And so he came to us and immediately his devotion to the cause of the colonies, his reckless heroism, his superb horsemanship and his magnetic personality, appealed to the imagination of our own America. Time does not permit a review of the important services which he performed under Washington's leadership. That is all a matter of history.

He was not a soldier of fortune. His love of liberty alone kindled his devotion. He saw in the struggle for American independence an opportunity to pursue that bright vision which had so animated him in his career as a Polish patriot. And he transferred to Washington's service those remarkable qualities of military genius which everywhere aroused admiration and confidence.

Pulaski joined the Revolutionary army as a volunteer in the summer of 1777. From that time on he progressively demonstrated his value and became one of the outstanding Commanders of our forces. His glorious martyrdom in the defense of Savannah brought to a dramatic close a career which was matchless in its sincerity and zeal in the cause of human liberty.

Trusted by George Washington, admired by him, and inspiring a devotion that only the comradeship of war can bring about, Pulaski went to his death, dauntless and unafraid. Under direction of Congress, he was sent to Charleston, South Carolina, where the British had taken a sudden and defensive position. The arrival of Pulaski baffled the British. The Governor and the Council of Charleston had already agreed upon terms of capitulation, but General Pulaski went to the Council Chamber to protest against this measure, declaring that as a Continental officer he would defend the City for the United States.

Accordingly, the defense of the City fell upon Pulaski, and so effective was that defense that the British forces retreated from their attempt to capture Charleston and retired to Savannah. Pulaski pursued the enemy with relentless courage. In the ill-fated assault on that city, October 9, 1779, Pulaski was wounded in the thigh by a grape shot when trying to arrest the retreat of French soldiers. Two days later, October 11, 1779, after more than two years of service under our flag, Pulaski died on board the ship "Wasp" where he had been taken after being wounded. His body was buried at sea, with simple but impressive ceremony, and his death was lamented universally by the patriots of the Revolution.

Today, upon the 153rd anniversary of Pulaski's martyrdom, we stand with bowed heads in remembrance of that magnificent sacrifice. We reaffirm to Poland and the Polish people our everlasting gratitude for the service which Pulaski rendered to our country.

We have upon the program here today in commemoration of the death of Casimir Pulaski, the distinguished representative of Poland, Mr. Władysław Sokolowski, Chargé d'Affaires ad interim of Poland during the absence from our shores of His Excellency, Mr. Tytus Filipowicz, Ambassador of Poland. Mr. Sokolowski will address you on behalf of his own country and his own people. It is to him, and through him, that I express again the remembrance which the people of the United States will always cherish of his great countryman who came to us in our time of need and who so valiantly and heroically served in our own patriot army.

Responding on behalf of the Polish Government, Mr. Sokolowski said:

In the first place I want to fulfill my agreeable duty to express my profound gratitude to Honorable Sol Bloom for the feelings expressed in his address. Through his splendid and successful efforts to commemorate, during the celebration of the 200th anniversary of the birth of George Washington, the Polish-American cooperation during the period of the War of Independence, he has earned the well merited friendship of my compatriots.

Two nations, America and Poland, today are paying tribute to the memory of Brigadier General Casimir Pulaski, and uniting in honoring the memory of this brilliant soldier and idealist, who, after having fought for the liberty of his Mother country, joined the American revolutionists who were struggling for the same freedom.

Americans are commemorating Pulaski for what he did for this country. Permit me, as the representative of Poland in the United States, to explain to you briefly why we honor Pulaski in my country.

Almost at the same time—when the American struggle for independence began, three autocracies had combined to deprive Poland of her freedom. Polish patriots formed the Confederacy of Bar in order to resist Russian armies. Amongst them—old Joseph Pulaski and his three sons were the most conspicuous. Old Pulaski died in camp, one of his sons was killed in battle fighting the Tsarist hordes, another was taken prisoner and sent to Siberia. The youngest, Casimir, continued to fight against ever increasing odds. At the head of his cavalry he held his own against the Russian and Prussian forces, and proved that he was a first-rate leader. Heedless of his own safety, always leading his men into sallies against the enemy, which was much more powerful than his poorly equipped army and much larger in size, he made repeated stands against the enemy. His fame as a cavalry leader spread throughout Europe.

But the chief significance of Pulaski to Poland as we see it now, was not of military, but of political and moral order. His one claim to glory lies in the spiritual power of his activities, in his unremitting efforts, in the magnitude of his sacrifice and above all in the force of his conviction as a patriot and as a republican.

In Poland his material efforts, his bravery and conduct were of no avail against the preponderance and power of the enemy. He did not save his country against the imperialism of the three powerful usurpers. Yet, though the country remained oppressed, it was he, who, in the words of Rousseau, "saved his unhappy fatherland, for he redeemed the glorious name of Poland, for he restored her moral forces."

To the country invaded by foreign armies, whose population lost faith in its forces and was politically demoralized by invaders, Pulaski's figure stands as the incarnation of national honor. In the person of Pulaski and of his comrades, Poland protested against the oppression of invaders, and called for the justice of God and man. His figure served as an example to the future generations of Poles.

But—not only for Poles. For—after Poland temporarily succumbed to the overwhelming forces of her enemies—the enemies of freedom—Pulaski, like other Polish and French patriots, went to America, justly believing that the cause of democracy was one and indivisible—and that whenever it would win, sooner or later the results of its victory would benefit his own country.

This hope was realized when after one hundred and fifty years, the United States assisted Poland in regaining her national independence, and continues to lend her a helping hand in the peaceful work of the reorganization of her economic life.

This is another reason why, at this moment, when the people of the United States are paying tribute to the hero, we celebrate his memory in Poland as well. Worshipping him as her own hero, Poland is proud that Pulaski gave his life for the independence of America. We rejoice that in the glorious edifice of the American Republic—there are stones laid by Polish hands and cemented by Polish blood. We are happy to see that while Poland celebrates the one hundred and fifty-third anniversary of Pulaski's death, President Hoover, in pursuance of the provisions of the resolution of the Seventy-second Congress, issued a proclamation making October 11th Pulaski Memorial Day for the observance and the commemoration of his death.

As a hero of two nations, as an outstanding example of patriotism and noble efforts in both countries, Pulaski has always been and will always remain a symbol of Polish-American friendship. If he could rise from his grave deep in the ocean, he would be proud of his sacrifice, proud that his blood was not shed in vain, and proud that the debt contracted by America towards him and towards his country was well repaid.

And now, since this broadcast is being received in Poland—and listened to by some four million people of Polish origin in the United States, I would like to speak a few words to my countrymen in my native language.

Polska jednoczy się w dniu dzisiejszym z Ameryką w oddaniu czci bohaterowi obu tych narodów. Miljonowe rzesze Wychodźstwa naszego w Ameryce biorą dziś udział w uroczystościach uczczenia pamięci i zasług Pułaskiego; a choć jest to rocznica jego śmierci, jest ona radosna, gdyż obie sprawy dla których Pułaski żył, walczył i poległ zwyciężyły i zatryumfowały.

Ofiara życia Pułaskiego wzniosła na ziemi amerykańskiej honor Polaka do wyżyn, do jakich tylko dochodzą, synowie narodów, posiadających takiego ducha i tradycję jak Polska. Otrzymaliśmy odeń bezcenną puściznę—i Wam wychodźcom polskim—a dzisiaj Amerykanom—w głównej mierze straż tej puścizny jest powierzona.

Przywiązanie do rodzimej kultury, i dbałość o dobre imię Polski, z której pochodzicie,—skarb ten tylko może powiększyć i przyczynić się do dalszego rozwoju więzów, łączących Polskę z Ameryką.

WASHINGTON COAT OF ARMS

WASHINGTON COAT OF ARMS

The design on the previous page is an authentic color reproduction of the coat of arms of the branch of the Washington family to which George Washington belonged, and from which the coat of arms used by George Washington was derived. It was taken from the blazon in colored glass, one of several which were placed originally in windows of Sulgrave Manor, England. Others of the group showed impalements or quarterings indicating marriages with heiresses. George Washington used this coat of arms in a variant form. The colors, bars, and stars are on his coat of arms, but not the crescent, which is the mark of a second son; and his crest, though differing somewhat in form, is essentially the same. The spelling of the name, WASHINGTON, is one of the several transient forms, between the original "Wessington" and the present "Washington."

ENGLAND

IN ENGLAND the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington was celebrated on numerous occasions during the year 1932 in a manner which indicated that Englishmen today agree with Arthur Penrhyn Stanley, once Dean of Westminster, who asked: "What Englishman is there who is not proud of the once dreaded name of Washington?"

The celebrations in honor of "that great Englishman, George Washington," continued at intervals during the entire Bicentennial period from February 22, until Thanksgiving Day, November 24, 1932, and were made the occasions, in London and throughout the provinces, of renewed demonstrations of Anglo-American friendship.

London was the scene of ceremonies in February, July, and November. Bristol, Liverpool, Manchester, Northampton, Warton, Newcastle-on-Tyne, Sulgrave, Selby, the town of Washington, Durham County, ancestral home of the Washington family, and other places contributed to the importance and significance of the observance in England.

The Mayor of Northampton sent a message of good will to President Hoover; Sulgrave Manor was the goal of a great pilgrimage; Londoners placed wreaths on Washington's statue in Trafalgar Square; American clubs, with the cooperation of prominent Englishmen, held George Washington fetes; English libraries installed George Washington exhibits; commemorative tablets were unveiled; English school children studied anew the life of Washington and exchanged flags with American school children in Washington, D. C.; the Washington family relics and heraldry were brought to light.

Sulgrave, Warton and the town of Washington, stimulated by the world-wide celebration, asserted proudly their historic ties with the Washington family, and the provinces associated with Washington genealogy vied with each other in honoring the memory of the man whose life is a common heritage of the English and American people—the foremost figure of an honorable line whose roots are deeply embedded in England's historic past.

ENGLISH TRIBUTES TO WASHINGTON

England's admiration for Washington had grown to such proportions through the years that February 22, 1932, found English newspapers printing such editorial tributes as the following:

After all, he (Washington) was an Englishman, of old English stock, and the emancipatory work he performed and the ideas that guided him were English in spirit and precedent. . . . So far as the English element of the community (America) is concerned, it certainly retains the traits manifested so conspicuously in Washington. . . . He is still the greatest American.—LIVERPOOL POST AND MERCURY.

Thanks to him (Washington), imperialism has been a poor, self-conscious thing, sounding its loud brass on a cracked note. And today we may well be proud and glad that his statue stands in Trafalgar Square—looking towards the Parliament he once bullied into sense.—THE MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.

The year 1932 found not only the English press honoring George Washington, but also English statesmen, diplomats and clergy. Said Winston Churchill at the Pilgrims' Society banquet in July:

Your national heroes have their place in our Valhalla; the statue of George Washington is honored in the heart of London. His civic and military virtues play their part in the education of our youth, just in the same way as the strength and youth of Chatham have influenced the American mind. The quarrels are dead. Their sting has passed away. Their scars are graven only on monuments. The battles are remembered only to celebrate the martial virtues of the brave and faithful men who fought them. . . . Animated with the indomitable perseverance of Washington and the courage of our ancient race, we may together play our part in reviving the fortunes of mankind.

Sir Ronald Lindsay, British Ambassador to the United States, in an article in THE WASHINGTON TIMES, May 30, 1932, wrote:

A famous Englishman, Lord Bryce, who had a profounder knowledge of the United States than any foreign observer of his day, and who was formerly His Majesty's ambassador in the United States, has estimated in a familiar passage, of a great work, the achievement of George Washington:

"Washington stands alone and unapproachable, like a snow peak rising above its fellows into the clear air of morning, with a dignity, constancy, and purity, which have made him the ideal type of civic virtue to successive generations."

It is hardly necessary to amplify this appreciation. Washington made himself successively the first farmer, the first soldier, and the first statesman in his country; and he did so, less by the exercise of brilliant gifts, or by the weight of profound learning, than by an iron strength of character, by a scrupulous rectitude, and by a steadfast integrity in public and private life.

These characteristics rendered his authority unshakeable in his day, and ever since have afforded, to England as well as to the United States, a rare example of excellence in the conduct of public affairs.

Rev. Herbert Barnes, Church of Divine Unity, at a celebration in Newcastle-On-Tyne in honor of Washington, said:

The time has come to regard George Washington not as a rebel against the British Crown, but as a deliverer of vast millions of mankind. By the force of his fine character and his self-discipline, which involved the break from the privileged class, he became a mighty leader in the cause of freedom and of democratic government. . . . He was not only the founder of the American Republic, but, in a sense, of many of the Commonwealths now within the British Empire that are essentially independent of England in all important respects.

OBSERVANCE BEGINS IN LONDON

Despite the fact that in 1932 London, like the rest of the world, was in the midst of economic depression and political turmoil, the famous city celebrated the George Washington Bicentennial with the other capital cities of the world.

Bicentennial observances commenced in London on February 21, when churches held memorial services or clergymen devoted their sermons to the life and character of George Washington. The official functions began next day, Washington's two hundredth birthday anniversary.

The American Chamber of Commerce of London and the members of the American Legion in England delegated representatives to place wreaths on February 22 at the base of the famous Washington statue on Trafalgar Square and upon the Washington bust in the crypt at St. Paul's Cathedral. Large crowds of Englishmen gathered to witness these ceremonies. At the services before the George Washington bust at St. Paul's, the American Consul General, Mr. Albert Halstead, delivered a short address.

The following is an outline of Mr. Halstead's address sent by him to the State Department:

I noted the appropriateness of American veterans in London laying a wreath at the foot of the statue of this great soldier and patriot who typified all that was best in the Anglo-Saxon character, a man not of the greatest intellect, but a man of common sense and understanding, force of character and real leadership.

I referred to his patriotism and added that his participation in the Revolution, in connection with the other colonists, had resulted in saving for the British, liberties which they had gained through the Bill of Rights and Magna Carta, and had saved them from autocratic government and made possible all the developments of the British Empire. It was shown that the sons of Englishmen in other colonies would not stand oppression, as they thought it, and would demand a say in the expenditures of the taxes which they paid and would refuse to be exploited. Without that lesson, I declared, Britain might not have learned for many years the art of governing dependencies and not have acquired the skill of granting them independence by degrees as their capacity for self-government developed.

The American Circle of the Lyceum Club, a social and professional women's organization in London, held a special George Washington dinner on February 22, over which Mrs. Frank Schwab presided. Lt. Col. Courtlandt Parker, United States Military Attaché, addressed the members and their guests. Eulogizing the virtues of Washington, Colonel Parker pointed out how the name of America's First President was highly respected throughout the British Isles. He said that Washington was looked upon as a great Englishman as well as a great American and that many of his ideals and much of his philosophy of government had been either consciously or unconsciously adopted by British statesmen.

Miss Edith Evans, a British-American actress of note, Professor Winifred Cullis, and Mrs. Hugh Reid Griffin, testified in brief speeches to the influence of George Washington's ideals on the success each had made in her profession.

During the afternoon American Charge d'Affaires, Mr. Ray Atherton and Mrs. Atherton, held an "at home" at the American Embassy, which was attended by many resident and visiting Americans. It was the first American Embassy function since the departure of General Charles G. Dawes, the American Ambassador, for the United States. George Washington and American colonial decorations were used and the gathering was an enthusiastic expression of patriotism by Americans dwelling away from home.

WOMEN'S ORGANIZATIONS JOIN IN FETES

The American Women's Club and the Walter Hines Page Chapter of the Daughters of the American Revolution joined in commemorating the two-hundredth birthday of George Washington in London on February 24. The AMERICAN WOMEN'S CLUB MAGAZINE of London, in March, contained the following account of this event:

For convenience sake, our celebration took place this year on February 24th; but as our lecturer pointed out, the traditional day of Washington's birth, February 22nd, owing to the change in the calendar being purely fictional, the actual birth having taken place seven days earlier, there is nothing disrespectful in the delay of another two days in the commemoration.

This was the first of our Washington Bicentennial celebrations, and took the form of a reception, followed by a lecture by Professor Robert McElroy, Ph.D., LL.D., Harmsworth Professor of American History at Oxford, a former instructor in history at Princeton University, etc. Professor McElroy was welcomed as an old friend, as many remembered him as giving a most delightful account a few years ago of the early Colonial days and the founding of the first schools and colleges in America. On February 24 he took as his subject "George Washington as a Guide at 200."

It might seem at first sight that the theme of George Washington had been worn pretty thin, but to see him without the traditional hatchet and cherry tree and as a counsellor and guide in present-day problems was quite a new point of view.

The Professor spoke first of the purity and steadfastness of character which was the main cause of Washington's attaining to the leadership and maintaining the position of "First in war, first in peace, first in the hearts of his countrymen," not only during his lifetime, but to the present day. But aside from character, Washington's ability in solving the problems of his day is notable in that the problems of his day differed from our own only in degree.

There were thirteen states, each wanting sovereign power in her own domain and each animated by jealousy and the desire for selfish aggrandisement, and Washington succeeded in uniting them into one nation with common aims and allegiance. But he did it—not by appealing to their brotherly love, but to their common interests and defense. Intercourse over the rough roads was very slow and difficult, and each state had its own tariff laws. In consequence, almost every state and every farm made for itself everything it required. But by establishing waterways and abolishing all tariffs, communication and the exchange of goods was made easy, and gradually each state produced the goods it was best fitted for, to the cheapening of manufacture and the benefit of the whole population. And so for mutual help and benefit the thirteen states united and became a prosperous nation.

Two other maxims as a guide toward peace the Professor emphasized: the appeal from law to reason and the avoidance of permanent entanglements.

NEWSPAPER TRIBUTES TO WASHINGTON

London newspapers devoted considerable space to George Washington and the Bicentennial Celebration in February. An article in THE TIMES on February 22, which attracted wide attention, is here quoted in part:

WASHINGTON, THE MAN AND HIS FAME; A PLANTER WITH A PLAIN CREED

By S. E. MORISON

Harmsworth Professor of American History,
Oxford University

Two centuries have passed since George Washington was born in a small farmhouse on the Virginia bank of the Potomac. Marlborough was 10 years dead, Chatham a colonel of horse, Frederick a colonel of infantry turned 20, Rousseau that year returned to the arms of Madame de Warens. Franklin published his first almanac, and Voltaire produced "Zaire." It was an age of commanding figures; but from all his contemporaries Washington stands out as the great man. All who doubted were confounded in his lifetime: even the "debunking" biographers of the last decade attack earlier biographers, not Washington. It was not only that he accomplished the high tasks entrusted to him; his character was singularly elevated and consistent. As M. Bernard Fay has observed, there were no posturings for people to laugh at, no meannesses to gossip about, no weaknesses to condone. No victims cried out against his tyrannies and injustices, for he perpetrated none, and no Talleyrand had to regret that his hero was mal élevé. To contemporaries as to posterity Washington appeared cold and flawless as a marble statue of Augustus; he seemed at once a figure from Plutarch and a fulfillment of what Rousseau had foretold a "state of nature" might beget.

Yet no great man has been more unfortunate in his biographers. If the Athenians tired of hearing Aristides called the just, so Americans wearied of having Washington called perfect; it seemed a sort of reflection on themselves. The echoes of funeral orations had hardly died away when a parson-pedlar named Weems began hawking on village greens a "Life of Washington" of his own composition. Out of this lively little book, easily the most popular of all "Washingtoniana," but if the soldier's task in civil war embraces that of the statesman as well, the two were harmoniously combined in Washington as in no other captain of modern history.

The Comte de Chastellux, member of the French Academy and general in the French expeditionary force, wrote that Washington's most characteristic feature was poise: "the perfect harmony existing between the physical and moral attributes of which he is made up." Yet Gilbert Stuart, who painted the famous portrait, said that "all his features were indicative of the most ungovernable passions, and had he been born in the forests he would have been the fiercest man among the savage tribes." Both were right. Washington attained his serenity only through severe self-discipline.

THE OLD DOMINION

. . . The golden age of the Old Dominion was the 15 years from 1740 to the French and Indian wars. The old roughness and crudeness were passing away. Peace reigned over the land, high prices ruled for tobacco, immigrants were the public perversely culled the cherry-tree anecdote, which found its way into folklore the world over. . . .

LIKE CROMWELL

Despite the deplorable lack of taste and judgment in some of Washington's latest biographers, they have done good service in illuminating his youth, and in describing what one might call his economic background. Washington was a simple soul like Cromwell, with a plain creed for which he was willing to fight and die. No inner urge of greatness, no conviction of a mission to perform, but a sense of duty and a robust competence which made him do what wanted doing. The partisans of Hamilton and Jefferson, clever men with systems in their brains, may deny to Washington his rightful place as a statesman; but they must admit that his advocacy of the Federal Constitution and his acceptance of the Presidency were necessary to provide a Government through which the talents of Hamilton and Jefferson might shine. Military historians may deny Washington a place among those four great captains of history—Caesar, Alexander, Charles XII, and Frederick—whose busts he ordered for Mount Vernon; pouring into the back country, the traditional Virginia of Thackeray and Vachel Lindsay—"Land of the gauntlet and the glove"—came into being. Living in Virginia at that time was like riding on the sparkling crest of a great wave, just before it breaks and spreads into dull, shallow pools. At Mount Vernon, on the verge of the wilderness, Washington felt the zest of sharp contrasts, and acquired the education that comes from life. On the one side were mansions, where he could learn manners and poise from gentlefolk. On the other was the borderland of log cabins and the crude realities of American life: Indians and frontiersmen, Scotch and Pennsylvania Dutch, and multitudes of low-class Anglo-Saxons who, as insubordinate soldiers, would prove Washington's greatest trial and the severest test of his indefatigable patience. The deep Potomac flowed past Mount Vernon, bearing ships of heavy burden to the Chesapeake and overseas; you sent orders to England every year with your tobacco and the ships returned with the latest modes and manners, books and gazettes, and letters full of coffee-house gossip. London did not seem very far away.

The first turning point in Washington's life came at the age of 20, when his half-brother Lawrence died. George, next heir by their father's will, stepped into his place as proprietor of Mount Vernon. And he soon put to the test what his brother had taught him of military tactics and the practice of arms. Tactics, like surveying, were a projection of Washington's mathematical mind; like every born strategist, he could see the time element in moving troops. He devoured accounts of Frederick's campaigns, and doubtless dreamt of directing a great battle on a grassy plain with no obstacles—a terrain he was destined never to find in his shaggy country. As one of the first landowners of his county, he was promptly commissioned major of Militia. The settlement of his brother's affairs brought him into contact with Governor Dinwiddie, a shrewd Scot who knew a dependable young man when he saw one. At 21 Washington was sent on a highly difficult reconnaissance of a thousand miles through the wilderness, from the Potomac to the Ohio, and almost to the shores of Lake Erie. In this he proved the truth of what Mr. Fairfax said: "The Washingtons were born old." This young man just past his majority showed a rugged caution in wilderness work, a diplomatic skill in dealing with Indian chiefs, and a courteous firmness towards the French commanders, that would have done credit to a veteran.

A COURAGEOUS PACIFIST

... During the next two years he had charge of the frontier defences of Virginia, a chain of thinly garrisoned stockades which followed the Shenandoah Valley and its outer bulwarks from Winchester to the North Carolina line. In the execution of this command he showed a prodigious physical activity—often riding 30 miles a day over wilderness trails for days on end. His experience taught him that the indispensable boredom of drill, supply and transport was ill rewarded by the music of whistling bullets; that war was simply hard, beastly work.

LOVE OF THE LAND

... Yet Washington's greatest teacher and deepest love was the land. Later in life he wrote to Arthur Young, "How much more delightful is the task of making improvements on the earth than all the vain glory which can be acquired from ravaging it by the most uninterrupted career of conquests." And again, "To see plants rise from the earth and flourish by the superior skill and bounty of the labourer fills a contemplative mind with ideas which are more easy to be conceived than expressed."

When he returned to Mount Vernon with his bride, in 1759, there was everything to be done. Fences, buildings, and cattle were run down. The thin red soil of Mount Vernon was being ruined by tobacco. Washington proceeded to inform himself about farming, in his methodical way. It was the day of the "new agriculture" in England—the day of Jethro Tull and the great Coke of Norfolk. Washington acquired the usual gentleman's library of his time; but the books he devoured were treatises on the new agriculture: Jethro Tull's "Husbandry," Horne's "Gentleman Farmer," and Weston's "New System of Agriculture, or, A Plain, Easy, and Demonstrative Method of Speedily Growing Rich." From Washington's sober diaries one may discern the nerve-fraying exasperation of running a Virginia plantation. Washington's husbandry succeeded through mathematical calculation, constant experiment, unremitting pains, and unwearied patience. It was a continual war against human slackness, insect enemies, and tradition. The diaries reveal him not only at work but at play; much card playing of evenings with friends and neighbors, winnings and losses carefully computed over a period of four years as £72 2s. 6d. and £78 5s. 9d. respectively. Outdoors there was in season much shooting of wild fowl, and river fishing; but Washington's favourite recreation was fox-hunting, the finest sport in the world for discipline. Apparently at Mount Vernon it was more dangerous for the riders than for the grey foxes, which more often than not escaped his hounds of uncertain breed—Taster and Tipler, Mopsey and Chloe, Chanter and Forester, Sancho and Singer.

THE FIT INSTRUMENT

Sixteen years as a planter, with the public service appropriate to his station, completed Washington's education and made him a fit instrument for a great cause. The high command that he did not seek came to him only by accident. There were available several officers who had a better record than he in the Seven Years' War. Washington had taken part only in frontier campaigns, had never led more than a regiment, and fought no pitched battles. But people had come to trust this silent, capable man of 43. When the political needs of the moment required a Virginian there was no question but that Colonel Washington should be Commander-in-Chief. If he had failed, historians would have blamed the Continental Congress for a reckless political appointment of a provincial colonel with an indifferent war record. If he had failed the American Revolution would have been something worse than futile—a Rebellion of '98 that would have soured the American character and presented England with a Transatlantic Ireland. If, like so many leaders of revolutions, he had merely achieved a personal triumph and inoculated his country with insensate ambition, the world would have suffered from his success. America could and almost did fail Washington; but Washington could not fail his country or disappoint the expectations of his kind. A simple gentleman of Virginia with no extraordinary talents had so disciplined himself that he could lead an insubordinate and divided people into ordered liberty and enduring union.

The DAILY TELEGRAPH on February 22 printed a short article concerning the "unfairness" of the cherry tree story. It follows:

UNFAIR TO WASHINGTON

By GRACE STUART

Looking back I cannot but believe that I was taught something more about George Washington, but what I remember is that he never told a lie, and that he told his truths in such extraordinarily good grammar that I gave up all interest in him then and there.

Like generations of children I was brought up on the cherry-tree story, according to which young George was given a hatchet, and with a normality belied by the rest of the story promptly looked round for something to cut, and found a young cherry tree. When later Washington senior was looking for the culprit, George immediately owned up with the abnormal, and abnormally worded confession: "It was I. I cannot tell a lie."

Had he said, "It was me," it would have been better. As it was I sympathized with the small boy who said: "Why couldn't George Washington lie? Couldn't he talk?"

But now I find that none of it was true. There was no cherry-tree episode, and George Washington, when he began to keep a journal, wrote in by no means faultless English. What happened evidently was that some earnest parson biographer, more concerned about improving the occasion than about telling the truth himself, made it all up, hoping I suppose to keep a nation of small boys from the vice of telling lies—but not from becoming little prigs.

It was all very unfair to Washington, for the fearlessness and hardihood that marked the surveying ventures of his youth, and the absolutely reckless courage and endurance of his later leadership in war, suggest anything but a prig. Yet although it is a relief to know that George Washington never said that he couldn't tell a lie, there is still something about him that connects itself—not unfairly—with that simple statement. For one feels at the heart of Washington's life, and at the roof of his greatness an essential and unswerving truthfulness, a dependable and single-minded acceptance of duty, and a total lack of self-regard in judgment and action.

The pomp and ceremony with which he surrounded his presidency were designed to dignify and consolidate a new office, not to glorify a man. Indeed, Washington lived his whole life with a grave simplicity that was one of the surest marks of his greatness, and there was more of real elation in the relief with which he laid down his presidency than in the pride with which he took it up.

INDEPENDENCE DAY IN LONDON

The annual Independence Day banquet of the American Society in London, held at the Hotel Savoy on the evening of July 4, 1932, was marked by the attendance of more than three hundred guests, including Ambassador Andrew Mellon and Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler, president of the Columbia University. The event was doubly significant, occurring, as it did, on the 156th anniversary of the Declaration of Independence and during the George Washington Bicentennial Celebration.

An American flag more than 30 feet in length formed a fitting background for the head table, and the British ensigns displayed at various places in the elaborate dining room suggested the feeling of fraternity dominant at all Anglo-American Bicentennial ceremonies.

PILGRIMS' BANQUET

The Pilgrims of Great Britain, an organization composed of many of the distinguished men of the British Empire and devoted to the theme of international friendship, seized upon the bicentennial as an opportunity to promote their high cause. They convened at the Hotel Victoria, London, on July 12, 1932, to do honor to "that great English-American," George Washington, and specifically to promote the prevailing good will between Great Britain and America.

More than two hundred and fifty covers were laid and the event was made memorable by the presence of many notable persons, including the Rt. Hon. the Earl of Derby, K. G.; the American Ambassador, Andrew Mellon; the Rt. Hon. Winston Churchill, C. H., M. P.; Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler, president of Columbia University and president of the Pilgrims of America; His Grace the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury; the Rt. Hon. Lord Hewart of Bury, P. C., Lord Chief Justice of England; the Lord Desborough, K. G., G. C. V. O.; the Hon. Albert Halstead, American Consul General; Rt. Hon. Lord Greenwood, P. C.; Rt. Hon. Earl of Midleton, K. P.; Rt. Hon. Earl of Yarborough; the Lord Moynihan, K. C. M. G., C. B., and a host of other English and American men of prominence.

The speakers were the Rt. Hon. Winston Churchill, Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler, and Lord Moynihan. The speeches were broadcast from the "National Transmitter." Lord Derby, chairman of the Pilgrims of Great Britain, presided at the banquet and proposed this toast:

Your Excellency, my Lords and Gentlemen: I give you the toast of "The King and the President of the United States."

When the toast had been duly honored Lord Derby continued:

Your Excellency, my Lords and Gentlemen:

To put your minds at rest at once, I am not going to make a speech. I will first read you a letter from the Duke of Connaught; it is:

"My Dear Derby, I am sorry that I shall not be able to be with you and my brother Pilgrims on the occasion of the celebration of the Bicentenary of the birth of George Washington, and I therefore would like you to convey my cordial greetings, and full appreciation of the object of their gathering. The Pilgrims of Great Britain have so long worked in association with their Brethren in the United States, in the common cause of good fellowship, that the presence tonight of Dr. Murray Butler, the President of the American Pilgrims, gives me the opportunity as President of the British Society, of extending to him a warm welcome, both on behalf of the Pilgrims, and of that large British public who know of his distinguished services to his University and to his Country. I understand that this year Dr. Butler celebrates his 70th birthday, his 50th years of graduation at Columbia University, and the 30th year of his office as President of that great Institution. I am sure that I am expressing the wishes of all present at the dinner tonight, in cordially congratulating Dr. Butler on these three important landmarks in a great career.

"Believe me,

"Yours very sincerely,

"(Signed) ARTHUR."

Those words have enabled me, as your Chairman tonight, to introduce to you the two speakers who will speak to the memory of George Washington. Mr. Winston Churchill and Dr. Murray Butler are each known on both sides of the Atlantic; one is known in America as well as he is in England, and the other is known in England as well as he is in America.

May I say how glad I am to be allowed to preside at a dinner at which Mr. Winston Churchill, one of my oldest personal friends, is the speaker, and welcome here Dr. Murray Butler. I have never had the opportunity of welcoming him in this country; the last time we met, we passed in the middle of the Atlantic and exchanged greetings by wireless. I am glad to think that he is our guest here tonight, and I know that everyone of you will welcome him as a very welcome guest. (Hear, hear.)

MR. CHURCHILL PROPOSES TOAST

Mr. Churchill, English author, soldier, and statesman of world-wide repute, responded to the introduction and proposed the principal toast of the evening to George Washington, coupling with the toast the name of Dr. Butler. Mr. Churchill said:

Lord Derby, Your Excellency, my Lords and Gentlemen:

We all welcome Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler here this evening. . . . No better name than his could be associated here with the toast of the evening: "To the memory of George Washington." It is an honour to me to have been called upon to propose it, and a responsibility to be broadcasting not only to the millions of American listeners, whom I have often addressed, but even, on this occasion, to my own fellow countrymen. (Laughter.) My Lords and Gentlemen, 14 years have passed since I was last entrusted with this theme. It was in 1918. We were moving into the final convulsion of the Great War. London was crowded with scores of thousands of American troops on their way to the Front. * A week before at Cantigny, British and American troops had, for the first time in the history of 150 years, advanced together as comrades in arms. What a dismal catalogue of misunderstandings, of strife, of jealousies, of hatreds, what ferocious injuries given and repaid, had filled the dark period of the quarrel of the English-speaking people. Then there had ensued this blessed interval of 100 years peace, but I felt, as

I spoke 14 years ago, the profound conviction that the time of war and the time of ordinary peace had come to an end, so far as our Nations were concerned, and that henceforward the English-speaking peoples would begin again to write their history in common.

My Lords and Gentlemen, this conviction has not faded in the years that have passed. On the contrary, it has strengthened with nearly every event that has happened since. Of course in this work-a-day world there must always be disputes and differences, there must be conflicting commercial interests, there must be tiresome arguments over money matters (laughter), and so forth, but we have the invincible assurance, that none of these will disturb the onward march of Anglo-American friendship. More and more, year by year, we feel the influence of our glorious joint inheritance, of that ancient common law, of our many essential similar institutions, and above all, of the mighty ceaseless unifying power of our common tongue.

Certainly I, Lord Derby, whose forbears fought simultaneously on both sides (laughter) in these quarrels, and in whose bosom they come to natural annihilation, can feel no bitterness over the past, but what is more remarkable is that in this island, which at one time seemed to be shorn of its greatness by the loss of the North American Colonies, all vain regrets or resentment have long since passed away. All that past is wrapped, not indeed in oblivion, for the story is famous, but it is left in calm, mellow recognition and acceptance.

Your natural heroes, Dr. Butler, have their place in our Valhalla, the statue of George Washington is honoured in the heart of London. His civic and military virtues play their part in the education of our youth, just in the same way as the strength and youth of Chatham have influenced the American mind. The quarrels are dead. Their sting has passed away. Their scars are graven only on the monuments. The battles are remembered only to celebrate the martial virtues of the brave and faithful men who fought them. And to all this, my Lords and Gentlemen, there has been added in our own lifetime, an increasing unity of ideals, the freedom and rights of the individual, a dispassionate respect for the rights of small or weak Nations, a reasoned abhorrence of Communism in all its insidious forms, the firm maintenance of the lawful rights of property, so long as those rights are constantly brought into harmony with the changing needs of the modern State, and above all our deep desire to see all the men in all the lands dwell together in justice and in peace.

A few months ago, when I stood on the banks of the Potomac, in that quiet, charming home which Washington had made for himself in the new world, I could not feel that he would have regretted, or resented, any part of the progress of all these healthy processes. I believe, on the contrary, he would have welcomed this deliberate but irresistible reconciliation, and I am glad that I have lived at a time when these processes have been sealed as so many of the decisions of history are sealed by common action of British and American soldiers in the field of arms.

My Lords and Gentlemen, these deep-lying sentiments have been registered by substantial advances in the practical sphere. One by one, the obstacles to our closer cooperation have been removed. The Irish question, that has not been removed, it never will be removed (laughter), but it has never more the power to cause friction between the British and American peoples. In the Pacific Ocean we both have the same outlook and very largely the same interests. We both seek the assuagement of European feuds. The immense growth of the American Navy (pardon me, Mr. Ambassador, for mentioning the facts), excites no apprehension in British minds.

Now above all there comes the great new service which only in my judgment, and in my belief, the joint action of the English-speaking people can render to our age, namely the revival of the wealth of Nations, by establishing a fair and stable measure of value to regulate the traffic of the world.

Our troubles are by no means ended. The economic crisis, the monetary crisis in which the world is gripped, still holds its full intensity. Baffling problems confront the Statesmen and afflict the peoples of both our countries, but I believe there is one grand, valiant conviction shared on both sides of the Atlantic. It is this: together, there is no problem we cannot solve.

My Lords and Gentlemen, there are two inspirations suggested by Washington's memory tonight: candour and courage: these were two of the guiding characteristics of his life. They should inspire both the Nation of which he was the child, and the Nation of which he was the father. Let us cherish these virtues now. Let us talk together always in words of simple truth and respect, labouring to understand each other's point of view, and not being afraid in all-good neighbourliness to expose and explain our own. And as for courage, as for that personal and civic intrepidity which Washington showed in every situation, is it not needed as much today in the anxieties and perils of modern peace as it ever was in the fires of bygone war?

I have heard, Lord Derby, that Lord Cornwallis once observed, after Yorktown, that the military fame of General Washington would rest not on the Chesapeake, but on the Delaware. He singled out that long bitter nerve-racking trenchant campaign and the cruel winter at Valley Forge as the achievement which most revealed the fortitude and constancy of the American leader. You, in the United States, to whom I am speaking now, are now undergoing, in other ways and in different forms, a similar ordeal to that.

We too, in our country, are doggedly driving forward through all our difficulties. Be sure we shall both succeed. Then, victorious in our separate spheres, we may join hands to give encouragement and example to others less strong or less capable. Animated with the indomitable perseverance of Washington and the courage of our ancient race, we may together play our part in reviving the fortunes of mankind. My Lords and Gentlemen, I propose: "The memory of George Washington," coupling with it the name of Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler.

ADDRESS BY DR. BUTLER

Dr. Butler in his address said that many of the most distinguished tributes to the name of Washington have been uttered by Englishmen; that the history and philosophy of American independence is written not only in the literature of the American Colonies but in the literary works of Great Britain for four generations, contemporaneous with and preceding the American Revolution; and that George Washington, were he alive today, would be among the first to counsel the interdependence of nations.

Dr. Butler's address follows:

My Lord Chairman, Your Excellency, my Lords and Gentlemen, Fellow Pilgrims:

Truly this is an evening not soon to be forgotten. We are gathered here from either side of the Atlantic in the capital city of the British Commonwealth of Nations, and at the main power-house of the intellectual life of the English-speaking world, to join together in celebrating the name and the fame of George Washington. Nowhere else than in Great Britain could such a celebration be held, for it requires the broadmindedness, the magnanimity, the generosity and the historic sense of the Briton, to know that George Washington did the Motherland and the British race no injury, but rather brought them new honour.

The most distinguished tributes to his name and fame have been made by Englishmen. Byron and Southey in verse, Lord Brougham, Macaulay and Gladstone in stately prose, vied with each other in encomiums upon this man and his character which are quite without parallel. Mr. Gladstone, in his measured eloquence, called Washington the purest figure in history, and Lord Brougham spoke of him in terms equally exalting. He had been in arms against the King and his Troops, but when he died, the British Navy put its flags at half-mast. There has been no like triumph of character and personality in all history. This man, who is the embodiment of a Nation and its people at their best, is the proud possession of the race to which that people belong.

Many curious and interesting things have been said of Washington, in a desire to understand him. He was not a superman, he was not a demigod; he was simply a truly great and almost perfectly balanced human character. His ability, very marked both in command and in counsel, was always at the service of a kindly, generous and understanding temperament. He was a natural leader of men; there was no military group of which he was a member that he did not command; there was no civil group to which he belonged over which he did not preside. When the new nation came into being, which his personality, more than anything else, made possible, he was chosen by the unanimous vote of the Electoral College to be its first President, and re-elected by a similar unanimous vote for a second term. Then by declining a second re-election, he established the ruling precedent that there shall be no third term for the chief executive of the nation. Some thirty years later, when it seemed likely that a President would be chosen by the unanimous vote of the Electors, one elector cast his vote for another name, simply in order that no one might be in the same class as George Washington. There is no likelihood that a competitor will be produced in the immediate future.

We must remember that there are not many nations so circumstanced that they can point to a single individual as the embodiment of their ideals and their traditions. The reason is that most nations have come into existence through the centuries, by long and slow processes of evolution, and scores of great names and great minds and great characters have been concerned in their nation-building; but here was a case in which a nation sprang full-grown and full-armed like Minerva from the head of Jove. This was because what happened was the coming to fruit on the other side of the Atlantic, on colonial soil, of the philosophy of Government and the theories of liberty which had been gaining ground in the mother Isle for 200 years.

You will not find the history of American independence written in the Colonies alone; you will find it written in the literature of Great Britain for three or four generations. And when the time came that a decision must be made, remember, my Lord Chairman, that the Continental Congress proposed to the British Government precisely the plan of organization which has now been made the law of the British Commonwealth of Nations by the Statute of Westminster. Each one of the five men appointed a year later to draft the Declaration of Independence, put his signature to the Olive Branch Petition and asked that there be established for those distant Colonies precisely the relationship which the Statute of Westminster has just now made the law of the British Commonwealth of Nations.

Let us remember, also, my Lord Chairman, that this great personality bore no rancour. He was above the meaner and the petty and the purely personal animosities and feelings of mankind. He looked out over the world problems that presented themselves to him with calmness, with clear vision and with strong conviction as to his duty. His name and his reputation have been quoted time and time again in the United States, as in favour of a policy of American isolation. George Washington had no such limited intelligence as that. George Washington did not use the phrase which is imputed to him, of having warned his people against "entangling alliances." That phrase was used by Thomas Jefferson in his first inaugural address as President. But even he intended it in no such narrow and restricted and provincial sense.

Washington and Jefferson were confronted by the French Revolution; they were confronted by the Napoleonic War. They were confronted with the passionate desire of this element or that, to take sides with Great Britain, and they saw, wisely saw, the danger and the futility of any such happening at the close of the 18th Century, and they warned their countrymen against it. It is the height of futility to suppose that those men, with their contacts, with their desire to inform European opinion, with their constant appeal to the good sense and the fairness of mankind, would not be the very first in this day and generation to counsel the interdependence of Nations.

We must not forget that Nations are not ends in themselves. Why did ancient Greece exist, why the Roman Empire, why through the centuries have Great Britain and France and Italy and Spain and Germany, and now the United States, come into existence? Are they merely gain-seeking groups of men, bent upon personal enjoyment, and enrichment and satisfaction? Or are they groups of men, brought together under a common form of Government, finding geographic unity, unity of faith and belief, united for a high purpose? Have they an end, or are they without an ideal? Are they drifting down the river of time to a final extinction, to be exhumed a thousand years from now in sand-covered deserts by the explorers of another age, or are they armed with a purpose, a high purpose, to express, to satisfy and to serve, those lofty ideals of human satisfaction, human aspiration and human liberty which have stirred mankind from the very beginning? Are nations dead, physical, legal things, or have they soul and purpose and personality? Let George Washington answer. There are his expressions, time and time again, where he recorded for his countrymen his sense of their responsibility; of their responsibility not alone to themselves and for their own welfares, but their responsibility to some higher power which rules and guides their universe and which passes judgment upon the aspirations and achievements of men and nations.

Why should not that man be celebrated in every land? Why should not the nation that he, more than any other personality or force, brought into being, honour and applaud and revere him? Why should not our race look upon him as one of its chief contributions of excellence? Why should we not join the poets, the orators and the statesmen, on either side of the Atlantic, in keeping him in the high place which they have given him.

One of the greatest American orators, Fisher Ames, speaking of Washington shortly after his death, said of him, that he had changed the standard of human greatness. That must not be merely a national pride and a national possession; it is the pride and the possession of the race to which we belong, and for whose future we are determined to render our fullest service.

Lord Moynihan, proposing a toast to the chairman, Lord Derby, pointed out that it was the things of the spirit that make immortal the bond between the English and American peoples.

LORD DERBY'S CLOSING REMARKS

Lord Derby, in his closing remarks at the dinner, stressed the fact that the friendship of nations is not dependent upon statutes or conferences but upon George Washington's ideals and the free intercommunication of the peoples of the earth. Lord Derby said in part:

Your Excellency, my Lords and Gentlemen:

. . . The object of this dinner, as you know, is to celebrate the Bi-Centenary of the birth of George Washington. You will probably wonder why, as George Washington was born on the 22nd February, we have this celebration on the 12th July. Upon communication with those in the United States who were charged with the celebration I was informed that it could be held at any time between February the 22nd and Thanksgiving Day, a latitude fully sufficient for celebrating a time of birth. We fixed on this day because we knew we should have Dr. Murray Butler with us today, and what better guest could we have had as our guest of honour than the President of our opposite number in America? We have also been honoured with the presence of the American Ambassador; he is an old friend of this country, and we welcome him tonight in his official capacity, but even more, if I may say so, as an old long standing friend of this country, and many of us in this room.

We also had the great privilege and pleasure of securing Mr. Winston Churchill to make one of the two great speeches we have heard tonight, and I thank him on behalf of the Pilgrims, for his great kindness in coming here to make that speech. We have here amongst us, curiously enough, two gentlemen whose ancestors were associated with Washington:

Sir Campbell Stuart, who is descended from Robert Dinwiddie, Lieutenant-Governor of Virginia from 1751 to 1758; also Lord Fairfax, the descendant of William Fairfax, who was President of the King's Council in Virginia. There may be others in this room who may equally claim to be descended from those who came in contact with the great man, the bicentenary of whose birth we are celebrating today. I am afraid I can hardly claim that, though I can claim that a certain relation of mine did have certain relations also at that time with American Forces.

An ancestor of mine who shed lustre onto our family history by starting the Derby, also did something else—he married his sister to Sir John Burgoyne. Now Sir John Burgoyne, in racing parlance, ran second at Saratoga. That has always been included as one of the 15 decisive battles of the world, which I was made to read at school. I feel that when we drink to the memory of George Washington, there are some of you who might perhaps drink to the memory of Sir John Burgoyne, who at all events contributed to some extent to the formation of the United States.

Norfolk turkey, Washington fritters, Virginia sweet potatoes, New Jersey cranberries, New England and American pumpkin pie, Florida lettuce and California grapefruit graced the menu. "God Save the King" and the "Star Spangled Banner" were played by the orchestra, and the spirit of genuine thanksgiving for the cordial relations existing between Great Britain and the United States was manifest.

Toasts to "The King" and "The President" were proposed and responded to with equal fervor. The American Ambassador gave the principal toast to "The Day We Celebrate," speaking as follows:

We are met together to celebrate our national Day of Thanksgiving. We devote this day to being thankful to

GEORGE WASHINGTON BICENTENNIAL DINNER ON THANKSGIVING DAY IN LONDON
AMERICAN AMBASSADOR ANDREW W. MELLON ADDRESSING THE ENGLISH AND AMERICAN GUESTS OF THE AMERICAN SOCIETY
AT THE HOTEL SAVOY, NOVEMBER 24, 1932.

THANKSGIVING DAY IN LONDON

The George Washington Bicentennial Celebration was brought to a close in London November 24, 1932, when the American Society in London held its annual Thanksgiving Day dinner and ball at the Hotel Savoy. More than three hundred members and distinguished guests, led by the American Ambassador, the Honorable Andrew W. Mellon, attended. This quotation from John Galsworthy, printed on the elaborate program, summarized the spirit of the occasion:

Each one of us loves his own country best, be it a little land or the greatest on earth; but jealousy is the dark thing, the creeping poison. Where there is true greatness, let us acclaim it; where there is true worth, let us prize it as if it were our own.

Divine Providence—thankful for the blessings which we have received during the past year and thankful for those which we hope we are about to receive in the year that is ahead.

If this last sounds too much like the cynic's definition of gratitude, which is, I believe, a lively expectation of favors yet to come, it is nevertheless an inseparable part of that youthful but altogether admirable quality of optimism which is so deeply ingrained in the American character and has not deserted us even at this rather bleak moment of our own and the world's history.

Under such conditions we can still be not only thankful but cheerful; and indeed we would be ashamed to be anything else when we remember the circumstances under which that first Thanksgiving was celebrated more than three hundred years ago.

You remember how that little group of men and women, whom we have learned to call the Pilgrims, had sailed from England in the Mayflower and, landing on the Massachusetts coast, had built there what they hoped was the beginning of a new civilization. For almost a year they watched for ships and supplies which never came. The food which they had brought with them was nearly gone: and so, when autumn came and they had gathered their first bountiful harvest and felt at last safe from starvation, they turned instinctively to the Divine Providence, in gratitude for the blessings which they had received, and set apart a special day which has become for us, as it was for them, a day of public thanksgiving.

One of the first acts of President Washington, after the Federal Government had been established, was to issue a proclamation, perpetuating the custom of Thanksgiving Day and setting apart a day in November as a time for "public thanksgiving and prayer." In this present year, which marks the two hundredth anniversary of Washington's birth, it will not be amiss, as President Hoover in his own proclamation has pointed out, to recall the memorable words in which Washington closed his Thanksgiving proclamation. Washington ended with the admonition that we "unite in most humbly offering our prayers and supplications to the great Lord and Ruler of Nations and beseech Him to pardon our national and other transgressions to enable us all, whether in public or private stations, to perform our several and relative duties properly and punctually, to render our National Government a blessing to all the People, by constantly being a Government of wise, just and constitutional laws, discreetly and faithfully executed and obeyed—to protect and guide all Sovereigns and Nations (especially such as have shown kindness unto us) and to bless them with good government, peace and concord—to promote the knowledge and practice of true religion and virtue, and the increase of science among them and us—and generally to grant unto all mankind such a degree of temporal prosperity as He alone knows to be best."

Such were Washington's words. It is obvious, I think, that Providence does not consider an excessive degree of temporal prosperity best for us at the present time! Notwithstanding that fact, however, we have many reasons today for being thankful. One of these is our presence in this friendly and hospitable country and another is the presence here tonight of so many of our British friends, including the representatives of Canada, Australia, and other parts of this great British Commonwealth of Nations who, like ourselves, share the language and institutions which originated here in England and must always unite us in spiritual bonds which are often stronger than political ties.

We have other reasons for being thankful. The world is at peace—the peace of exhaustion, perhaps; but nevertheless, it is a cause for thanksgiving and for hope that responsible men in all countries, backed by public opinion, are laboring with good prospect of success to bring about a reduction in the crushing burden of armaments and to make it neither safe nor profitable for any nation to disturb the peace of the world.

Turning now for a moment to our own domestic affairs, we have many reasons for being thankful. America, it is true, has passed through a difficult year and a hard winter is still ahead of us. The lean years have seemed to swallow up the good years, leaving us with a deflation in values and a reduction in wages and commodity prices without precedent in the history of the world. Yet we have weathered the storm remarkably well and have not only maintained the integrity of our financial structure but have preserved intact our social organization and our inherited institutions of government.

Under conditions that in other countries might have produced violence and upheaval, we, as befits the spiritual descendants of Englishmen, have accepted the inevitable and have adhered to the orderly processes of government as a means of expressing the public will. We have given no thought to dictators, either economic or otherwise. We have indulged ourselves in nothing more than our usual quadrennial political battle, by which we fondly believe we can settle anew all the questions that perplex us and can choose for ourselves an Earthly Providence which in four years time will rid us of all our ills. Surely such a belief is a cause for thanksgiving and its calm and orderly expression by the electorate a healthy manifestation of the body politic in which even the Pilgrim Fathers would have taken comfort.

We have not always measured up to the standards which the Pilgrim Fathers set us. But at least we have kept America in its essentials what they intended it should be—a Christian democracy, animated by a spirit of good will and friendship towards other nations; a democracy less naive, perhaps, and with fewer illusions than we once had, but conscious still of our dependence on an Overruling Providence whose beneficence towards us we continue gratefully to acknowledge by setting aside each year a day of national Thanksgiving.

I give you the toast: "The Day We Celebrate." So long as we observe it in a spirit of true humility towards our Creator and with good will and friendship towards our neighbors, we have no cause for concern as to the soundness of our American civilization or its usefulness to the world.

REPLY TO AMBASSADOR'S TOAST

In his reply to Ambassador Mellon's toast, the Hon. Robert Frazer, newly appointed American Consul General to Great Britain, told of his pride in being assigned to service in the land of Washington's ancestors. He continued:

In common with the rest of the world, our country, during the past year, has been passing through a period of crisis, but, and I say this is no Pollyanna spirit, let us be thankful that it has not been worse. And as we look back, in spite of the bleak and barren outlook, we can distinguish many landmarks which stand out as beacons of hope on a rocky shore. Despite appalling unemployment, we have been free from serious industrial disputes and violence. The storm of panic has blown itself out, and though the trail of wreckage in its wake is frightful, the banking structure stands, firmly anchored to the bedrock of sound finance. And though security and commodity prices have fallen to levels which but a few short years ago would have seemed impossible, there are indications that the trend has turned in the opposite direction.

These are not empty words. You have just heard the same belief expressed by our distinguished Ambassador, one of the greatest financiers of the time, and I may also say that these words represent the consensus of opinion as I found it when I left the United States but two weeks ago.

Turning to this great country in which we are privileged to live, and whose welfare is so near to the hearts of us all, we find the same basic stability, the same reviving hope, and the same confidence in the future.

Let us be thankful then, that on this national Thanksgiving Day, Britain and the United States can say that, though sorely tried, they have not been found wanting, and that they face the future together without fear. For it has become an axiom that if all goes well with our two countries, all must go well with the world.

A toast "Our Guests" was proposed by Mr. Robert Hervey Cabell, chairman of the American Society in London. After extending a cordial welcome to all present at the Thanksgiving-Bicentennial event, Chairman Cabell said in part:

There are no boundaries to our Thanksgiving Day Celebration—national, political or religious. Anyone with a sense of gratitude and a spirit of good-fellowship is welcome to share with us. One of the aims of this Society is to help to a better understanding between our country and other peoples, particularly between the people of the British Empire and the United States. Most of us believe all men are born free, yet everywhere today man is in chains of some sort. Those who believe themselves masters are the greater slaves.

How this wave of economic depression has come about no one has a very clear idea. We are all groping for a way out of this ramp of bad times. If it is true that courage belongs only to the free, then we are confident that with good will and co-operation of the English-speaking peoples, a solution of our problems can and will be found by our statesmen.

We trust that the zero point of our misfortune has been passed, and here tonight it is our duty to be glad of life and its opportunities; to be grateful for our friends, and thankful for our blessings.

Your Excellency, My Lords, Ladies and Gentlemen, I give you the toast . . .

SHOULD NOT JUDGE BY OLD STANDARDS

The Right Hon. Stanley M. Bruce, C. H., M. C., Resident Minister for Australia, in his response to the toast "Our Guests," said that Americans ought not to judge the Britain of today by the standards of 150 years ago. Such a conception, he maintained, is not conducive to the best of relations. Mr. Bruce said:

The difficulties and responsibilities of speaking with regard to America, in view of the delicate situation that exists, will be appreciated. I am in some respects, however, fortunate. I am a Minister of the British Crown, but not a Minister of Great Britain. I am a Minister of one of His Majesty's young Dominions beyond the seas. I speak with less authority but with more freedom.

I also am not an Englishman. This frees me from the prejudice and suspicion which we have to recognise is felt in the minds of some of your people towards all Englishmen. At the same time I can claim to express British views because today they are no longer the views only of the people of Great Britain, but are those of the British Empire, an association of free peoples scattered to all the corners of the earth.

I am also fortunate in not being subjected to the same suspicions that are entertained towards British Ministers, due to the feeling in the minds of many of your people that Great Britain is too closely linked with European affairs. You have a fear of becoming involved in Europe's troubles and ancient hatreds. You are determined to avoid European entanglements. How many of you recognise that these feelings, apprehensions and fears are shared by the great British Dominions, and that our point of view is almost identical with yours.

Further, many of your citizens have an inherited idea of Great Britain, dating from the days of the American War of Independence, as an Imperial power exploiting her colonies and possessions overseas for the benefit of her own people, without any consideration for the rights and interest of the inhabitants of these distant countries. Whatever truth there might have been in this judgment of British Imperial policy 150 years ago in the days of George Washington, nothing could be further from the facts today.

If such a conception were true, Australia would today be imitating the actions of your forefathers 150 years ago. Without traversing the rights and wrongs of that tragic struggle, I have little doubt that had Australia been in existence in those days, she would have been on your side. So important is it to ensure mutual understanding and cooperation today between the United States of America and the British Empire, that a solemn obligation rests on the shoulders of those who are set in authority in our respective countries to remove all obstacles that lie in the way of that happy consummation.

Perhaps I can make some small contribution by setting before you tonight the position of the present British Empire and the relations of the self-governing Dominions to the mother country. Much has been written on the pages of history in the last 150 years. The folly and tragedy of the British Empire in the days before the American War of Independence has been replaced by an enlightened and wise Imperial policy. A new British Empire has been built, based on freedom, liberty, and the full recognition of the rights of British peoples beyond the seas. The charter of this new British Empire was written in 1926. The position of mutual relations between the self-governing parts of the Empire are thus defined in that charter:

"They are autonomous Communities within the British Empire, equal in status, in no way subordinate one to another in any aspect of their domestic or external affairs, though united by a common allegiance to the Crown, and freely associated as members of the British Commonwealth of Nations."

In this new Commonwealth of British Nations, mutual consultation has been substituted for dictation, and the foreign policy of the British Empire is no longer the policy of Britain but the policy of the league of British nations joined together by their common allegiance to the Crown.

Surely an association between the United States of America and peoples with ideals and aspirations so similar, with problems so like, and with so common a viewpoint towards world's problems, is not only practicable, but natural and desirable!

We are passing through days of a crisis such as the world has never previously experienced. If we are to emerge from the trials and tribulations which beset us, it can only be by the most complete understanding and cooperation between the United States of America and the British Empire, the great English-speaking nations of the world.

The Honorable Howard Ferguson, K.C., LL.D., High Commissioner for Canada, proposed a toast to "The Chairman," following which the guests repaired to the "Abraham Lincoln Room," where Cavaliere Emilio Colombo and his orchestra rendered concert and dance music. A demonstration of the waltz and the Argentine tango was given by Miss Gem Mouflet and her partner.

Among the distinguished guests were: Sir Harry Gloster, K.C.M.G., K.B.E.; Mr. Ray Atherton, Counsellor, American Embassy; Sir Harry Brittain, K.B.E., C.M.G., LL.D., and Dame Alida Brittain, D.B.E.; the Earl of Buckinghamshire, Hon. Sir James D. Connolly; Mr. William L. Cooper, Commercial Attaché, American Embassy; Hon. J. W. Downie, C.M.G., High Commissioner for Southern Rhodesia; Mr. John Drummond-Hay, Hon. John Dulanty, C.B., C.B.E., High Commissioner for the Irish Free State; The Rt. Hon. Lord Dunsany and Lady Dunsany; Capt. Paul C. Grening, European Director United States Shipping Board; The Hon.

Claude Hope-Morley and Lady Dorothy Hope Morley, and Sir Bhupendra Nath Mitra, K.C.S.I., K.C.I.E., C.B.E., High Commissioner for India.

TABLET UNVEILING IN BRISTOL

Another link between Great Britain and the United States was forged on December 4, 1931, in Bristol, England, when there was unveiled in the Triangular garden of Park Square a tablet marking a momentous event in the history of Bristol and commemorating a connection between that city and the family name of George Washington. The ceremony was conducted under the auspices of the Bristol Branch of the Geographical Association and the Bristol Branch of the Royal Empire Society.

The tablet marks the spot where in 1643, during the Civil War between the King and Parliament, Col. Henry Washington, a "collateral ancestor" of General George Washington, and a royalist, led his small force of men through a break in the city wall of Bristol and opened the way for the eventual surrender of the city by the Parliamentary forces garrisoned there. Thenceforward, the place in the wall where Col. Henry broke through was called "Washington's Breach," a name that was perpetuated on the maps of Bristol for generations and which subsequently became the conjunction of two important thoroughfares in modern Bristol—Park Street and Park Row.

The unveiling ceremony preceded the opening of the George Washington Bicentennial Year by more than two months. First on the program was a luncheon in the Royal Empire Society Hall, at which, as reported in the TIMES AND MIRROR of Bristol, December 5, 1932, the Sheriff of Bristol proposed the toast to the guest, Mr. Evelyn Wrench, founder of the Overseas Club and the English Speaking Union, and referred to "the value of the Union in cementing and consolidating those innumerable ties which bound the mother country to the countries across the sea."

"The future of the world itself is in the hands of the English-speaking people, and it is essential to have understanding between one section and another," the sheriff declared. "We are here to reforge the link between Bristol and America."

In responding to the toast, Mr. Wrench congratulated Bristol on its many modern buildings and spoke of the debt it owed to Sir Thomas Lennard, inasmuch as he spent much time upon the investigation of this incident in the Civil War, and satisfied all concerned that the tablet might justifiably be attached to a block of freestone which has marked the spot in the Park Place for at least a hundred years. Mr. Wrench continued:

A great deal of the future depends on our keeping close contact with the various sections of the English-speaking world. In a day like this, when there is a wave of nationalism sweeping round the world, it is more necessary than ever to try to understand the other fellow's point of view.

We in London do not know the tremendously rich historic past that Bristol has. One wonders if there is not some way in which the English-speaking Union could help to tell our American and other visitors a little more about Bristol, and urge them when they go on trips to Devon and Cornwall not to forget to visit Bristol.

Mr. Wrench then referred to the claim of some that America was named for a certain Richard Ameryk, the senior Collector of Customs in Bristol in 1503, and spoke of the city's link with William Penn, the founder of the Quaker Colony in America, who had borrowed more than six thousand pounds from the Bristol Quakers to help him in the development of his colony in the New World and who married Hannah Callowhill, a Bristol Quakeress. Concerning Penn, he said:

If we had more of the spirit of William Penn in our dealing with the people of India, the more likely we would be to make a success of it. I look upon the foundation of the United States of America as one of the most glorious pages in the history of the English-speaking people, and we shall have something equally fine if we establish the United States of India within the orbit of the Commonwealth.

Referring again to the United States, he said it was not given to materialism and money getting, and in no country was there more idealism, adding:

One of the finest things we could do would be to further cooperate between two great sections of the English-speaking people for the benefit of mankind. We are bound to the United States by a common heritage and idealism. It will want all the clear thinking, far-sightedness, judgment and help of the group of English-speaking nations if the world is to get out of the morass in which it is at present.

HISTORY OUTLINED BY COL. LENNARD

At the unveiling Col. E. W. Lennard, Chairman of the Council of the Royal Empire Society, gave to the large assemblage a brief outline of the history connected with the marking of the spot. The Parliamentary forces in 1643, he pointed out, had been in possession of the city for some time, and the first attacks of the besieging Royalists had been repulsed. It was then that Col. Henry Washington, "perhaps the most distinguished member of the English Washingtons," noted a weak spot in the wall between the two nearby forts and that a post behind was unfinished and possessed no guns. With some sort of Greek fire tied to their pike heads for frightening effect, his small party made a sudden assault, breached the wall, filled the ditch, and made it possible for mounted troops to follow them and to dash down the grassy hillside, which is now Park Street, to College Green.

This penetration led to the surrender of Bristol, and contemporary historians all gave the main credit for that event to Colonel Washington. He was the grandson of the last member of that family to live at Sulgrave—Lawrence Washington—and this grandfather of his was the great-great-grandfather of George Washington.

The memorial tablet, Col. Lennard said, would be "another and tangible link between America and our ancient city so closely connected with Cabot, Pring, Penn, Ferdinando, Gorges, Wesley, Whitfield, Burke, and many others whose names were so honored across the Atlantic as in England."

Mr. Wrench said that photographs of the tablet would be sent to American historical societies. He said he had learned with interest from Monsignor Lee, of the Catholic Church in Bristol, that it was fitting the tablet should be close to the Pro-Cathedral, because Bishop Carroll, first Roman Catholic Bishop of America, was consecrated in the Bristol district by Bishop Walmesley and became Bishop of Baltimore.

Mr. Wrench congratulated the Bristol Branch of the Geographical Association on its public spirited action and unveiled the tablet amid applause and the thanks of the Bristol authorities.

The Government of the United States was represented at the ceremonies by Mr. Roy Baker, the American Consul. The TIMES AND MIRROR said:

A pleasing touch of sentiment was added to the ceremony when the American Consul placed a wreath at the base of the memorial. This whole historic event is intended in honor of George Washington, and constitutes one more link between Bristol and America, and it is Mr. Baker's intention to arrange for the placing of a wreath on the pedestal on July 4 every year.

Among other dignitaries who attended the luncheon and unveiling ceremonies were: Mr. Percy Steadman, chairman of the Council of the Royal Empire Society in Bristol, the Lord Mayor and the Lady Mayoress, the Sheriff and Mrs. Gange, Mr. Evelyn Wrench, the Master of the Society of Merchant Venturers, Mr. Ellison Eberle; the president of the Chamber of Commerce, Mr. F. M. Burris; the president of the Rotary Club, Mr. R. T. Stoddard, Mrs. Steadman, Mr. Roy Baker, American Consul, and Mrs. Baker, Mr. Douglas Cole, Canadian Trade Commissioner and Mrs. Cole, Col. E. W. Lennard, chairman of the Council of the Royal Empire Society, and Mrs. Lennard; Miss Dermott Harding, City Archivist; Mr. W. W. Jervis, Geographical Association; Major O. D. Kendall, Monsignor Provost Lee, Messrs. E. T. Thornton, F. C. Luke, Charles Wells, W. G. Cotterell, H. W. Hawkins, D. W. Stanton, S. J. Jones, A. H. Russell, A. G. Powell, and Charles W. Thomas, secretary.

TRIBUTE OF LIVERPOOL PRESS

Liverpool, that famous British port on the Mersey where boats have docked from America since Colonial times and whence so many Englishmen have set sail for the New World, paused in its commercial routine on February 22, 1932, to pay respect to the memory of George Washington, who was referred to by the POST AND MERCURY, of Liverpool, as "after all an Englishman, of old English stock." The editorial from which this is quoted follows:

THE GREATEST AMERICAN

President Hoover's tribute yesterday, to George Washington, on the occasion of the Bicentenary of his birth, was well conceived and well spoken. Thanks to the exceptionally good atmospheric conditions, it was perfectly audible to radio listeners in this country, who thus, in a way, were enabled to share in the celebrations at the Capitol. The Fathers of the Republic could have had no vision of a time when England could hear the President talking, or Americans hear our Prime Minister addressing them. If they had foreseen such a possibility, they would, we may be sure, have welcomed wireless telephony as a potent agent for binding the peoples together, and creating an international mentality.

The President set forth admirably the claims of Washington to lasting remembrance by all men and women of good will, and our own interest in Washington is just as natural as America's. After all, he was an Englishman, of old English stock, and the emancipatory work he performed and the ideas that guided him were English in spirit and precedent. The colonists resented the taxing policies of George III and Lord North, because they were heirs of the liberating principles that drove their forefathers to resist absolutism, political and ecclesiastical, in these islands, and to cross the Atlantic in order to obtain freedom to worship according to the dictates of their consciences.

Moral fortitude was the quality in Washington that Mr. Hoover singled out for special commendation. It was a quality which evidently Washington strove to cultivate, equally with a rigid self-discipline. The result was a man of heroic character well fitted for rational imitation by the citizens of the young Republic. Emerson once suggested that Washington had exhausted, in his own person, the American type in its best aspects, and that since his day the nation had been producing a lesser breed. Possibly the Sage was in an ironic mood when he aired that queer notion. Anyway, it has no sort of justification in fact. The American character has necessarily been affected by changing circumstances, but, at least so far as the English element of the community is concerned, it certainly retains the traits manifested so conspicuously in Washington. Indeed, if Washington was not felt instinctively to be, in a peculiar and wonderful degree, the representative American, his personality would not command the veneration and love which Americans bestow upon it, and which were eloquently expressed throughout the States yesterday and wherever Americans congregate on foreign soil. Unquestionably, the myth-makers have been busy, from the beginning with Washington's career. But modern research, while detecting the fictions about him, has left the essential Washington wholly untouched in his granitic strength of character and nobility of outlook.

Washington, by character, talent, and experience, was a providential gift to the States when, after the War of Independence, the extremely exacting task of organizing a new form of Government had to be faced. Without his wise and moderating counsel, matters might have gone badly enough. Instead of a united nation, there might have been a number of republics, or even monarchies, mutually jealous of one another, like the old Italian cities. Internecine war could hardly have been avoided. In the end, possibly France, say, might have intervened, and imposed her rule; the history of the world might have taken a new course. But Washington, to whom fortune had been so kind in the field, brought other and more splendid destinies for the anxious colonists. As Fisher Ames said when he died, America shares with Washington the singular glory of having conducted a civil war with mildness and a revolution with order. He is still the greatest American.

MANCHESTER OBSERVANCES

Manchester, one of the first cities of Lancashire, ancient shire of the Washington family, gave due honor to George Washington in 1932 through its press and public institutions, its officials and citizenry.

The great Manchester public library arranged a Washington display, entitled "The Manchester George Washington Bicentenary Exhibition." From several weeks before the celebration officially opened until the close of the bicentennial period, November 24, 1932, the public showed great interest in the exhibition.

The MANCHESTER CITY NEWS, of February 20, 1932, printed the following article:

An exhibition is now on view at the Reference Library, Piccadilly, illustrating the life and period of George Washington, who was born on February 22, 1732, and was President of the United States for seven years from 1789 to 1796.

The remote ancestors of the great President had their home in the parish of Warton-in-Lonsdale, Lancashire. Modern genealogists have established the existence of sixteen generations, beginning with John Washington, who settled in Warton about 1300. During Elizabethan days Sulgrave Manor, in Northants, became the home of the Washington family. This was bought on the occasion of the centenary of the Treaty of Ghent in 1914, and presented to the Sulgrave Institution to be used as a Washington Museum. A fund of $100,000 was raised in America for its maintenance.

Washington's early soldiering experiences occurred in the county of his birth. Governor Dinwiddie instructed him to present a memorial to French Headquarters in 1753. The journey was hazardous, and Washington narrowly missed death from the gun of an Indian, Gist, the celebrated woodsman, saving his life.

The exhibition contains numerous portraits of Washington at different ages, and there are also portraits of his mother, Mary Washington, and of his wife, Martha Washington, whom he married in 1759. His home life at Mount Vernon, in Fairfax County, Virginia, was not interrupted until 1775, when he left it to undertake his duties as Commander-in-Chief of the American forces; and he did not enter his own doors again till 1784. Washington was chosen Commander-in-Chief on June 15, 1775, on the suggestion of John Adams, who was "the Colossus of the debate" on the Declaration of Independence, and later became the second President.

Many incidents in Washington's career are represented. He is shown at the battles of Monmouth and Princeton, and firing the first gun at the siege of Yorktown. He is also shown crossing the Delaware, interviewing Howe's messenger, receiving the Clerk of Congress at Mount Vernon with the news of his election to the Presidency, and entering the city of New York just before undertaking that office. The spirit which animated him and which typifies the Washington tradition is revealed in what he once said about a friend: "As George Washington I would do this man any kindness to my power; but as President of the United States I can do nothing."

One of the most interesting exhibits is an early edition of Tom Paine's pamphlet "Common Sense," which first appeared in 1776. It made the author of the "Rights of Man" famous in the New World and Washington wrote of it, "The opinion for independency seems to be gaining ground; indeed, most of those who have read the pamphlet say it is unanswerable." Paine enlisted in the Revolutionary Army soon after the Declaration of Independence.

The first Continental Congress met at Philadelphia on September 5, 1774, and a view is shown of Carpenters' Hall, where this took place. Washington was one of the seven delegates from Virginia. Patrick Henry said of him, "In respect to solid information and sound judgment Colonel Washington is unquestionably the greatest man on the floor." Thomas Jefferson, who became the third President, was also another of Washington's early associates, and was the author of the Declaration of Independence, which was signed on July 4, 1776. Benjamin Franklin was also an outstanding figure; and Major General Charles Lee, belonging to an old Cheshire family of Lee of Lea, and afterwards of Dernhall, Cheshire, was Washington's second in command, but this appointment proved to be a failure.

The prominent figures in this country are represented in the persons of George III, who was satirised by Byron in his "Vision of Judgment"; Lord North, who succeeded the Duke of Grafton as Prime Minister, was largely responsible for the measures that brought about the loss of the American colonies. Charles James Fox, the most formidable opponent in Parliament of the coercive measures adopted; Thomas Burke, who pleaded the colonists' cause in his speeches on "American Taxation" (1774) and "Conciliation with America" (1775), and the Earl of Chatham, who left a sick bed to attend the House of Lords for what proved to be the last time to support the memorial sent by Congress to Parliament.

Washington has had many biographers, but a short and readable biography has been written by Ada Russell, a graduate of Manchester University, and issued in the "Heroes of All Time" series.

RECEPTION AT MIDLAND HOTEL

The first official bicentennial function in Manchester was a reception at the Midland Hotel, given by the American Consul and Mrs. A. R. Thompson. Manchester newspapers carried full reports of this fete, and the following account is contained in a dispatch from the consul to the Secretary of State of the United States, February 23, 1932:

I have the honor to report that the initial part of the George Washington Bicentennial celebration in Manchester took the form of a reception held by the Consul and his wife in the ballroom suite of the Hotel Midland on Monday afternoon, February 22nd, to commemorate the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington.

One hundred and fifty-one persons attended the reception, including the Right Honorable the Lord Mayor of Manchester and the Lady Mayoress, and other outstanding local officials; the Right Reverend the Lord Bishop of Manchester, the clergy, the heads of educational institutions, with their wives; personages internationally known in connection with finance and industry such as the Right Honorable Lord Colwyn of Colwyn Bay, Sir Christopher Needham, Sir John and the Honorable Lady Barlow, Sir Arthur and Lady Haworth, Sir Ernest and Lady Thompson; the Manchester Consular Corps and their ladies, and forty-nine American citizens resident in the Manchester consular district.

The participants were evidently very pleased to have this opportunity of paying tribute to the memory of the First President of the United States who was a direct descendant of an ancient Lancashire family which (according to historical records) lived in the parish of Warton-in-Lonsdale, Lancashire, England, from about 1300 to 1823. The more important leaders of civic, educational and economic activities took advantage of this occasion to ask that their respects and felicitations be conveyed to President Hoover. (In this connection it should be stated that in receiving persons of national and international importance, the Consul explained that he was doing so on behalf of President Hoover, Chairman of the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission.)

A number of factors contributed to render the function a great success; First of all, should be mentioned the large amount of assistance received from the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission, whose posters (such as the large colored Athenaeum Portrait of the First President, and the picture of his birthplace at Pope's Creek, Westmoreland County, Virginia) were framed and appropriately decorated with bunting, or flowers, and flanked with American flags displayed in the regulation manner. The Commission's large "glossy" of Houdon's bust of George Washington was handed to the MANCHESTER GUARDIAN, which not only conspicuously reproduced it in its issue of the morning of February 22nd, but in the same issue published an editorial concerning the First President, and also an article which set forth the magnitude of the Commission's activities both at home and abroad.

An orchestra provided a very attractive program including the American and British national anthems, Sousa music, and airs from the well-known American folk songs. A large placard on one of the mantels of the ballroom drew attention to the George Washington Bicentennial Exhibition which is to remain on view at the Manchester Reference Library until November 24.

An additional large portrait of Washington was displayed in the reception room adjoining the ballroom, and the effectiveness of the receiving line was greatly enhanced by a magnificent floral bouquet presented by the Right Honorable Lord Colwyn of Colwyn Bay to the Consul's wife in her capacity as hostess. The large number of distinguished personages paying tribute to the memory of the First President brought the gathering within the category of a first-class function.

It should be emphasized that the reception held by the Consul and his wife is probably the beginning of a series of Washington celebrations likely to take place in Manchester between now and Thanksgiving Day.

WASHINGTON-STANDISH HERALDRY

In a dispatch of August 15, 1931, to the Secretary of State, Consul Thompson included the following interesting historical note regarding the heraldry of the Washington Family in England:

At the Church of St. Lawrence, Chorley, Lancashire, England, a relic of the Washington Family has been found in a quartering of the Washington coat of arms with the arms of the family of the famous Pilgrim father, Captain Miles Standish. The bars and stars of the Washington Family are apparent. These arms are at the top of the pew formerly owned by the Duxbury branch of the Standish Family, which is the branch from which Miles Standish came. The pew is part and parcel of the Duxbury Estate, near Chorley, Lancashire, England, now owned by Mrs. C. E. Mayhew.

The MANCHESTER GUARDIAN signalized the opening of the George Washington Bicentennial Celebration by the publication on February 22, 1932, of the following editorial; which was typical of the attitude of the entire British press:

AFTER TWO CENTURIES

Two hundred years ago today (by the "new style" reckoning) was born a great Englishman who became the first American. We must claim this for George Washington, in order that the land which reared his forefathers may share the proud title in him of the Republic he made. Apart from the accident of birth, by his character and his outlook on life and politics, Washington was "mere English," if in the end he became something more. He was quite as English as George the Third, and possibly more English than Lord North. Indeed, he was so exceedingly English that he was regarded as a scoundrel by most other Englishmen, who did not like his painful way of instructing them in the first principles of Empire.

The principles had to be learnt, and that Washington was an efficient teacher is the greatest part of our debt to him. It has been debated whether the loss of America was not a disguised blessing, on the ground that otherwise her natural pre-eminence would have long since transferred the capital of the Empire from the Thames to the Potomac. But this is moderately certain—that but for the hard teaching of Washington there would have been no Empire to need a capital. Americans link Washington with Lincoln among the builders of their tradition. To us his work is significant in that it led to the Durham Report and to new and better conceptions of Empire. On the whole, the lessons he taught us have not been unlearnt. We gave up the "commercial nexus" with our colonies, finding, at least till recently, that the other ties, those praised by Burke, "light as air, strong as links of iron," were sufficient—and safer. Thanks to him, later Imperialism has been a poor, self-conscious thing, sounding its loud brass on a cracked note. And today we may well be proud and glad that his statue stands in Trafalgar Square—looking towards the Parliament he once bullied into sense.

DURHAM AND NORTHUMBERLAND

In Newcastle-on-Tyne and elsewhere in Northumberland and Durham Counties, the George Washington Bicentennial evoked a series of public commemorative events and a volume of printed eulogy, news, and history not excelled in any of the English provinces.

Preaching George Washington ideals and history in Newcastle, England, is about as superfluous as "carrying coals to Newcastle," for it was in the rich countryside about this important British city that Washington's ancestry had its roots. It was there, during the American Revolution, that "a majority of inhabitants of Newcastle regarded the Revolution as a civil war between two sections of the same people," and where contemporary papers were "sympathetic towards the struggle of their fellow subjects in America."

Durham County, among other links with America, even boasts of a New Washington and a Washington Village, where the Bicentennial was observed with local pride.

The Bicentennial Celebration was inaugurated in Newcastle on Sunday, February 28, when there was held in one of the large theatres a George Washington service, with the distinguished patronage of the Lord Mayor, the Deputy Lord Mayor, the Sheriff, and the American Consul, and under the auspices of the Tyneside Sunday Lecture Society. The chairman was Sir Thomas Oliver, who is president of the Lecture Society, president of the British Society of Hygiene, president of the University of Durham College of Medicine at Newcastle-on-Tyne, and director of the Campaign for Cancer Research in Northern England. He is also a leading authority in industrial diseases in the United Kingdom, and has been president for 32 years of Tyneside Geographical Society.

Sir Thomas said it was most appropriate to recall George Washington and his time since he is honored alike in England and the United States because of his great services for the cause of human liberty. He referred to the happy relations between Great Britain and the United States and said that such relations ought always to be characteristic of peoples who hold Washington ideals in common.

ADDRESS BY MR. BARNES

The principal address of the evening was delivered by Rev. Herbert Barnes, Minister of the Church of the Divine Unity at Newcastle-on-Tyne.

William F. Doty, American Consul, sent the following resume of Mr. Barnes' address:

There was a sketch of the outstanding life features, the training and the notable achievements of Washington. Emphasis was placed upon the fact that he was of yeoman English ancestry of a very high type, that he belonged to a greatly privileged class, but that he was not coddled in youth. He endured hardship as a surveyor at 16 years of age in the wilds of Virginia, and great dangers at 19 and the next few years in dealing with Indians and Frenchmen as Major, then Lieutenant-Colonel and Colonel, still only about 23 years of age. As Aide to General Braddock he gave advice to avoid an ambush by the Indians and the French, but the British General would pay no heed. The British troops were badly defeated. Braddock died from his wounds soon thereafter. Washington had two horses shot under him, while four balls went through his coat.

There were brief references to him as Colonel of Militia of Virginia during the remaining period of the French and Indian War, and his marriage to the widow Custis. Events were traced both in the American Colonies and in Great Britain, especially the Tea-Party in Boston Harbor. It was admitted that King George III and his Ministers miserably blundered, but that there were other men such as Fox, Chatham and Pitt who did everything possible to plead the cause of justice for the American colonists. Washington was placed in command of the Continental Army, and although he might not rank with the three or four of the world's greatest military leaders, his place was believed to be very high in that line. He won the cause during a struggle that lasted seven years.

Washington was described as of almost impeccable honesty, carrying the sternest principles of private morality into public life. He even declined to accept payment for his services as Commander-in-Chief of the Army, whereas he actually contributed largely to the cause from his private purse. Although he was almost deified by the American people after he had been eight years President of the United States, some iconoclastic historians two or three generations subsequently sought to rob him of his fame, and, if possible, all his ability and fine character. Great English historians such as Greene and Lecky, among others, have estimated him as a real giant in comparison with other notable figures of all time.

Daniel Webster was cited as having said in his eulogy on the passing of Thomas Jefferson and John Adams, that Washington was in the "clear blue sky" of great renown. The lecturer considered that now it was time to regard George Washington not as a rebel against the British Crown, but as a deliverer of vast millions of mankind, as he was not only the founder of the American Republic but many of the Commonwealths now within the British Empire that are essentially independent of England in all important respects. Thus Washington by the force of his fine character and great capability along practical lines, and his self-discipline which involved his break from the privileged class, became the mighty leader that he was in the cause of freedom and of democratic government.

Mr. Barnes in the conclusion of his manuscript noted Washington's Farewell Address to the American people urging that there should be no "entangling alliances" and no antipathies against any people or nation. He expressed regret that the Government of the United States had, in his opinion, too strictly adhered to Washington's farewell warning of seeming aloofness. It was unfortunate, Mr. Barnes stated, that the United States was not a member of the League of Nations, which, in his opinion, was thereby greatly weakened. Equally regrettable it seemed to him that the Government of the United States still held aloof from participation in the World Court under the auspices of that League.

POLITICAL DISCUSSION INVITED

A discussion of Anglo-American political questions in connection with Mr. Barnes' speech was invited. Taking advantage of this opportunity Consul Doty addressed the gathering. Mr. Doty sent to the Department of State the following resume of his remarks:

I remarked that in some respects the occasion seemed to me to be unique, as the Tyneside Sunday Lecture Society of which the Chairman, Sir Thomas Oliver, was the honored President, had arranged to celebrate the Bicentennial of the birth of George Washington. The audience had patiently, and without a single interruption, listened to some very painful truths concerning what was deemed to be a mistaken policy by responsible Governmental leaders in England that failed to grapple justly with the contention of the American Colonies for representation if they were to be taxed. The audience, had in fact, listened to a eulogy upon George Washington who had actually led successfully a revolution against the British Government and had founded, together with some other leading personages, the American Republic. The audience and the Lecture Society had thus acted superbly in honoring the memory of a great man that at this day could be regarded truly as common heritage to the two peoples.

I referred to the name of a little town of Washington a few miles across the Tyne River in the County of Durham, where, according to some authorities, the Washingtons had lived several hundred years ago, although it was not quite clear that George Washington was actually descended from that particular line. Also I mentioned that he had been born in Westmoreland County, Virginia, that county having been named after the picturesque one in North Western England in the Lake country.

I recalled a conversation about seven years ago with the Earl of Dartmouth, who expressed his great gratification that he was descended from an elder brother whose younger brother was the direct ancestor of George Washington. The Earl, in fact, said that he saw some resemblances in the flag adopted by Washington to the escutcheon of the Earl's ancestral line. This was a great change considering that Lord Dartmouth, Minister for the Colonies under George III, had been a most bitter opponent of the American Colonies.

It had been gratifying to me to receive a day or two ago a letter from the Secretary of the English Speaking Union from Dartmouth House, London, expressing interest in the announced Bicentennial of George Washington, which would include a discussion of Anglo-American relations. Viscount Grey of Faldon, so well known in Newcastle-on-Tyne, was the President of the English Speaking Union. I had, in fact, been requested to nominate some leading personage in this District who would advance in a fraternal way the Union's interest.

There was an Anglo-American Committee to safeguard the English language. Mr. Bernard Shaw was a prominent member. The two peoples presumably would be encouraged in due time to reach standards more in common than at times had been observed on different sides of the water. Many learned British authorities have stated that the Pilgrim Fathers took with them the nasal accent from the County of Kent, England, to the New England, and this accent, now the so-called "American" accent, is still observed extensively in the vicinity of Dover, County of Kent, England. If such be the case, despite objections here from various quarters, there is even this additional tie between at least some portions of the two peoples.

There were many other Societies that were introducing the English and American groups each to the other.

I expressed the firm belief that the political relations between the two Governments and peoples had never been better than now. The two Governments were interested in some notable conferences at present that had for their object not only disarmament to a safe and sane level by all nations, but also seeking to conserve universal peace, and there had been the fore-shadowing in both countries of a possible monetary standard conference that might be held in the not distant future in the hope that some international unit of monetary value might become generally current and presumably greatly restore world-wide confidence and enhance prosperity. The two Governments had acted along lines of policy in the Far East, aided also by some other Governments, which indicated harmonious action seeking amicable adjustment of a difficult and dangerous situation.

As the Reverend Mr. Barnes in concluding his most able and interesting lecture on George Washington had raised the question of non-participation in the League of Nations by the Government of the United States, it was my privilege to explain that the American Government had co-operated in possibly three-fourths of the non-political, that is to say humanitarian, interests conducted by the League of Nations. I need refer only to the strong American leadership on the opium question. While the League of Nations undoubtedly met a very outstanding political need in the case of a large number of nations, the Government and the people of the United States had to reckon with one of the foundational provisions in its Constitution, namely, that Congress alone could declare war and conclude peace. During about 150 years the Government and the people of the United States had been satisfied with that provision. It would appear to be revolutionary to many minds in that country, were the Government of the United States to be an active member on the political side of the League of Nations, thereby relegating to a group of foreign nations the right to compel the people of the United States to engage in punitive measures against one or more nations that the League might deem to be offenders.

However, I wished to assure the Reverend Mr. Barnes and others interested in the matter, that the League of Nations had been, and was likely to continue to function admirably in the interests of world peace and good will, and that the Government and the people of the United States had so to say spiritual affinities with England and its great Empire for world-wide peace. I refer to the American participation in the Great War when that country was formally invited to enter to assist England and her Allies and to become a member of the Entente. It seemed to me that the continuance of the good understanding between England and the United States was really essential to the cause of human freedom and democratic government. The cause of civilization was at stake. I had the faith to believe that the two peoples that had not engaged in war against each other during more than 100 years would not fail to regard mere political or physical ties as of much importance, but would lay hold upon the greater reality of spiritual union between them that would bless mankind.

I indicated that when glancing at the map of England I could not help but note, at least in fancy, that the Cornish peninsula with the town of Plymouth seemed to stretch out as far as possible into the Atlantic in the general direction of Cape Cod, Massachusetts, with the New Plymouth close by. Edward Doty, my direct ancestor, aged 19, was one of the pilgrims who departed from Plymouth, England, and helped to establish the New Colony in Massachusetts. It had been recently estimated that 51 percent of the people in the United States were today of English origin. That, of course, left 49 percent of other racial stocks. It was essential, therefore, kindly to bear in mind that the people of England and of the United States might not on all occasions "see eye to eye" but, on the other hand, it remained amicably to reconcile any differences that might arise, bearing in mind that the two peoples were closely united by former political, religious, and social ties, inheriting a common literature, and speaking the same language. For all concerned the prospect was exceedingly bright. I thanked one and all for their interest in that meeting.

It may be of some slight interest to note that Sir Thomas Oliver, the Lord Mayor, and many others very kindly expressed thanks to me for the tenor of my remarks.

By request of the congregation of the Church of the Divine Unity and some other persons, the Reverend Herbert Barnes repeated his lecture on George Washington at his church on Tuesday evening, the 1st instant, and upon his invitation I acted as Chairman on that occasion. His address was exactly the same as above indicated. Similarly my remarks were approximately those above recorded as on the previous Sunday evening.

International Rotary, which originated in the United States, and had become world-wide in its activities, was mentioned by me as one of the great forces not only more closely uniting the English-speaking peoples of the two countries, but of the other races and tongues. The sixth principle of Rotary enjoins the cultivation of international understanding and good will.

Mr. Barnes at the close of his lecture made some complimentary references to myself, and particularly requested me to state my point of view relative to the American Government attitude toward the League of Nations. I endeavored on that occasion to impress upon the audience that England would find it very difficult to alter any fundamental principle of its Government, the main structure of which had served the people exceedingly well during a millennium at least. As the second lecture was delivered in Mr. Barnes' church, I emphasized the strong religious ties between the English and the American peoples, referring to a rather recent visit of Mr. Barnes to a religious congress at Boston, Massachusetts. I suggested that many types of religious creeds were similar on both sides of the Atlantic. To a remarkable extent the same hymns were current among the two branches of the English stock. I refer to notable examples such as "Lead Kindly Light," "Rock of Ages" and one by the American poet, Whittier, the last named appropriate particularly in times of great personal and national distress and foreboding concerning the future. I cited the following lines from that hymn:

And so beside the silent sea
I wait the muffled oar,
No harm from Him can come to me
On ocean and on shore.

I know not where His islands lift
Their fronded palms in air,
I only know I cannot drift
Beyond His love and care.

On behalf of the audience I expressed to Mr. Barnes most hearty appreciation for his really splendid presentation of the character of George Washington in the midst of his time.

The lecture was attended by a very large and representative gathering and the entire proceeds from the sale of seats were devoted to the Royal Victoria Infirmary of Newcastle-on-Tyne.

The demand for a repetition was so great that the lecture was given again on March 1 at the Church of the Divine Unity. Consul Doty reported that both the Rev. Herbert Barnes and Sir Thomas Oliver "later made personal calls at the Consulate and said that they were very happy to have rendered what service was possible in connection with the two hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington and that both entertained a very kind feeling toward the people of the United States."

ENTHUSIASM IN TOWN OF WASHINGTON

Nowhere in the world was the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington celebrated with more enthusiasm and pride than in the little town of Washington, Durham County, England, ancestral home of the Washington family.

Long before the period of the celebration opened word reached the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission that the people of this town and the neighboring country wished to join the people of the United States in honoring the memory of George Washington in 1932. The Commission was asked to assist with suggestions and literature and responded by sending historical literature relating to George Washington and the origin of his family in England, with suggestions for observing the anniversary, including plays and pageants and music of Washington's time, and with reproductions of the Athenaeum portrait of Washington to be hung in the schools and other public buildings of the town of Washington and nearby places.

Frederick Hill, headmaster of Biddick School, in Washington, took the leading part in arousing interest and organizing the Bicentennial celebrations there. He wrote to the Commission on October 18, 1931, expressing thanks for literature sent to him and continuing:

You are aware, of course, that this Washington, County Durham, is the original home of the Washington family, they being Lords of the Manor from 1183 to about 1400. . . .

Next year, 1932, is the centenary of the re-building of our Parish Church. The original church, of Saxon origin, was demolished in 1832. Next year is also the bi-centenary of the birth of George Washington. Our modest pageant will be held to celebrate these two events.

Unfortunately, owing to the great depression in trade, especially in coal mining, the main industry of this district, the funds at our disposal will be very small and consequently our pageant will be on a correspondingly small scale. However, local interest is keen, and I am sure efforts will not be spared to make the celebration worth while locally.

There is also considerable civic pride amongst us in the fact that we have a direct connection with the great patriot to be so appropriately honored by his countrymen next year in the U. S. A.

For the past few years I have undertaken close research into the history of this district with surprisingly satisfactory results. I have published two books (sold out) and have sufficient material for three or four others. I am headmaster of the largest school (400 scholars) and am recognized as the "local historian." I have had visits from many Americans interested in Washington and other ancient families of this locality. . . .

I should be greatly obliged for any further literature in connection with the celebration, especially any dealing with plays and pageants.

From the time the Commission first learned of the desire of the people of Washington, England, and the nearby districts to participate in the celebration the Division of Foreign Participation of the Commission cooperated to the fullest possible extent with Mr. Hill and others in the locality. The literature published by the Commission contained much valuable historical material with reference to the origin of the Washington Family, and this was sent to Mr. Hill to supplement such material as he had gathered locally.

THE DE WESSYNGTONS OF DURHAM

It is on record that from 1183 to about 1400 the de Wessyngtons were Lords of the Manor in that part of England known as the Village of Wessyngton in the Palatine Durham. In those days it was the custom for families high in the social scale to take their surnames from their native towns and to change them for those of other towns when they took up residence in different territories, or for the names of estates when promoted to more extensive holdings.

The village and estate of Wessyngton, Palatine Durham, was in the territory conquered by William The First and apportioned by him to his Norman followers. Among the descendants of these Norman knights was William de Hertburn, who in 1183 exchanged his village of Hertburn for the manor and village of Wessyngton, changing his surname with the estate. This was a tribute to the bravery of William de Wessyngton. His new possessions which were on the northern border of England, in a section subjected to constant warfare, where the most worthy of the King's followers were stationed.

As years went by the prefix de, pertaining to the lord of the manor, gradually fell into disuse, and finally disappeared from before the family name. Meanwhile changes of fortune caused members of the Wessyngton family to become scattered throughout England. Some distinguished themselves in religious fields, some in the professions, and others were knighted for public service. In different sections the name was spelled in divers ways; one form, "Vysington," had a significance of its own, for "vyse" is also spelled "viss" and is defined as "wise." Other forms appearing in important records are "Weschington," "Wassington," and "Washington."

It was from this ancient and chivalrous family that the first President of the United States descended. Hence there is today in the County Durham the thriving English community called Washington.

SPECIAL SERVICE IN PARISH CHURCH

On Sunday, February 21, 1932, members of the Washington Parish attended special services in the church built more than 100 years before on the site of the old Saxon church, in the crypt of which many members of the de Wessyngton family lay buried. The services were devoted entirely to a commemoration of that "great and good man, George Washington, first President of the United States of America," as the WASHINGTON PARISH MAGAZINE of March reported the event:

"In a clear and able address the Rector of the Parish, Mr. Cyril Lomax, sketched the progress of the Washington family, showing its connection with the village," the report continued: "A Stuart portrait was given prominent place in the church and was hung as a gift from the United States Bicentennial Commission in Washington, D. C."

JULY 4 IN WASHINGTON TOWN

On Independence Day, July 4, 1932, there was held in the town of Washington, an "American Tea," under the sponsorship of the Anglican Parochial Church Council. The invitations stated that the event was meant to link up Washington, County Durham, England, with her sister across the sea, Washington, D. C., Capital City of the United States of America. Mr. William F. Doty, American Consul at Newcastle, was the guest of honor and the principal speaker.

Mr. M. H. Kellett, managing director of the Washington Coal Company, who presided at the tea, said in his introductory remarks that the name of the American capital, Washington, "is due to some extent to the Durham village of the same name from which the family sprang."

"I have often wondered why there are so many places in the neighborhood with names similar to well known towns in America," said Mr. Kellett. "We have here a Philadelphia, Havannah, Quebec, and even a New York. It is also probable that the 'Stars and Stripes' are derived from the Washington seal still used in this neighborhood."

Mr. Kellett went on to say that he earnestly hoped the Government and the people of the United States would continue to be as generous and as practicable in lending aid to stricken Europe as they had been in the past. During a recent visit to the continent he felt greatly depressed at times, he said, when he witnessed in all of the leading countries exhibitions of intense nationalism in direct opposition to a world-wide spirit of unity. He said that he feared the United States considered now and again that its policy should be narrowly limited to its own interests.

"The entire world is in a condition of financial and political depression," Mr. Kellett averred, "and the assistance of the American people is absolutely indispensable for world recovery and the maintenance of universal peace."

Striking a lighter vein, Mr. Kellett said that on his recent travels in Europe he had boarded a vessel called the George Washington at Hamburg, Germany, and according to his usual custom, had asked to be allowed to see the engine room. On inquiry he found that the ship was not burning Washington coal and he thereupon pointed out to the engineer that it was "rather a shame that a ship called George Washington should not be burning coals from the city named for his ancestors. The captain told Mr. Kellett that he never knew there was such a place in England or that there were coal mines there, but he agreed that "it was a shame."

"I hope," added Mr. Kellett amid laughter, "that the American Consul, Mr. Doty, will persuade the American Government to compel the steamship, George Washington, to burn Washington coals."

CONSUL DOTY'S ADDRESS

Mr. Kellett then introduced the American Consul, Mr. Doty, who sent to the Department of State the following account of his address:

Great appreciation was expressed for the remarkable initiative of the Parish Council of Washington, Durham County, for celebrating on July 4th, the anniversary of the Independence of the United States of America, and by honoring myself as the principal guest on that occasion. Truly that was a most noble gesture, coming as it did from British people. They in the community of Washington were imbued with a deep regard for the link with that other Washington on the banks of the Potomac and in fact with the entire population of the United States, because in their village between the years 1183 and 1400 A. D. resided, the De Wessyngton or Washington family, who were the progenitors of General George Washington. They were a knightly family possessed of a relatively large estate. Their manor hall was replaced in 1613 by Bishop James of Durham, who undoubtedly used the same material in the construction of his fine episcopal residence.

It was regretted that this Old Hall, as it is called, was now in a dilapidated condition and that the thirteen families housed within its walls had been given notice to quit the building following an order of condemnation of the structure for residence purposes. More suitable quarters in the neighborhood had been offered to them. If at all practicable it was desirable that the Old Hall should be purchased from its present owner and renovated to a certain extent involving in both instances seemingly very small expenditures. On the other hand, it would not be right to make this Old Hall into a rival of Sulgrave Manor, Northamptonshire, as the equivalent of nearly $40,000 had been expended in its purchase and restoration, wherein some of George Washington's more immediate ancestors had actually dwelt. Nonetheless, at this period when such keen interest was being taken in George Washington practically throughout all the world, some relatively inexpensive plan should be devised to prevent the Old Hall, Washington, from being entirely demolished, occupying, as it did, the exact site of the De Wessyngton or Washington Manor Hall during many centuries.

To an American Consul it was most refreshing to observe that Washington, Durham County, displayed the coat-of-arms of the De Wessyngton or Washington family over the entrance to their Town Hall, on the Borough Ambulance and elsewhere—the crest used by General George Washington upon his carriage and the design used upon his personal seal in correspondence. It was thankfully perceived that the decorations that afternoon in the Welfare Hall indicated equal respect to the American and British flags and that there was on exhibition a fine portrait of President George Washington.

As I had resided many years in my youth in Washington, District of Columbia, I had now and again visited Mount Vernon, the exquisitely beautiful home of George Washington, situated on the west bank of the Potomac River about eighteen miles below Washington. The view over the wide expanse of water is very extensive and the Manor House is large and commodious wherein General Washington lived like the head of one of the great families of England.

It was fitting to present Washington as a person, an individual. His father had been a plantation owner to a considerable extent. George was the product of the father's second marriage. The father was a practical gentleman, but very religious. An English clergyman belonging to the family of George Washington's mother had once boldly preached the equality of all men, for which he had been greatly denounced. The death of the father, when George Washington was about eleven years of age, separated the members of the household somewhat widely. Great responsibility was borne then by the mother in directing, until the children should arrive at maturity, some very large plantations and interests in iron ore. The education of George Washington is now considered to have been very haphazard. Nonetheless, he was an accomplished land surveyor by the time he was sixteen years old. Thereupon his great friend and patron, Lord Fairfax, engaged him at times to survey large tracts of his land in the Shenandoah Valley, a wild region.

George Washington is regarded as one of the first map-makers in what is now the United States. He was exceedingly efficient in surveying tracts of land and indicating where roads could be made, and subsequently taking great interest in the early efforts of steam navigation on rivers. He became, in fact, one of the greatest civil engineers of his generation. As a youth and young man he was very hardy, a superb horseman, capable of enduring great hardship, lying on the ground near a camp fire even in winter, ever alert to locate the best soil and to advance agriculture and civilization.

Intrusted with grave responsibilities by the Governor of Virginia, George Washington encountered the French and Indians in large numbers. He had a measure of success in his military engagements, holding the rank of major at about twenty-one years of age. He conducted several masterly retreats when greatly outnumbered by the enemy. At about twenty-three years of age he was a colonel and acted as an aide to General Braddock, who unfortunately disregarded some advice by George Washington and was killed in battle with the French and Indians. All of the aides, except George Washington, were killed in that engagement. Washington counted five bullet holes in his coat and solemnly averred that a Higher Power had preserved his life. His dependence upon Providence is an outstanding feature of his life.

Only once did he seek a public position, that was membership in the House of Burgesses in Virginia, which he accomplished. From that time onward he seems to have had a very humble idea of his general capacity of leadership, but he was called again and again to more difficult and responsible positions until he was Commander-in-Chief of the American forces, president of the Constitutional Convention and finally twice President of the United States.

As his life was committed to God Almighty, he compelled officers and soldiers alike to attend religious services. He himself when at Mount Vernon became a church officer in the Anglican, later the Episcopal churches at Pohick and at Alexandria, Virginia. Sometimes his carriage broke down on the way to church as the roads were exceedingly bad in those days, whereupon he would himself conduct the devotions of his family in his home.

George Washington was a prominent member* of Free Masonry in the United States, which then began to advance the theory of the equality and brotherhood of men and which forbade discussion in its meetings of controversial subjects such as religious differences and political affiliations. In Washington, Durham County, very recently the Masons gathered from many parts of England in a special ceremony to honor the memory of George Washington, the Free Mason of Virginia.

A beautiful and inspiring view of George Washington will be gained from his home life at Mount Vernon. As a young man he was one of the handsomest and perhaps the most popular aristocratic gentleman of Virginia. At twenty-seven he married Martha Custis, a very wealthy widow. To her and her two little children, a boy and a girl, he was most devoted. His wife's fortune, added to his own, rendered him one of the wealthiest men in all the land. During seventeen years, of a married life of forty years, the exigencies of public office called him away from Mount Vernon, but wherever he was, if the circumstances permitted, he and his wife entertained great numbers of guests. It has been said of him that he entertained more distinguished foreigners who visited the United States than did any other person, but all were welcome at his table who chose to seek it and to lodge over night or for several nights for that matter. It almost never happened that he and his family sat down to meals without guests. He was the most widely travelled man in those colonies.

His acquaintance with leading personages, and with all types of people, was on a vast scale. So he continued his education, always learning from the very distinguished persons whom he met. At his home he arose at dawn and wrote letters and arranged matters concerning his vast estate during two or three hours; breakfasted at seven o'clock on three hoe cakes, made mostly from Indian maize meal, and drank three cups of tea; then he rode over his plantations during about seven hours or more, paying great attention to his numerous negro slaves (these, by the way, were subsequently freed at his death according to his will), conducting experiments relative to the best seeds and the finest soil. He was a master of every detail; in fact, he was the first really scientific American farmer. His Mount Vernon estate contained about 8,000 acres, including many rich farms, but he possessed also many other large tracts of cultivated land and forest. At three o'clock, having always carefully dressed for the occasion, he met his family and guests at dinner. During an hour following the dinner there was always very pleasant interchange of views and general conversation. When he could conveniently do so he retired from his family and guests at seven in the evening to resume consideration of accounts and plans for his great estates and attend to his personal correspondence, the magnitude of which may be imagined, as there are even now in existence 20,000 letters written by George Washington. His handwriting in a sense illustrates his general poise and consistency in all things as well as his artistic tastes. By nine o'clock he retired for the night.

Almost deified by the people of the United States, who had such abundant opportunity to judge concerning his characteristics, there have been many attempts recently to find in him many faults, but without avail. One is reminded that in ancient Greece statues were sometimes made from marble that contained many flaws. The imperfect marble was chipped out and wax inserted with the appropriate color tone. To the purchaser those statues seemed to be perfect, but ultimately a brilliant sun blazing upon the marble in the garden would melt the wax and the statues in all of their imperfections would stand forth and the great cheat be revealed. In our language we use the term sincere when, as it were, the person or the object is without wax, without flaw. George Washington stands today more gigantic, if possible, than even in his own day and generation—six feet three inches tall, dignified, but very sociable, a genial neighbor and a great fox hunter who kept his own pack of hounds, a typical English country squire, a military leader of no mean reputation, one who impressed upon the Constitution of the United States his own character and who was the first President of the United States.

In 1799, when dying, he said to his physician, "I am not afraid to go." During his life of 67 years he had worked strenuously, had accomplished really very great things. They say of him that he was "first in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen."

To you, the people of Washington, Durham County, I present this great man, descended from the De Wessington or Washington family of this community, as one who in himself embodied the very finest traits of the British blood, one who is honored not only in the United States, but practically everywhere on the globe.

Rev. Cyril Lomax, rector of Washington Parish, spoke briefly about George Washington, as did Mr. Hill, headmaster of the Biddick School, who also proposed a vote of thanks to the American Consul and made reference to the Old Hall, expressing the hope that some way would be found to preserve it from destruction.

Uniformed boys and girls of the Better Britain Brigade led the singing, and the entire audience stood at attention for the national anthems of England and the United States. Subsequently they joined in singing such American favorites as "Swanee River," "Polly Wolly Doodle all the Day," and "John Brown's Body," and some familiar English airs.

EFFORTS TO SAVE WASHINGTON OLD HALL

When it became known that the Old Hall, ancient landmark in the village of Washington, built in 1613 on the site of the Manor House of the de Wessington Family, was threatened with destruction, because it had been judged unfit to be longer used as a tenement residence, wide interest was aroused and a movement was begun to preserve it. The George Washington Bicentennial Celebrations in Washington Village lent great impetus to this movement.

Mr. Doty, American consul at Newcastle, was one of the leaders in the effort to protect and restore the Old Hall. He was the author of a plan to have it converted into a George Washington Memorial Library and Museum.

"My plan," said Mr. Doty, "is to form a library of books concerning George Washington and American history in the Old Hall. It could have a small beginning and be gradually increased afterward. I think such an institution would have great interest to Americans."

At the time this report of the bicentennial observances in Washington, England, is being written no decision has been reached as to the future of the Old Hall, but the hope is expressed in the village that the interest aroused by the celebration will insure success to the movement for the preservation and restoration of the ancient structure.

DURHAM'S WONDER TOWN

"Durham's Wonder Town is Washington" is the title of an article which appeared in the SUNDAY SUN, of Newcastle, on June 26, 1932. Because of its unusual presentation of facts about the ancestral home of the Washington Family and its interesting references to the town's connection with George Washington, the article is here given in full:

In Durham County there is a wonder town that is being managed locally free of all charge on its 17,000 residents.

Yet it does not suffer. It has most of the amenities of a much larger town.

It is not bankrupt.

Its bills are being met as they become due.

Its health services function satisfactorily.

Its streets are cleansed regularly.

Open spaces are maintained.

All the necessary administrative work is done efficiently by a full-time staff.

And it is all free gratis and for nothing.

If Durham County Council did not exist to spend other people's money this township would have no rates to pay.

Its name?

I hesitate to mention such a detail, lest Newcastle, Gates-head, Gosforth, Tynemouth, and Whitley Bay are all deserted overnight in one big mad rush to this little heaven of a colliery town with tree-lined lanes, and roads that one can walk or ride on with comfort.

You are sceptical?

Believe it or not—it's true.

I cannot claim never to have told a lie.

My name is NOT Washington.

But that IS the name of this little wonder town of mine in Durham County.

It swears by George, and it tries always to tell the truth.

If there is such a thing as reincarnation I think George, when he returns to earth, will want to return to the old ancestral home at Washington.

His ancestors fled from this Washington in the bad old days of repression, imposition, and bad government. It was good for America that they went.

Now George could maintain that fine old hall, where his forebears lived, and enjoy the beauties of the countryside for next to nothing. His rates would be small.

He cut down a tree with his little chopper, you remember, then like the good boy he was, went home, found his father reading his Bible, his feet on the drawing room mantelpiece, and said: "Dear dada, I have been naughty." "Again?" queried Washington senior. "Yes, dada," replied little George, "with this little chopper I chopped down a tree."

And, if that old story is true, Washington senior did not lay the lad across his knee as any modern father might do, justifiably, but with tears in his eyes, he said with pride: "My darling George. At any rate you always speak the truth."

I wonder, did the lads of Washington, Durham County, tell the truth at home after they had hurled all the stones that shattered all the windows of the Old Hall, where George's ancestors lived?

I doubt it.

The tenements into which the Old Hall has been turned in recent years must have become draughty places.

Closing orders are being made in respect of them, but the Old Hall will continue to stand.

Since it became tenements it has sheltered nine or ten families. They will have to quit.

Now if the Old Hall goes on the rates, as veterans sometimes do, Washington will no longer be able to claim that it has no local rates. Its repair and maintenance in proper condition will be a costly affair. If it is not scheduled as an ancient monument and taken under the wing of H. M. Office of Works, I believe Washington folks would not object to the Americans stepping into the breach, buying the Old Hall lock, stock and barrel, and either transporting it to the United States or paying for its maintenance where it now stands.

You see, there are four Washingtons—quite a happy family of them. First, I suppose, comes Washington, then Old Washington, New Washington, and Washington Station.

They're all very much alike, but Old Washington is the bonniest of them all.

What you and I and the Washingtons would like, I am sure, is to see the Mayor and Corporation of Washington, U. S. A., pay a ceremonial visit to Washington, Durham County.

They have more in common than most towns that share one name.

If this little Washington had never existed, I suppose that bigger Washington would never have come into being.

I wonder, could the same be said of New York and Philadelphia and a dozen other places in the North Country that share names with greater places across the Atlantic?

Washington has a good deal to be proud of in its past.

It has a good deal to be proud of today, and not least is the vision that its managers possess.

SCHOOLS LEAD IN CELEBRATION

The school children of Washington, England, wear on their caps the Washington crest—an emblem that has close association with the history of the town and bears a striking resemblance to the coat-of-arms of George Washington.

"Even the Urban District Council ambulance van," reports Consul Doty, "bears the crest of Washington on its side and the same appears above the door of the council office. There is great pride in Washington in a sense of ownership to a certain extent, or partnership, in the heroic name and figure of General George Washington."

The Washington public schools took, perhaps, the leading part in the Bicentennial Celebration in that part of England. The celebration had not been under way more than a few days before portraits of George Washington were framed, and permanently fixed to the walls of the following schools and other educational industrial buildings:

Washington Parish Church—(unveiled by the Rector on February 21, 1932.)

Washington Biddick School—Senior Dept.

Washington Biddick School—Junior Dept.

Washington Biddick School—Headmaster's dining-room.

Mr. Hill, headmaster of the Biddick School was the moving force in commemorative events in this school system. At the unveiling of the portraits in each school Mr. Hill delivered a lecture on George Washington, prepared in part from material furnished by the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission.

Mr. Hill is one of the leading antiquarians of northern England and is particularly well known for his research in connection with Washington lore. He has interested himself principally in the Washington Family history in Durham County and has become an authority on the subject.

In addition to devoting a large part of his time to lecturing and research during the Bicentennial Year, Mr. Hill was instrumental in conducting the unveiling of a Washington genealogical tablet in the Washington Parish Church. With appropriate, though simple ceremony the tablet was dedicated during the month of February, 1932. The inscription reads:

GEORGE WASHINGTON, LEADER OF THE FORCES WHICH SECURED INDEPENDENCE FOR THE AMERICAN COLONIES (IN 1776), WAS BORN IN AMERICA ON FEBRUARY 22ND, 1732. HE WAS DESCENDED FROM THE WASHINGTON FAMILY, OF THE VILLAGE OF WASHINGTON, IN THE COUNTY OF DURHAM. THE WASHINGTONS WERE LORDS OF THE MANOR OF WASHINGTON FROM 1183 TO 1400. THEIR COAT-OF-ARMS WAS THREE MULLETTS AND TWO BARS, (COMMONLY CALLED "THREE STARS AND TWO STRIPES"). THESE ARMS ARE CARVED ON THE WEST FRONT OF HILTON CASTLE (LENDING FORCE TO THE TRADITION THAT A BARON HILTON MARRIED A DAUGHTER OF WILLIAM WESSINGTON OF WESSINGTON). ABOUT THE YEAR 1400 THE WASHINGTONS MOVED TO WEST-MORELAND, AND LATER TO LANCASHIRE, WARWICKSHIRE, ETC., TO NORTHAMPTONSHIRE. IT WAS FROM SULGRAVE MANOR, NORTHAMPTON, THAT THERE WENT TO AMERICA, IN 1658, TWO BROTHERS, JOHN AND LAWRENCE: THE GREAT-GRANDSON OF THIS JOHN WAS GEORGE WASHINGTON. THE WASHINGTONS OF WESTMORELAND, WARWICKSHIRE AND NORTHAMPTON, ALL BORE THE SAME COAT-OF-ARMS AS THE ORIGINAL WASHINGTONS OF WASHINGTON, AND GEORGE WASHINGTON'S COAT-OF-ARMS WAS ALSO "THREE STARS AND TWO STRIPES." UNDOUBTEDLY IT WAS IN HONOUR OF THEIR FIRST PRESIDENT THAT THE AMERICANS ADOPTED HIS ARMS AS THE BASIS OF THEIR NATIONAL FLAG.

The tablet was referred to by one Durham County newspaper as "a token of the family connection of the Washingtons with the village and a record that the Bicentenary of George Washington was remembered in Washington, County Durham, as well as in Washington, U. S. A."

SCHOOL CHILDREN EXCHANGE FLAGS

In an official communication of April 26, 1932, to the Department of State Mr. Doty suggested "that there should be an exchange of American for British flags between five schools in Washington, D. C., and a corresponding number of schools in Washington, Durham County, England."

The project was referred by the State Department to the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission with the suggestion that the proposed exchange would be not only of diplomatic value but would enhance the already cordial relations between England and the United States if it were carried out. The Commission and the State Department immediately transmitted the proposal to the Superintendent of Schools of the District of Columbia.

The EVENING STAR, of Washington, D. C., published the following article on August 9, 1932:

Several hundred little hands from the schools of Washington, Durham County, England, are reaching in friendly fashion across the sea to Washington, D. C., children, but they are not getting the traditional hearty handshake for which Americans have become famous.

The little English hands want to wave American flags in honor of the Bicentennial year of the birth of George Washington, whose forebears walked the streets and tilled the lands in the vicinity of Washington, Durham County, England.

And to get those flags, they've offered to exchange an equal number of British flags for the Washington, D. C., school children to wave.

But it seems that Washington, D. C., children are vacationing now, and are thinking of many other things, while the grown-ups in England, the officials at the State Department here and the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission go on thinking the little English children have a swell idea and write reams across the seas about it.

The children of Washington, England, have been celebrating the Bicentennial all year, and have been telling all England what a success the Washington family which founded Washington, England, has made in America. They took their flag idea to William F. Doty, American consul at Newcastle-on-Tyne, who indorsed it heartily in several dispatches to the State Department.

The State Department turned these dispatches over to the Bicentennial Commission and in the meanwhile Frederick Hill, headmaster of Biddick Council Schools, suggested in a letter to the District Commissioners that five small flags be exchanged between the British and American school children.

The idea finally got to the Board of Education, which, in august meeting on June 27, finding school out of session, held the matter one for supervisors or principals of schools to consider, independently of the School Board. And there the matter rests, so far as the schools here are concerned.

But the State Department still thinks it is a good idea, one that will give a large number of Britain's future voters a good impression of the United States, and keeps sending Mr. Doty's dispatches on the subject to the Bicentennial Commission.

And Representative Sol Bloom, director of the Bicentennial Commission, wishes the Board of Education would dig up five small American flags to trade for British ones, so the British school children could better join in the Bicentennial celebration.

GOOD WILL MESSAGES

As an outgrowth of this publicity several interchanges of mutual admiration and respect occurred. Mrs. William H. Pouch, vice president of the Daughters of the American Revolution and chairman of the Approved Schools Committee in New York City, sent the following message to Consul Doty at Newcastle:

Will you extend the love and good wishes of our Northern Mountains to the children of Newcastle-on-Tyne who are so closely allied to them by ties of ancestry and brotherly love.

On behalf of the American's Creed Crusaders, Miss Gabrielle Hurder, the organizer, sent the following message to Consul Doty:

The American's Creed Crusaders are sending you The Creed and will you please present it with their message of love and good will to the children of your city in Newcastle-on-Tyne. This patriotic message is to honor the birthplace of the ancestors of the great Father of America, George Washington. The Crusaders are wishing to reach the hearts of the children so to express to them their love and good will in honor of our great President and to form a true spirit of good friendship and to attain what we desire—peace with the children and the Crusaders of America.

Please present the American's Creed picture to the School, and I hope that in return they will exchange the Union Jack so we will present it to our School in Washington so to form good feelings. I will be very happy to aid in anything that will create good feelings with the children. I have organized the American's Creed Crusaders and I have enrolled many schools in Washington, also in New York. Our President is the Regent of the Continental Chapter of D. A. R. (Daughters of the American Revolution), Miss Helen Stout, Mrs. Magna, the President General, is supporting us, also Mrs. William Pouch, the Chairman on the Approved Schools and Vice President General D. A. R.

The Crusaders are poor children, but rich in their hearts for the love in patriotism. Therefore we are sending you our affectionate message in honor of the Bicentennial of our great teacher, George Washington, and to his forefathers and the city of their birth, we are sending love and gratitude to have given such a great teacher to America. If possible let us have a Flag in return, one from the children in Newcastle-on-Tyne, to be presented to the School of the first group of the American's Creed Crusaders. I am enclosing you the post card of the Creed with our wishes and greetings, also a large American's Creed with the American Flag, and should you wish for any particulars that the Crusaders could give to bring harmony please command us; we are ready to help you for any good cause.

SCHOOL CHILDREN EXCHANGE LETTERS

This suggestion on the part of the American consul for an interchange of flags had yet further developments, as reported by the EVENING STAR, of Washington, D. C., on October 7:

Little Marion Alice Lancaster grew tired of waiting for "that dumb old Board of Education," as she expressed it, to do something about it, so she went ahead with her own plan of swapping letters and exchanging "Old Glories" for "Union Jacks" with the school children of Washington, County Durham, England.

Marion, now 8, who had to be held up on a gun carriage to reach a microphone when she broadcast an essay on George Washington from aboard Old Ironsides last June, got the idea from a story in the STAR last month, she said. The article reported that little hands were reaching forth from the classrooms of the English village in friendly fashion to join with the children of the Capital in celebrating the bicentennial of the birth of George Washington, after whom their little home place was named. But the traditional hearty handshake for which Americans were famous apparently was lacking.

In justice to the Board of Education, let it be said they put the matter up to the supervising principals of the District schools and that, so far as is known, is as far as it went.

Through the United States Bicentennial Commission, United States Consul William F. Doty at Newcastle-on-Tyne, and Headmaster Frederick W. Hill of Biddick School, Washington, England, Marion placed her name in the hands of the school children of the village where George Washington's forbears walked the streets and tilled the lands.

In bold round characters of handwriting typical of English school children, there came replies from Edith Marley, 7, and her chum, Betty Bush, 8. And to Edith, who likes best of all not the traditional American three R's, but readin', writing and "sums," and Betty, whose father "works in Cook's Iron Works," Marion has sent little silken Stars and Stripes, photographs of Washington and Mount Vernon and pencils with monogram, "George Washington Bicentennial."

Marion is now awaiting replies from her youthful correspondents and anxiously anticipating arrival of British souvenirs in the form of the Union Jack. The daughter of Oscar E. Lancaster, patent attorney, Marion lives at 2827 Twenty-eighth street and attends the Oyster School.

UNION JACKS ARE SENT

Consul Doty, on November 28, 1932, wrote to the Bicentennial Commission:

It causes me very great pleasure to forward, with the attached, five silk Union Jacks, measuring two feet by one foot, which have been kindly offered to the school children of Washington, D. C., by the schools of Washington, County Durham, as follows:

Biddick School; the Secondary School; Glebe School; the Colliery School; and the Usworth C. I. School.

To each of the flags was attached a card bearing the following inscription:

With fraternal greetings and goodwill from the scholars of [the name of each of the five schools was given here].

Upon the arrival of the English flags at the offices of the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission, steps were taken, in cooperation with the State Department, to present the flags formally to the children of the Washington, D. C., public schools.

Meantime five American flags had been sent by the public schools of Washington, D. C., to Consul Doty for presentation to the school children of Washington, England. The following message accompanied each of the American flags:

Greetings From Children of the Public Schools of Washington, D. C., United States of America, to the Children of Washington, Durham County, England.

THIS AMERICAN FLAG BRINGS TO YOU A MESSAGE OF GOODWILL ON THE OCCASION OF THE TWO HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE BIRTH OF GEORGE WASHINGTON, WHOSE ANCESTORS CAME FROM ENGLAND, WHOSE SERVICE WAS IN AMERICA, AND WHOSE VIRTUES ARE A COMMON HERITAGE CHERISHED BY BOTH NATIONS.

PRESENTATION IN WASHINGTON, D. C.

Representative pupils, accompanied by parents, teachers and school officers, from Brown School, Takoma School, Morgan School, Emery School, and Ludlow School, of Washington, D. C., assembled on January 20, 1933, at the Franklin Administration Building where they were greeted by Dr. Robert L. Haycock, Assistant Superintendent of Schools for the District of Columbia; Honorable Sol Bloom, Director of the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission; Honorable Horace Lee Washington, United States Consular Service, representing the Department of State; Mr. Donald A. Craig, in charge of the Division of Foreign Participation of the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission; and Mr. Selden M. Ely, Supervising Principal of the Fifth Division, Public Schools of the District of Columbia.

With enthusiasm the children and adults present joined in singing "America" and "God Save the King." Dr. Haycock, who presided at the exercises, told the audience how the exchange-of-flags had been brought about and said that it was the pleasure and privilege of the schools of Washington, D. C., to participate in an event which undoubtedly would contribute to increased American friendship with England—a heritage to be preserved with fidelity by future generations.

BRITISH FLAGS PRESENTED TO SCHOOLS OF WASHINGTON, D. C. FIVE UNION JACKS WERE SENT BY THE SCHOOL CHILDREN OF THE VILLAGE OF WASHINGTON IN DURHAM COUNTY, ENGLAND, THE ANCESTRAL HOME OF THE WASHINGTON FAMILY, TO THE SCHOOL CHILDREN OF THE CAPITAL CITY OF THE UNITED STATES, IN EXCHANGE FOR FIVE AMERICAN FLAGS. The officials in the picture are, left to right: Mr. Horace Lee Washington, of the United States Consular Service, representing the Department of State; Dr. Robert L. Haycock, Assistant Superintendent of Schools for the District of Columbia; and Honorable Sol Bloom, Director of the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission.

Mr. Bloom, who presented the flags to the children of the Washington, D. C., schools on behalf of the schools of Washington, England, made particular reference to the theme of universal brotherhood amongst the youth of the world. He said that the children of England loved the British flag, which he held in his hand at the time, just as much as the school boys and girls of America loved the Stars and Stripes they had sent to England. This is as it should be and as George Washington would have had it, he declared.

Washington believed and taught that all men should stand loyally by the institutions and the laws of their respective governments, so long as the governments dealt justice to all, Mr. Bloom said, and he suggested that American school children should associate with their history lessons the thought that the peace and prosperity of the world depends on universal goodwill.

"This exchange of flags, brought about during the two hundredth anniversary celebration of the birth of George Washington, should be the first step of many to follow," Mr. Bloom continued, "toward a greater mutual appreciation of the ideals and aspirations of the school children of Great Britain and America. If the Bicentennial Celebration has achieved this one object, it will have made the world a better place in which to live."

Presentation of the British flags was made in the following order:

The flag from the Biddick School, Washington, County Durham, England, to the E. V. Brown School, Washington, D. C.; received on behalf of the Brown School by Miles Freeman.

The flag from the Secondary School, Washington, County Durham, England, to the Takoma School, Washington, D. C.; received on behalf of the Takoma School by Donald Tabbot.

The flag from the Glebe School, Washington, County Durham, England, to the Morgan School, Washington, D. C.; received on behalf of the Morgan School by Ruth Lyons.

The flag from the Usworth School, Washington, County Durham, England, to the Emery School of Washington, D. C.; received on behalf of the Emery School by Norman McCeney.

The flag from the Colliery School, Washington, County Durham, England, to the Ludlow School, Washington, D. C.; received on behalf of the Ludlow School by Alice Tydings.

FLAGS PRESENTED IN WASHINGTON, ENGLAND

The final episode in this interchange of messages of goodwill and national flags by British and American schools took place in Washington, County Durham, England, on February 20, 1933. Speaking of the occasion the DAILY JOURNAL, of Newcastle-on-Tyne, February 21, states: "If the atmosphere of Washington, County Durham, last night could radiate all over America and Great Britain there would be no Anglo-American problems to speak of. The occasion was a remarkable gathering. . . ."

The meeting, called for the purpose of presenting five American flags sent by the school children of Washington, D. C., to the scholars of Washington, County Durham, was a semi-invitational affair held in the Miners' Welfare Hall under the chairmanship of Hon. R. Coxon, J.P., chairman of the Washington Urban District Council. Seated on the platform beneath a large portrait of George Washington, in addition to one boy and one girl elected from each of five Durham County schools, were the American Consul for North England, Hon. Paul C. Squire and Mrs. Squire; Mr. Merlin C. Smith, American Vice-Consul; G. Stirling Newall, D.L., J.P. and Mrs. Newall; His Worship the Mayor of Durham, and Mrs. Wilkinson; Mr. J. J. Lawson, M.P., and Mrs. Lawson; Reverends D. Verling, W. H. Hanby, F. Wilson, F. Duffy, B. Haddon; Miss M. C. Forrester, representing Consul W. F. Doty; Alderman William Smith, M.A., J.P., chairman of Durham County Council, and Mrs. Smith; M. H. Kellett, Esq. and Mrs. Kellett; M. M. Handy, C.C.; Mr. George Washington Scott and Mr. and Mrs. Ward Buchanan. The large audience included many more leading personages of the community.

His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, upon hearing of the contemplated presentation ceremonies, sent a message to the authorities in Washington, County Durham, expressing the hope "that this auspicious ceremony will be a most successful one."

The Bishop of Durham wrote:

I am very much interested in the interchange of National Flags between the children of Washington in the County of Durham and the children of Washington in America. There is no factor more important for the peace and prosperity of mankind than thoroughly good relations between the members of the English-speaking family gathered in the two camps of the British Empire and the United States of America. The hope of the future lies with the children of both countries, and it is wise and right that they should draw together in friendship and thus qualify themselves for becoming the champions and guardians of peace in the years to come.

Councillor Coxon expressed the hope that the gesture of comradeship would play a part, not only in sustaining the tranquil relations between Great Britain and the United States, but in creating, through example, a desire for peace and friendship among all the nations of the world. He introduced Mr. Hill as one of the two men mainly responsible for the event, the other being Mr. Doty, who until recently had been the American Consul at Newcastle-on-Tyne.

EVENTS SURVEYED BY MR. HILL

Mr. Hill surveyed the events leading up to the interchange of flags and greetings between the children of the two Washingtons and said that the scholars had entered into the spirit of the series of events with an earnest desire to foster goodwill and not merely because of the adventure of the thing. He declared that the impressions made in the minds and hearts of the children as a result of the various episodes connected with the interchange of flags and greetings will remain with them throughout life, prompting them to deal honorably with their friends across the seas.

The American Consul, Mr. Squire, expressed the appreciation of his country, gave a resume of Washington's life and presented the flags to the school children amidst great enthusiasm. His address follows:

Mr. Chairman, Mr. Hill, Ladies and Gentlemen, Children: When I studied history as a school-boy, I often wondered whether a usurper could ever feel really comfortable upon his throne. I never did think though that I would ever be a usurper in any sense. Call me what you choose however, I do feel that I would be much happier if my worthy predecessor Consul Doty, institutor of this exchange of goodwill, were present this evening to hand over, in his excellent manner, the tokens of that American friendship to which he has shown us the way. I am glad that Mr. Doty's daughter is here to represent my colleague and his family.

While regretting that this rare privilege does not fall to Consul Doty, now retired, I rejoice that Headmaster Hill, who through his outstanding success as an antiquarian, has blossomed forth into a diplomat of consequence on both sides of the Atlantic, is to present some of the fruits of his worthy labours.

I shall not give at length George Washington's life history. Suppose I trace this illustrious Anglo-Saxon through the usual ages of man. Born in Westmoreland County, Virginia, in 1732, the son of a planter, I expect he was in infancy not so much different from the rest of us "mewling . . . in his nurse's arms." We have never been told that he could tell a single lie, but we had better not give much credence to the story of the hatchet and cherry tree.

Then schoolboy: Washington's education was only elementary, except in mathematics, in which he was largely self-taught and which helped him become a good surveyor. He did acquire eventually however a dignified and effective English style. At the age of 15 Washington left school and the next year was appointed surveyor of the Lord Fairfax property, an appointment as public surveyor having soon followed. Even in these youthful days George impressed others with his force of mind and character.

The Governor of Virginia must have shared this opinion, for at the age of twenty-one he chose him to warn the French away from their new posts on the Ohio River, which was accomplished in winter under great hardships and danger. Shortly after his return, George was appointed Lieutenant Colonel of a Virginia Regiment.

Then followed struggles against the French and Indians. In General Braddock's calamitous defeat, Washington showed for the first time that fiery energy which always lay hidden beneath his calm and unruffled exterior, a characteristic I have observed in more than one Englishman. After his return, having saved the expedition from annihilation, Washington was commissioned Commander of the Virginia forces at the age of 23. The war in Virginia finally coming to an end, Washington resigned his commission.

Next the lover: for at the age of 27 Washington married a widow, Mrs. Martha Dandridge Custis, a union which unfortunately proved childless. For the next 15 years Washington's life was that of a typical Virginia planter of the more prosperous type, a large slave holder, a strict but considerate master, and a widely trusted man of affairs. Washington was repeatedly elected to the House of Burgesses. We may note, however, that up to this time there were no marked indications of "greatness." As in the case of President Abraham Lincoln, Washington was educated into greatness by the increasing weight of his responsibilities and the manner in which he met them.

In the dispute of the Colonists with the Mother Country which followed Washington considered first the best means of peaceable resistance, and he did not ally himself with the party of independence until the course of events made the adoption of any other course impossible. Washington was unanimously selected commander-in-chief of the armed forces of the United Colonies. Refusing any salary and asking only reimbursement of his expenses he accepted while declaring that he did not believe himself equal to the command and that he accepted it only as a duty made imperative by the unanimity of the call. In fact, he was constantly the most determined skeptic as to his fitness for the positions to which he was successively called. Never do we find him "sudden and quick in quarrel, seeking the bubble reputation even in the canon's mouth."

It was a most pathetic struggle, the War for Independence, that followed. It is not easy to see how Washington survived the year 1775: the Colonial poverty, the exasperating annoyances, the bitter criticism of those who demanded active operations, the personal and party dissensions in Congress, the selfishness or stupidity which cropped out among some of the most patriotic of his assistants, were enough to have broken down most men. They completed his training.

"And then the justice . . . full of wise saws."

Independence was finally gained in 1781. By this time the popular canonization of Washington had fairly begun. "The Father of his Country" occupied a position in American public life and in the American political system which no man could possibly hold again. The knowledge that Washington favoured anything superseded, with very many men, both argument and the necessity of information, with the dearth of newspapers at that epoch.

The unanimous vote of the electors made him first President of the United States; their unanimous vote elected him for a second term; and even after he had positively refused to serve a third term, two electors voted for him. Not a political partisan, Washington held the two natural parties apart, and prevented party contest, until the Government had become too firmly established to be shaken by them.

Retiring from the Presidency in 1797, having previously issued a notable "Farewell Address" to the American people, the advice contained in which has ever exercised a profound influence in the policy of the Nation, Washington resumed plantation life at Mount Vernon though he maintained a wide range of correspondence. He had resolved some time before never to obtain another slave and "wished from his soul" that Virginia could be persuaded to abolish slavery. "It might prevent much future mischief."

Death overtook Washington, before his time, at the age of 67. Never do we behold him attaining even Shakespeare's sixth age which "shifts into the lean and slipper'd pantaloons." The great man was struck down by sudden illness lasting but a day . . . an affection of the wind-pipe, contracted by exposure during a long ride in a snowstorm, and aggravated by such contemporary remedies as bleeding and gargles of molasses, vinegar, and butter. He died as simply as he had lived; his last words were only business directions, affectionate remembrances to relatives, and repeated apologies to the physicians and attendants for the trouble he was giving them. His will contained a provision freeing his slaves.

Five days after his death we find a resolution in the House of Representatives which states precisely, if somewhat rhetorically, the position of George Washington in American history: "First in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen."

It is but natural that I see in this evening's occasion its international aspect . . . the opportunity which it gives us Americans to thank the Mother Country for her countless blessings; to take cognizance of the deep-rooted friendship between the two countries, of the irresistible call of the blood identified with 120 years of peace.

Now America, as compared with the Old World, is not rich in its own traditions. Our traditions of language, literature, and jurisprudence are those of England who bequeathed us these rich legacies. But it was the blood of your own forebears, reared upon the very ground over which I stand, which gave to America "The Father of his Country." The qualities and virtues, the good blood, which this precious soil was able to produce were transmitted to the great Washington . . . and we of America know, dear friends, how to cherish and revere this fountainhead of America's greatest tradition—which must, above all, be preserved in the interest of the perpetuation of Anglo-American amity!

We are here this evening to return the warm handclasp across the sea of the school children of Washington, Durham County. What an added joy and satisfaction that it is the coming generation which speaks—the generation which is soon to guide our destinies and which is prepared to carry the banner of friendship that much longer into futurity.

When I had the pleasure of visiting Biddick School, I was impressed beyond expression by the honours given to George Washington and to American History. There came home to me: the precious Anglo-American good will which Headmaster Hill has fostered in this community and the Utopia which the two countries might enjoy were a similar situation to be achieved in every seat of learning. The more HILLS on earth, shall I say, the fewer HELLS on earth might we have to reckon with!

I plead for more attentiveness to the numerous things Britons and Americans have in common. Only the other day my wife and I returning home in the tram remarked: "How natural it seems to be here in Newcastle. The people around us seem just like those at home in New England; some of them could well be our relatives. After all, we came from these good folk, didn't we?"

So how stupid it is to go about looking for petty dissimilarities . . . trite variations that might exist within the borders of the same country. What difference does it make if you call it a bowler and we call it a derby. If you say clark, and I tell you all my loyal clerks are here this evening. Does not a Liverpool man call it a berth and North Country folk a staith?

What difference, tell me, as long as his heart is in the right place and he clasps your hand in friendship!

But I am here to present flags, you will tell me. Before handing over these pledges of American good will, let me remind that the Flag is an emblem of much significance to any American giver. You are aware that Administrations come and go in the United States, the maximum term of a President being limited by the very precedent of Washington just cited to eight years.

In other words, we have not that permanence of sovereignty, as enjoyed by you in the permanence of the beloved Royal Family, except through the Flag. That may be the reason why we have developed strict rules governing the use of the Flag. For example it may be displayed only from sunrise to sunset; it may never be used to cover the speaker's desk or to drape over the front of the platform. It must never touch the ground or trail in water; it must never be lowered into the grave. It must never be draped over any vehicle. No lettering of any kind is permitted on the Flag.

When we wish to make festoons or rosettes, we must employ blue, white, and red bunting.

I just mention some of these points in anticipation of the meaning of a Flag presentation to the children over yonder, who are offering something very sacred to them.

From the school children of Washington, D. C., the Nation's Capital—those very ones who are so happy in the possession of their Union Jacks—it is my privilege to present, coupled with best comradeship and love, to the school children of Washington, Durham County, these five American Flags.

The following children received the flags from the American consul: Kenneth Luke, Kathleen Baker, Washington Secondary School; Arthur Naylor, Gladys Scurfield, Usworth School; Sarah Savage, Harry Bates, Glebe School; Ina Davison, Maldwyn Pearson, Colliery School; Nancy Anderson, Arthur Lee, Biddick School.

An attractive souvenir program was issued for the occasion which contained, in addition to the outline of events, a brief record of Washington family genealogy with respect to Durham County, descriptions of Washington family heraldry and relics in the vicinity, gilded reproductions of the family coat of arms, the greetings from the Prince of Wales and the Lord Bishop of Durham, and the national hymns of the two countries, which were sung in unison by the audience following the vote of thanks.

"GEORGE WASHINGTON DESERVED IT ALL"

Under the title, "The Washington Bicentenary" an article by John Oxberry appeared in Heslop's LOCAL ADVERTISER AND MONTHLY RECORD, of Felling, Durham County, on March 11, 1932, summarizing the bicentennial activities in that part of England during the early part of that year. "And George Washington deserved it all," wrote Mr. Oxberry, referring to the celebrations in his honor. The article follows:

It cannot be complained that the people of this district have failed to pay attention to the bicentenary of America's first President, General George Washington. The newspapers remembered it, and on Sunday, February 28th, at the Stoll Theatre in Newcastle, from a platform graced by the presence of the civic authorities in the persons of the Lord Mayor and the Sheriff and with the United States Consul seated beside them as the representative of trans-Atlantic admirers, the Rev. Herbert Barnes delivered an appreciative oration, eloquently and clearly phrased, to the memory of the father of the Republic. Two nights later, this lecture Mr. Barnes repeated by request of his own church in New Bridge Street. And very appropriately, as those of us think who are persuaded that the association between the Virginia family of Washington and the Durham village of Washington is a real and not a mythical one, a sermon was preached on the Sunday in the village church by the rector of the parish, the Rev. C. Lomax, in honour of the great Virginian.

And George Washington deserved it all, for, as Mr. Barnes said, in revolutionary times he was no revolutionist. Circumstances prevented him from signing, as so many of his fellow leaders signed, the so-called "Olive Branch Petition," but we know he was in sympathy with its sentiments and would have welcomed, eagerly welcomed if my reading of history is correct, any reasonable measure of self-government that would have healed the breach between the colonies and the home country.

A WAR FOR BRITISH LIBERTY

Nothing struck me more when I was in Philadelphia than the essentially British character of the agitation that eventually brought about separation. Externally and internally the building—Independence Hall—in which the leaders met to sign the Declaration of Independence, was reminiscent of England of the eighteenth century. The names of the men who met there were British, the ideals which brought them together for the purpose were the same ideals as had actuated their ancestors in their opposition to the despotism of the Stuarts in the previous century. Apart from George the Third and his supporters, who are known as “the King’s friends,” but are better described, perhaps, as the Empire’s enemies, the people of England were mostly sympathetic towards the struggle of their fellow subjects in America. Contemporary Newcastle newspapers confirm this assertion to the full. Robertson the historian, writing while the fighting was still going on, spoke of it not as a revolution but as a civil war—a war, that is to say, between two sections of the same people. And so the majority of the inhabitants of Newcastle regarded it.

When the government proclamation was read in the market place and elsewhere in the town declaring “the Americans now in arms and all their aiders and abettors” to be rebels, the proclamation, we are told in a report of the proceedings, was heard by the populace “with silent horror,” and the Mayor of the period won immense popularity because he refused to sign a petition in favour of coercive measures being adopted against the Americans. This sort of thing is not told you by those who are afraid of the political blindness of our forefathers being forgotten. But Newcastle’s viewpoint was not by any means rare.

HERALDRY’S LESSON

As not infrequently happens, I have allowed my pen to carry me further than I had intended to go, and in a direction I had hardly intended to take when I began to speak of the Washington Bicentenary. To me as a native of the county of Durham, who was born not very far away from the village of Washington and who has maintained since boyhood, at least, a nodding acquaintance with it, one of the chief objects I had in view in carefully watching all the recently published matter that came my way concerning George Washington, was to see if there was to be found in it any new data that threw additional light on the connection of the family he belonged to with the Durham village whose name he bore. In this I have been disappointed.

The missing genealogical link has not been forthcoming, but heraldically, as I pointed out in an article which appeared in the NEWCASTLE JOURNAL in June, 1925, there can be little doubt that the more remote ancestry of George Washington were the de Wessingtons, or Washingtons as they began later to be called, of the County of Durham. This was the opinion, I then said, of one of the ablest of our North-country antiquaries and his opinion was confirmed by one of the leading local authorities on heraldry, Mr. C. H. Hunter Blair, who, alluding to a de Wessington seal of 1376, an illustration of which he gave, cited it as “the earliest example of the arms of Washington from which derive the ‘stars and stripes’ of the United States.” Later investigation, however, has brought to light a still earlier example of a similar de Wessington seal dated 1349, which, like the seal that was used by General Washington himself, bore, as the heralds put it, “two bars in the chief three molets,” or as the ordinary man might describe it, “two horizontal stripes with three stars above them.”

THE EVOLUTION OF A FLAG

These arms, whose appearance will be more readily grasped from the accompanying illustration than from any verbal description are, as I pointed out in the article referred to, carved upon the front of Hylton Castle and indicate a marriage connection between the families of Hylton and Washington. At Sulgrave Manor, in Northamptonshire, “which was erected in the latter part of the Sixteenth Century by a mayor of Northampton from whom George Washington is directly descended, the same arms are to be seen: while away across the Atlantic on the pulpit, font and entrance door of the Washington Memorial Chapel, at Valley Forge, in Pennsylvania, they are likewise to be traced.”

After a reference to a visit I had paid to the humble home of Betsy Ross, in Arch Street, Philadelphia, the birthplace of “Old Glory,” as the American flag is often called by those who love it, I concluded by saying that “if ‘Old Glory’ was designed and made in the city of Philadelphia the germ of the idea of the design it embodies is traceable to the coat-of-arms borne by the knightly family whose home in the Middle Ages of England’s history was at Washington, in the county of Durham.” With these things in mind, it is not surprising if we in this district have displayed rather more interest, perhaps, than some of the inhabitants of other parts of England, in the bicentenary celebrations of the birth of George Washington.

A MEMORIAL TABLET

Since writing the above I have learnt that a tablet designed by Mr. Frederick Hill, author of The History of Washington Parish Church, has been unveiled in the church as a token of the family connection of the Washingtons with the village and as a record that the bicentenary of George Washington was remembered in Washington, county Durham, as well as in Washington, U. S. A. I know that Mr. Hill has been working assiduously for many years at the task of gathering material to illustrate and elucidate the past life of the village of Washington from times remote to times more recent.

One volume of his collected matter, the history just alluded to, has already appeared. This is a carefully drawn up and well documented compilation, at once useful and interesting to all who care for local history. As the author of it is an experienced research worker we may rest assured that in making himself responsible for the provision of a tablet to commemorate the association of family with village he is well satisfied of the existence of the missing genealogical link of which I spoke as still missing in one of the above paragraphs. I heartily congratulate him on the discovery. Seventy years ago it was presumed to exist.

There were many who believed then and many more who have believed since that the link existed if it could be found. It is gratifying to learn that the long sought for proof has been discovered at last.

PILGRIMAGE TO WARTON

“A unique commemorative event was held in Lancashire, England, on the Fourth of July, 1932, in furtherance of the plan for a sustained celebration from February 22 until Thanksgiving Day, in honor of the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington,” wrote Alfred R. Thompson, American Consul in Manchester, England.

“American residents of Lancashire and Yorkshire, led by the consular officers at Liverpool, Manchester, and Bradford, joined in a pilgrimage to the Parish Church at Warton-in-Lonsdale, Lancashire, to place American and British flags on the coat-of-arms of the Washington Family, which appears on the tower of the church, and also to place a wreath on the grave of the late Reverend Thomas Washington, vicar of the church, who died in 1823."

From Consul Thompson's official dispatch to the Department of State and from an article contributed to the AMERICAN FOREIGN SERVICE JOUR-

WASHINGTON CREST DECORATED. AMERICAN CONSUL CLEMENT S. EDWARDS IS SHOWN PLACING AN AMERICAN AND A BRITISH FLAG OVER THE CREST ON THE PARISH CHURCH AT WARTON, ENGLAND.

NAL by Corabelle A. Holland, the wife of Mr. Philip Holland, United States Consul General in England, the following record of the pilgrimage and the historical background of Warton is taken:

The Fourth of July Pilgrimage was a great success. A special bus left the Consulate at Liverpool at 9 a. m., passed through the picturesque country surrounding the historic town of Lancaster, and brought many of the pilgrims to Warton Church at noon; while Americans from other cities made the journey by railway and private automobiles. The pilgrims were welcomed by the Reverend E. W. A. Ogilvy, who conducted them through the church and churchyard, pointing out the various relics of the ancient Warton family of Washington.

American Consul General Philip Holland, from Liverpool, performed the ceremony of placing the wreath and small American and British flags on the Washington grave.

A tombstone under the east window of the church records the resting place of the last of the Washington's of Warton. This stone commemorates Mrs. Elizabeth Washington, who died in 1751, and the Reverend Thomas Washington, vicar of Warton from 1799 until his death in 1823. The first part of the inscription on the plain rectangular sandstone is cut in large straggling letters: "Mrs. Elizabeth Washington, June the 15th, 1751," and the present vicar of the church believes that the Reverend Thomas Washington himself may have performed the engraving because it resembles his handwriting, a specimen of which can be seen in one of the old Warton church registers.

Captain Clement S. Edwards, Spanish-American War Veteran and American Consul at Bradford, England, placed American and British flags over the most ancient existing structural representation of General George Washington's coat-of-arms.

THE WASHINGTON HOUSE

Walking up the village street from the church, one approaches a plain two-storied house built after the style which Americans call Colonial. This house is called the Washington House. It is built of grey stone, and between the second-story windows are two dated stones, probably belonging originally to an earlier building, as in Lancashire, in the country and villages, it is customary to utilize older dated stones when a new house is being put up.

The stone on the right bears the Tudor rose and the crown above, the initials "I.R.," and the date, 1612; and below this, the letters "R.W.S." The "I.R." denotes James Rex, and the initials below are those of Robert Washington and his wife.

The shield on the church tower is thought to be the oldest representation of the Washington coat of arms which has come down to us except in documents, and Robert Washington who built the tower, and who died in 1483, is unquestionably the direct ancestor of the First President of the United States.

The coat-of-arms is on the side of the church steeple, about seven feet from the ground. For many years the shield remained hidden, as the outside of the church was covered with a rough cast of pebbles and lime, but in the year 1885 some of this pebble-dash fell off exposing to view the long lost Washington coat-of-arms. A glass covering now protects the relic from further decay occasioned by atmospheric changes. The shield is very much worn, but the three mullets at the top (i. e. in chief, in heraldic terms) can easily be distinguished. They have only four points, though there should be five. The two bars, below are cut into the stone, not left in relief; and in the center of the shield between the two bars, there appears to be a semi-circular depression caused by the ravages of time. It was formerly a crescent which now, by the wearing of the stone, has become merged into the lower bar. The shield is 9½ inches in length and 7 inches in width.

This stone memorial of the 15th century has been described at some length because it is believed to be the most ancient structural representation of the coat-of-arms of the Washington family. Furthermore, it was the insignia of the builder of Warton Church Tower, Robert Washington, who died in 1483, and who was the tenth direct Washington ancestor of the First President of the United States.

In his address to the pilgrims assembled at the Fourth of July luncheon at Warton, Consul General Holland pointed out that the colonial ancestors of George Washington were too busy hewing timber and defending themselves from the Indians to give much thought to their remote ancestors who lived in England prior to 1483 and that President Washington himself wrote when about sixty years of age:

I have often heard others of the family, older than myself, say, that our ancestor, who first settled in this country, came from one of the northern counties of England; but whether from Lancashire, Yorkshire, or one still more northerly, I do not precisely remember.

ANCESTRY OF WASHINGTON

The apparent unconcern as to his ancestry on the part of the Father of Our Country is not shared by all of the 120,000,000 children comprising his metaphorical family, and those wishing to study deeply into the pedigree of the First President will be interested in reading not only the book by T. Pape, B.A., "Warton and George Washington's Ancestors" but also the chapter on Warton Church by William O. Roper in the volume entitled "Transactions of Lancashire and Cheshire Antiquarian Society, 1890."

The Washington family flourished in Warton during the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, though before this time the ancient family of Washington, or Wessington as it was sometimes written, had been settled in Durham. In early Norman times (1183), the manor of Washington was in the possession of one William de Hertburn, who became William de Wessington. This earliest known member of the family took this name from his new manor in Durham, now the town of Washington.

From Durham, one branch of the Washingtons appears to have gone into Westmoreland, where Robert de Washington, who was the Lord of Millburne, came into possession of lands in Carnforth through his wife. This was in 1292, during the reign of Edward the First. The third son of this Lord of Millburne, who was also named Robert, was a devoted follower of Thomas, Earl of Lancaster, whose power for seven years was supreme during the feeble reign of Edward the Second.

His second son, John Washington (the Wessington had definitely disappeared by this time) was the first of the family to settle in Warton in the County of Lancaster. He married Alianora, the daughter and heir of John de Warton, and both were living in 1386, as mention is made of them in the will of William de Lancaster. The grandson, or more likely great-grandson, of John Washington was the Robert Washington who caused the square tower of the Warton Church to be built and who placed his coat-of-arms beside the great door.

Robert Washington left no will at the time of his death in 1483, but an inquiry showed that he possessed certain lands near Warton, and among his possessions Greenlands Farm has been pointed out as the oldest Washington property. It is part of the tiny village of Tewitfield, so called from the local name given to the green plover. His eldest son, John, succeeded to the possessions in Warton, and Robert, his second son, received Tewitfield. Robert's son, John, inherited the farm and was probably the last of the family to hold Tewitfield.

MADE FORTUNATE MARRIAGE

Like many members of the family, John Washington made a fortunate marriage; he married Margaret Kitson, the sister of Sir Thomas Kitson of Warton Hall, who was sheriff of London in 1533. Sir Thomas built Hengrave Hall in Suffolk, and here, in the great banqueting hall, the arms of the noble families allied by marriage to the Kitsons were emblazoned in the stained glass of the deep bay windows. There are nine of these, the last being that of the Washingtons.

The marriage of John Washington and Margaret Kitson occurred during a stirring period in England's economic history. Henry VIII was dividing his energies between his ambition to build up a great wool trade with the Continent and his desire to possess himself of the vast wealth and properties of the Church.

The new Sheriff of London was one of that eager company of merchant adventurers who made of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries as picturesque and heroic an epoch as that of the Golden Fleece, or the Trojan War.

He persuaded his brother-in-law, John Washington, to turn his attention to the rapidly growing wool trade in the Midlands, and this venture added considerably to the family fortunes. His son, Lawrence, was entered at Gray's Inn, London, to take up the profession of law, and married into the Pargiter family, who were connected, through marriage, with the powerful Spencers of that day.

Lord Spencer had a seat in the County of Northampton, and thither Lawrence Washington and his wife, Amee Pargiter, removed from London. He was twice Mayor of Northampton—in 1532 and again in 1545—and upon the dissolution of the monasteries in 1539 he came into possession of Sulgrave Manor, in the southern part of the county.

Immediately following the breaking up of monastic life in England, when so much of church property became private holdings, the belief that the new owners of the confiscated church lands and buildings could not prosper was widespread; and in the case of the Washingtons of Sulgrave Manor the superstition was apparently proved by the fact that their occupation did not continue throughout two generations.

Lawrence Washington, indeed, enjoyed his possession for 45 years, but his son Robert, and his grandson Lawrence, sold Sulgrave early in the seventeenth century.

BROTHERS EMIGRATED

About the year 1659, two brothers, named John and Lawrence Washington, emigrated to the American colonies, and for many years it was assumed that these were the sons of the Mayor of Northampton, as mentioned in the visitation of Northamptonshire in 1618; but it was later proved that this was impossible. It is now believed that the John Washington who emigrated with his brother, Lawrence, was the son of Lawrence, rector of Purleigh, who was a son of the above Lawrence, the grandson of the Mayor of Northampton.

There is a small pamphlet in the British Museum entitled "A Summary of the Evidence that Lawrence Washington, M.A., Rector of Purleigh 1633-1643, was great-great-grandfather of Gen. George Washington, and Father of the First Washington Who Emigrated to Virginia."

In this pamphlet it is proved from various Washington family wills of 1675 and 1676 that the wife of the rector of Purleigh was named Amphillis; that their family consisted of three sons and three daughters, namely, John, Lawrence, William, Elizabeth, Margaret, and Martha; and that their eldest son, John, emigrated to Virginia.

John Washington, of Virginia, was twice married; his second wife, whose maiden name was Anne Pope, was the widow of Walter Broadhurst, a planter who had gone out from Shropshire. Their son was named Lawrence, after his grandfather in England, but he bestowed upon his son a name new in the annals of the Washington family—that of Augustine. Augustine, the second Washington of the line born in Virginia, married Mary, the young daughter of Colonel Ball. He died leaving a young son, but Mary Ball Washington lived to see her son lead his devoted followers to victory in a new country, and to set up the standard of a new Republic, the vast confines of which should stretch from the Atlantic to the Pacific; and whose citizens should carry English speech, English law, and English blood across the wilderness of a new continent.

The party of Americans who journeyed to the village of Warton on July 4, 1932, paid tribute to the memory of those Durham men whose ambition and energy carried them beyond their old boundaries into Westmoreland and to Lancashire; and on through Northamptonshire and out across the seas to unknown lands where their compatriots had carried, and planted on new soil, the rich heritage of Anglo-Saxon civilization.

BUST PRESENTED TO CANNON SOLLOWAY

Washington Family genealogy is the hobby of Cannon J. Solloway, Vicar of Selby Abbey, in Selby, Yorkshire, England, and he is recognized as one of the leading authorities on this subject. He manifested great interest in the George Washington Bicentennial, displaying American flags on the "Washington window" of the old abbey in 1931. Learning of this Dr. Albert Bushnell Hart, Historian of the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission, visited Cannon Solloway during a journey to England that year and presented to him a reproduction of the famous Houdon bust of George Washington.

Several English newspapers reported the presentation, which occurred on September 17, 1931. In acknowledging the gift Cannon Solloway said:

I beg to offer my very grateful thanks for the honors conferred on me by the Commission. . . . The work that I have done in connection with the Washington genealogy has been a great joy to me for the past 18 years, and I am hoping that my work on the "English Washingtons," the mss. of which has been in the hands of Professor Hart for about three years, will be published by some means or other. . . . President Washington has always been one of my personal heroes from my earliest years and the presence in my study of this delightful representation of him will always mean inspiration and uplift for men.

NORTHAMPTON MAYOR SENDS MESSAGE

In a Washington Bicentennial message to the President of the United States, Hon. Charles R. Scott, Mayor of the County Borough of Northampton, England, epitomized the spirit of brotherhood that exists between his countrymen and the citizens of the United States:

His Excellency,

The President of the United States of America,
Washington, D. C.

The Mayor, Aldermen and Burgesses of the County Borough of Northampton, England, have noted with pleasure that the people of the United States of America are this year celebrating the Bicentenary, on February 22nd, 1932, of the birth of George Washington, the Generalissimo of the Revolutionary Forces, who achieved the Independence of the thirteen colonial States in 1783 and became the First President of the new Republic. They have gloried in the fact that General George Washington was the direct descendant of a former Mayor of their ancient Borough—Lawrence Washington, Mayor in 1532-3 and 1545-6, and that his mother, Mary Ball, was a descendant of the family of the Rev. Thomas Ball, a Puritan vicar of All Saints, Northampton's civic church in 1629-1639; and that he was, therefore, in a sense, doubly a son of Northampton, Old England. They have regarded with pride the growth and development of the United States of America from the original thirteen States, to something like fifty States and Territories with an area extending over half a continent—a government based upon the immortal doctrines of the Declaration of Independence, which pledged a people to the maintenance of the principles of human liberty—to use Abraham Lincoln's famous words "To the government of the people by the people for the people."

Whilst Mayor Lawrence Washington spent his closing years at the Manor House, Sulgrave, Northamptonshire—now the center and symbol of Anglo-American friendship—his grandson, another Lawrence, found his last resting place in the sanctuary of the church of St. Mary, Great Brington—the parish church of the noble House of Spencer, into which a relative of Washington's had married—within a half-a-dozen miles of Northampton. Another Lawrence, the fifth son of the historic worthy of St. Mary's Church, afterwards a Fellow of Brasenose College, Oxford, and Rector of Pur-leigh, Essex, married a Northamptonshire lass, Amphilis Twigden, daughter of a yeoman of Spratton, a village in that County, seven miles from Northampton. Their two sons, John and Lawrence Washington, about 1656, emigrated to Virginia. It was John who formed the line, through which Providence designed that "the Saviour of his Country" should be born. His descendant Augustine, through Mary Ball, a daughter of old Northampton, became the father of George Washington, the celebration of the Bicentennial of whose birth we rejoice to have the opportunity of sharing with the President and People of the United States. There are other associations of the Washingtons with Northamptonshire and the neighbouring counties which intensify the interest which we feel in this auspicious event.

There are many other links between Northamptonshire and the United States of America which are a source of gratification to our people. We remember with pride that Benjamin Franklin, the statesman and philosopher, who was one of the prime movers in the American Revolution, sprang from a yeoman family that had been settled for 400 years at Ecton, five miles from Northampton. There is a strong belief that the third and fifth American President of the United States originally sprang from a family in Puritan times connected with the village of Flore, seven miles from Northampton. General Garfield, another President, traced his descent from a family at Cold Ashby, a dozen miles from Northampton. One of America's greatest poets, the beauty of whose verse has found myriads of delighted readers wherever the English tongue is spoken—

"Who speak the tongue

That Shakespeare spake: the faith and morals hold which Milton held."

—Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, we are glad to recognise came, on his mother's side, from the Wadsworths of Long Buckby, within eleven miles of Northampton.

You will understand from these brief notes—and the ties that bind the United States of America to the old country could be multiplied indefinitely—that whilst we are loyal to the Union Jack we have an especially strong affection for the Stars and Stripes, "Old Glory," which is understood to have found its inspiration from the Stars and Bars of the Washington Arms—although the Raven of the Crest (indication of Scandinavian origin) has found a more ambitious substitute in the Spread Eagle, whose eyes can face the glory of the Sun without flinching or blinking. We are proud of the children of the old country who, in establishing the United States of America, founded the greatest Republic in the world's history. We pray that our two peoples may ever be found working side by side, with no rivalry except that of a desire and determination to cooperate in every movement for the promotion of the world's peace, and a spirit of international brotherhood.

Given under the Common Seal of the said Mayor, Aldermen and Burgesses of the County Borough of Northampton, in the presence of

CHARLES J. SCOTT,
Mayor.

W. R. KEW, (SEAL)
Town Clerk.

10 February, 1932.

P. S. The Mayor, it is interesting to know, is a boy of the old Northampton Grammar school of which Mayor Lawrence Washington was one of the original trustees.

CEREMONY AT SULGRAVE MANOR

"A happy pilgrimage," was a phrase used by the American Ambassador, Andrew W. Mellon, in describing the George Washington Bicentennial Celebration at Sulgrave Manor on July 14, 1932. Led by the American Ambassador, Americans from all over the British Isles participated in the pilgrimage. They were joined by eminent Englishmen, including Lord and Lady Lee of Fareham, Lord Spencer, Sir Reginald Blomfield, Sir Robert Donald, Lady Herbert, the Dowager Lady Harcourt, Sir Thomas Fermor-Hesketh, Lady Beit, the Mayor of Northampton, the Mayor of Banbury, and the Mayor of Brackley.

The American Women's Club, the National Society of Colonial Dames, the English-Speaking Union, and the Daughters of the American Revolution arranged the pilgrimage, which was authorized by the Board of Governors of the Sulgrave Manor.

Sulgrave Manor is the early English home of the ancestors of George Washington; but not their only English home, for they were a widely-scattered family, associated at different times and through various branches with a number of English counties. But Sulgrave Manor, in Northamptonshire, has come to be recognized, in a very special way, as the historic Washington home, and as a shrine for patriotic Americans and English friends of America to visit. Lawrence Washington, twice Mayor of Northampton, received the property as a grant from King Henry VIII in 1539, on the dissolution of the smaller religious houses. It had previously belonged to the Priory of St. Andrew, Northampton. Lawrence Washington, from whom George Washington was seventh in direct descent, and his children and descendants lived in the Manor House until 1659, though it ceased to be the property of George Washington's direct ancestors in 1610. This period covered the whole life of Shakespeare, whose home at Stratford-on-Avon was only about thirty miles away. It is interesting to note that the first permanent English Settlement on American soil in 1607, at Jamestown in Virginia, was made whilst the Washingtons were still in residence at Sulgrave Manor.

BACK TO HENRY VIII

The place, therefore, carries the history of the Washington family back to the days of Henry VIII and the English Reformation, and antedates Mount Vernon, George Washington's home in Virginia, by two hundred years. It reminds us that the Wash-ingtons were of good and honorable English stock and constitutes a shrine of Anglo-American friendship.

It was purchased, in January, 1914, for the sum of £8,400, by the British Committee for the Celebration of the Hundred Years Peace between Great Britain and the United States (1814-1914), and the whole property (including the contents of the Manor House) is now vested in three ex-officio Trustees: The American Ambassador in London, the British Ambassador in Washington, and the Regent of the Mount Vernon Ladies' Association of the Union. It is administered and controlled by the Sulgrave Manor Board, a body formed to carry on the work of the British Peace Centenary Committee in perpetuity.

The Manor House has been partially restored to its original condition, and appropriately furnished with genuine furniture of the period. The laying out of the grounds has also been partially completed. At the conclusion of this preliminary work, a formal Reopening and Dedication took place, on June 21, 1921, in the presence of a large Anglo-American gathering, consisting of many distinguished and representative people.

The portion of the house thus treated is the oldest part, the South or Tudor wing. On the south gable are to be seen the Royal Arms of the Tudors; and in the right spandrel of the arch of the main doorway are the Washington Arms (three mullets and two bars). The building is, therefore, one of rare historical interest, and every care is being taken by the Sulgrave Manor Board to preserve its distinctive character and atmosphere. The furnishings are, for the most part, gifts from both British and American donors, and include an original Gilbert Stuart portrait of George Washington with many other treasures.

Sulgrave is a village, with about three hundred inhabitants, in the south-west corner of the county of Northamptonshire, and within a few miles of the borders of the counties of Warwick, Oxford and Buckingham. It is distant 6 miles from the town of Brackley, 9 miles from Banbury (of "Banbury Cross" and "Banbury cakes" fame), 24 miles from Northampton, and 28 miles from Stratford-on-Avon.

BICENTENNIAL CELEBRATION AT SULGRAVE MANOR.

THROUGH HISTORIC COVENTRY

On the journey from London by the most picturesque route, one passes near Jordans, where William Penn is buried; Chalfont, with its Milton's cottage; Beaconsfield, where Edmund Burke had an estate and died; and the country of John Hampden.

"It was, therefore, a rich seed-ground, from which sprang the English ancestry of George Washington, America's great soldier-statesman and First President," says a publication issued by the Sulgrave Manor Board.

The fine old house in its picturesque surroundings looked at its best in the bright sunshine of the perfect summer day of July 14, 1932. In welcoming the American Ambassador and other visitors, Lord Lee of Fareham, chairman of the Sulgrave Manor Board, said the occasion of the pilgrimage was significant in the relations between Great Britain and the United States, because it celebrated not only the birth of a great man but the union of hearts and common understanding typified in this shrine of Anglo-American friendship. He continued:

The work of restoring Sulgrave Manor to something like the condition in which it was when Washington's ancestors lived there has been carried out with diligence and reverence. It represents many enthusiasms and a great deal of money, given in small quantities and large, by lovers of America and England.

ADDRESS OF AMBASSADOR MELLON

Lord Fareham introduced Ambassador Mellon as the guest speaker of the occasion. Standing beneath the old trees of Sulgrave, Mr. Mellon spoke to the assembled guests and a country-wide British radio audience, as follows:

I am glad of this opportunity to come to Sulgrave and to join in this tribute to the memory of Washington. On behalf of my own countrymen and also our British friends who are here today, I wish to thank Lord Lee and the members of the Sulgrave Manor Board for their cordial welcome and for making it possible for us to celebrate here, in this place so intimately connected with the Washington family, the 200th anniversary of Washington's birth.

I must add one further word to thank the members of the committee representing the American Women's Club, the National Society of Colonial Dames, the English-Speaking Union and the Daughters of the American Revolution who have met together during the spring and arranged for this happy pilgrimage which we are making here today.

Sulgrave has a special significance for all Americans. We find over the door the Washington arms with the stars and stripes which were destined to become the emblems in our flag. We see all around us, in this beautiful English countryside, the fields and houses and churches which Washington's ancestors knew. The memories of these things they carried with them to Virginia and, so far as possible, reproduced them there, with the standards of conduct and something of the mode of living which they had known in England.

All of these things had an influence on the course of events, greater perhaps than we can realize at this distance in time and space. But of one thing we can feel certain, and that is that Sulgrave and the influences emanating from here helped to compose the background from which emerged in time that greatest of all Americans, George Washington, who, more than any other man, not only gave us our country but invested it with the form of government and the stability in its early years which enabled it to become a nation.

Washington's task was not an easy one. The War of Independence had been won with difficulty and its successful outcome had been due, in large measure, to his own unfaltering courage and the loyalty and confidence in him which held his little army together in spite of dangers and hardships of every kind. But after independence had been achieved, the hardest task of all was still ahead. The war had created thirteen sovereign and independent States, each jealous of the other and of their own prerogatives. Unless they could be tied together in a strong and indissoluble union, the war for independence had been fought in vain and the forces of jealousy and disintegration must in time have destroyed all that had been accomplished.

Washington saw clearly the dangers involved and he saw also the price that must be paid for union. He knew, as every realist must know, that union could not be based upon sentiment but must be based on mutual self-interest and subject to no revision at the will of its members. Otherwise there could be no real union but merely an alliance which might disappear at the first strain that was placed upon it. Washington faced the issue squarely, recognizing that the price of union was the delegation of sovereignty by the various States to a central government which he and others working with him determined to establish.

How well he succeeded you know, both in the Constitutional Convention and afterwards during the eight critical years of his Presidency when he not only established the prestige of the new Government but showed how the country could live and expand within the framework provided by the Constitution.

In carrying out the policy granting statehood in the vast territory west of the mountains, he showed for the first time how colonial dependencies could be given citizenship on terms of absolute equality with the rest of the country. By doing so, he proved that a democracy could expand into a great empire in a manner consistent with its professed beliefs in self-government and that it could at the same time and within its own boundaries create a great free-trade area, which has been America's real source of strength throughout all its history.

He did not seek to make America self-contained. In collaboration with Hamilton, he worked out a policy encouraging manufactures at home and an exchange of products with other countries on terms of equality with all. In trade, as in other matters, he constantly urged upon his countrymen and repeated in the Farewell Address "that 'tis folly in one nation to look for disinterested favors from another,—that it must pay with a portion of its independence for whatever it may accept under that character—that by such acceptance, it may place itself in the condition of having given equivalents for nominal favors and yet of being reproached with ingratitude for not giving more."

In matters of foreign policy, he urged independence without isolation, and cooperation without alliances. He risked and almost smashed his popularity temporarily in order to keep his country at peace until it could have time in which to become a nation, strong enough to resist world currents which might have dragged it down.

One of his chief concerns was the establishment of the public credit. He strongly supported Hamilton in his plan for the assumption by the Federal Government of the debts owed by the States both to domestic and foreign creditors. The success of that plan assured also the success of the Union itself, for while it achieved the immediate object of establishing the public credit and preventing repudiation of which Washington had such a horror, it also realized the greater purpose involved in tying the States together in a firm and indestructible union.

Washington always saw things in their larger aspects and in their true relation each to the other. He based his public as well as his private life on the simple principle that honesty is the best policy for a nation no less than for an individual.

The deep impress which he has left on his own country and the world is due not to his military genius or his great ability as a statesman, great as they were and sound as his judgment has proved itself to be. His hold on his own generation and on all generations that have come after him has been due to his sheer force of character which made him, as a great American writer has said, apart from independence itself the greatest legacy that has come to us from those troubled years in which America was born.

IN HEART OF OLD ENGLAND

Mr. H. A. L. Fisher, the next speaker, said that at Sulgrave, in the home of Washington's English ancestors, the pilgrims that day were in the very heart of Old England, that—

There were no mountains in sight, no torrents, no cascades, nothing to excite the emotions of mankind. It was England, and it was from the very heart of England that George Washington came. If they studied his career, how full it was of English traits and English acts! He came of that rural middle class which was the most distinctive feature in the social evolution of England.

Like Oliver Cromwell, he was a great natural soldier, but, like Oliver Cromwell, the civilian in him was always the master. No one was more free from rancour, jealousy, and pettiness than this big, easy, magnanimous statesman, Washington. In his political principles, which were founded on the old English common law, he was a true Englishman. He understood our Constitution, and he understood what liberty meant a great deal better than George III. He would have understood John Hampden, and John Hampden would have understood him.

The British colonies which Washington by his genius and patience led to victory were peopled by men and women of English stock. In 1791 ninety-five percent of the population of those colonies was of English origin—not Scottish, Irish or Welsh. Washington was a great Englishman, leading Englishmen to victory. His secret was very easy to read. It was simply this: that in a country and in an age, which were experiencing a need of reaction to the older principles of the English Constitution, Washington was the greatest Englishman of his generation.

Following Mr. Fisher came Mrs. Nicholas Rowe, of the Walter Hines Page Chapter of the Daughters of the American Revolution, who referred to the wisdom of those persons of international-thinking who acquire such properties as Sulgrave Manor. She said:

The great persons of the future are not being born in homes that can be marked with brass tablets, but in hospitals and nursing homes.

The United States Government and many patriotic organizations of the United States have already rehabilitated, or taken steps to preserve, those places made historically sacred by connection with George Washington, and the Bicentennial Celebration is awakening an interest in the peoples of all nations to follow this example, both with respect to George Washington and his predecessors and the other patriots and heroes of their country whose memory deserves everlasting perpetuation.

GEORGE WASHINGTON

FROM THE BUST BY JOSEPH NOLLEKENS, MODELED IN LONDON ABOUT 1805, AND HERE REPRODUCED BY PERMISSION OF THE HONORABLE SOL BLOOM, OF NEW YORK

SCOTLAND

LASGOW, Edinburgh, Dundee, and Aberdeen—four largest cities of Scotland—gave the George Washington Bicentennial Year a real welcome in the land of highlands and kilts, bagpipes and clans. There were public lectures and private dinners, picture hangings and published eulogies, displays of relics and Rotary Club luncheons—devoted to the Bicentennial theme. It was as if the Scotch people were recalling the admonition of Earl Buchan, who said long ago: “I recommend the constant remembrance of the moral and political maxims conveyed to its citizens by the Father and Founder of the United States.”

Research conducted by the historical department of the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission has shown that the Scots were prominent in the American Revolution. Some immigrants came direct from Scotland, both Lowlanders and Highlanders, more particularly the latter; for the Scots were good colonists, being “never so much at home as when abroad.” Although it is difficult to distinguish Scottish names from Irish on the one hand and English on the other, it is certain that two of the major generals in Washington’s army were born in Scotland—McDougall and St. Clair. Another, William Alexander, who claimed to be Lord Stirling, was of Scottish descent. Mercer and McIntosh, brigadier generals, were also born in Scotland. Others of the generals, Knox, Stark, the two Clintons, Lewis, and Irvine, were of Scotch-Irish descent. John Paul Jones was born in Scotland.

Dr. James Craik, Chief Surgeon, and Robert Erskine, Geographer and Surveyor of the army, were Scottish, as was the father of Alexander Hamilton, Washington’s Aide, later colonel of the line, and finally the founder of America’s public finances. Cognizant of these ties with the new world, Scotland joined the world in honoring George Washington.

It has been said that Scotland appreciates the greatness of George Washington more deeply than many other countries because of the in-born love of liberty of the Scotch people as exemplified by their own heroes, Bruce, Wallace, and Douglas.

WASHINGTON IN SCOTCH POETRY

Just as America treasures Scotch hero tales, so does Scotland preserve in her literature the deeds of George Washington and his contemporaries, as, for instance, the following by the poet Burns:

Faith, you and Applecrow were right
To keep the Highlan’ hounds in sight;
I doubt na, they wad bid na better
Than let them ance out owre the water;
Than up amang thae lakes and seas,
They’ll mak’ what rules an’ laws they please;
Some daring Hancock, or a Franklin
May set their Highlan’ bluid a-ranklin’,
Some Washington again may head them;
Or some Montgomery, fearless, lead them;
Till God knows what may be effected
When by such heads and hearts directed.

Scotland’s estimate of George Washington and the respect that prompted the land of the lochs to honor his memory in 1932 is aptly epitomized in the words of the famous Scotch cleric, Dr. James Grahame:

Perhaps there never was another man who trod with more unsullied honor the highest ways of glory, or whose personal character and conduct exercised an influence so powerful and so beneficial on the destiny of a nation.

WASHINGTON HONORED IN EDINBURGH

Edinburgh, site of Stirling Castle and today a great British university and educational center, paid high honor to the memory of George Washington on February 22, 1932. The Americans of the city and a representative group of Scottish guests assembled on that day at the Royal Arch Halls for a special George Washington commemorative program.

Edinburgh is host to more than three hundred American students and to thousands of American tourists annually. The assemblage was made up largely of these students, who were received by the American Consul, Mr. Austin C. Brady and Mrs. Brady. Among the guests were the Lady Provost of Edinburgh, Lady Whitson, and Professor J. Young Simpson, Honorary President of the Edinburgh American Club.

According to the report of the meeting in THE SCOTSMAN, on February 23, “above the platform was hung a portrait of Washington, while the Union Jack and 'Old Glory' were prominent in the scheme of decoration, and the proceedings started with the playing of the British and American national anthems."

Consul Brady delivered the following address:

It is a very great pleasure to welcome you today, a day memorable in American history, marking as it does the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington. Our observance here is one of many thousands that are taking place. Throughout the United States today, in every city and town and hamlet, the American people are vying with one another in honoring the memory of their great national hero, the First President, the Father of His Country, and in every other land where Americans are found Washington is being publicly remembered and eulogized, friendly and admiring peoples of many nations joining with his countrymen in commemorative acts. True greatness may not be confined within national boundaries, and while Washington belongs to the nation he founded, as a great American he has become long since a world figure, and the example of his life—a life of rectitude, and forbearance and unselfishness, of profound religious conviction and spiritual worth—has become a world influence.

George Washington was born 200 years ago today and he died at the close of the eighteenth century. In the 132 years since his death the nation whose foundation he laid and whose superstructure he started has had unparalleled growth, sweeping from the original colonies of the Atlantic seaboard westward to the Pacific, doubling and quadrupling in size to reach a continental area of more than 3,000,000 square miles; adding to the 5,000,000 inhabitants of that day a multitude of people, to count within its boundaries a population of more than 120,000,000 souls. The great nation of which Washington dreamed and which he saw, to use his words, "at no distant period" when he penned his Farewell Address, in form and substance greater than even his faith could then conceivably have pictured, stands today as a monument to him, its progress and achievements and power, its cultural and material wealth, reflecting the soundness of the principles he held and on which it was builded.

Speaking on this occasion in Edinburgh, the capital of Scotland, I am happy to have the opportunity to pay tribute to the great part that men and women of Scottish birth and blood have played in the upbuilding of the United States. Scottish pioneers helped to conquer the wilderness and to carry civilization across a continent; their descendents and those who joined them from the homeland became bulwarks of the new civilization established, the new order and the new ideals; thirteen Presidents of the United States have been of Scottish or Scottish-Irish descent; in every line of human endeavor within the Republic, in every great epoch of American national life, citizens of Scottish ancestry have shone and they have given to American history some of its brightest names. In that land made possible by the genius of George Washington more than that of any other one man, sons and daughters of an indomitable race found opportunity for the development of rare talents and the attainment of high destinies.

In the courage and faith of George Washington—courage in the face of trial and adversity, faith unshaken by colonial division and discord—in his accomplishments and the fruits that they have borne, may be found inspiration and assurance for those called upon today to grapple with the problems of a troubled world. The problems of the present differ materially from those of the past, but in efforts for solution, possibly more than ever before, are courage and faith demanded. On those outstanding human qualities, combined with mutual consideration and good will, rest the hopes of peoples and nations and the certainty of success.

TRIBUTES TO WASHINGTON IN EDINBURGH

The other addresses were reported by THE SCOTSMAN as follows:

Lady Whitson, after apologising for the absence of the Lord Provost, who had been called to London, said she had been told that there were 318 Americans in Edinburgh—far too few, too. The greater number of them were students, a fact which she considered a tremendous compliment to Scotland. Being students, they were only birds of passage, and it seemed a pity that they and the citizens did not meet more often, for they were missionaries who carried back to their own country their impressions of old Scotland. America and Britain, said the Lady Provost, seemed to have no less in common as time went on—in fact, they had more in common. In the last part of her lifetime American and British interests had certainly grown closer together. That all made for friendship, and that meeting, she hoped, was a symbol of the friendship which existed and the greater friendship which might exist between the Americans living in the city and the people of Edinburgh.

Following the address of the Lady Provost, Professor J. Young Simpson said: That in the course of 150 years the United States had become the greatest of all national commonwealths. All this had come about in the first instance through an act of political construction rendered possible by the wisdom and authority of him whose memory they were honouring, aided by the creative genius of Alexander Hamilton. Comparing Britain and America, Professor Simpson said that our monarchy today was simply an hereditary presidency. The progress of civilization would be by way of nationalism as a means to an end and not an end in itself, through internationalism to what might be called supra-nationalism—of which the United States was a model. The United States was a spiritual conception. The splendid idealism of the Declaration of Independence had never been lost sight of, while we on this side have been slowly learning the lesson that the greater the liberty the greater the loyalty. We should see other countries looking to the great Anglo-Saxon races working together for the effective moral leadership of the world.

Mr. Edward M. Campbell, president of the Edinburgh branch of the English-Speaking Union, in an address that was enthusiastically received, said: It might seem strange to be celebrating the birth of George Washington on British soil, for, after all, he was technically a rebel. (Laughter.) He would point out, however, that there was a good deal of sympathy for the American colonists in this country, and especially in Scotland, where they knew what it meant to be oppressed by England. (Laughter.) Mr. Campbell mentioned that the Union had three hundred members in Edinburgh anxious to meet Americans and to entertain them in their homes.

THANKSGIVING IN EDINBURGH

Americans in Edinburgh, observing the custom of celebrating Thanksgiving Day, linked it in 1932 with the George Washington Bicentennial. Consul Brady reported that there were three separate observances in Edinburgh.

The first was a dinner of international character, attended by Americans, Canadians, and Scots, at a prominent Edinburgh Hotel on the evening of November 23. This dinner was made the occasion for recalling the fact that President George Washington issued the first presidential Thanksgiving proclamation. Consul Brady voiced the sentiment of the assemblage as one of Thanksgiving for the splendid international relations that exist between Scotland and the United States and also with Canada. He said this friendship, so far as Americans were concerned, could be traced directly back to the ideals inculcated in the American people by President Washington:

It was also pointed out that the first Presidential proclamation appointing a day of national thanksgiving in the United States was issued by President Washington in 1789, and that this proclamation was incorporated in the Presidential proclamation of 1932, in order, as set forth by President Hoover, that our people might refresh their memory of that document of the Father of Our Country, "whose immeasurable services to our liberties and our security are blessings perennially renewed upon us."

The other speakers at the dinner were Edward M. Campbell, president of the Edinburgh branch of the English-Speaking Union, and Sir Robert Greig, secretary of the Department of Agriculture for Scotland.

An informal dinner on Thanksgiving Day was arranged by the American Theological students residing in Edinburgh. It was the particular delight of these students, as expressed at the dinner, that George Washington, the first President of their country, was a firm believer in a Higher Power and that a Divine interposition shaped the destiny of America. It was recalled that President Washington stood always for religious tolerance; that there was no prejudice nor contempt in his nature for those not of his faith; that Christians and Jews were treated with equal courtesy and privilege in the new nation under Washington. It was the hope of these students of theology that Washington's ideals would continue to exert a beneficent influence over the lives of American citizens wherever they might be.

American medical students in Edinburgh convened at a banquet and smoker on November 25. At this gathering, as at those heretofore described, George Washington was the unseen guest. He was toasted as the epitome of all that is great in the American character. At this assemblage the American medical students were joined by their Scottish professors and several invited guests.

THE BICENTENNIAL IN GLASGOW

In Glasgow the Bicentennial was quietly but enthusiastically observed. Hon. Samuel W. Honaker, American Consul General at Glasgow, in a letter on June 21, 1932, to Honorable Sol Bloom, Director of the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission, said:

By means of the Scottish press, and various other agencies, considerable publicity has been given to the celebration of the Bicentennial, and there are probably few Americans in Scotland who did not entertain, in some manner, in honor of Washington during the month of his birth.

Scottish folk who had any connection with the American Revolution or its leaders joined in the celebration. Mrs. Kerr, who lives at her estate, "Bagatelle," in Greenock, Scotland, is intensely proud of the fact, reported Consul Honaker, that one of her ancestors was a surgeon in General Washington's army and that her great-grandfather, Walter Washington Buchanan, was a god-child of both Washington and LaFayette, being baptised, she says, "in the arms of George Washington."

Mrs. Kerr has in her possession a number of family relics associated with the days of Washington and several that are believed to have been actually used by the General or members of his army. Realizing that these famous antiques would make an interesting exhibit during the Bicentennial Year, Mrs. Kerr opened her home to all visitors who desired to examine them. Among the objects on display was a canteen of silver, which is said to have been used by George Washington during the Revolution and to have been left to Dr. Buchanan. The canteen is signed and dated on the inside of the lid. Many interested Scots and Americans took advantage of Mrs. Kerr's invitation and visited her Washington collection.

An example of the publicity in the Scotch press is quoted from the GLASGOW HERALD, February 20, 1932, an exceptionally critical estimate of the character of Washington:

THE FATHER OF HIS COUNTRY

"George," said his father, "do you know who killed that beautiful little cherry tree yonder in the garden?" This was a tough question, and George staggered under it for a moment, but quickly recovered himself, and looking at his father, with the sweet face of youth brightened with the inexpressible charm of all-conquering truth, he bravely cried out, "I can't tell a lie, I did cut it with my hatchet." So runs the too, too famous passage in the notorious life written by Parson Weems for "the encouragement of virtue" and the lining of the reverend gentleman's pockets.

From the impression that Washington was a character out of an unwritten story by Dean Farrar has sprung the widespread conviction that the "Father of His Country" was one of the most monumental bores and humbugs in history. Everything combined to hide the real Washington; even his very writings were tampered with and were given to the world in a form that owed more to the clerical propriety of Jared Sparks than to strict truth. It is no wonder that generations meant to be edified were nauseated by the two reverend historical forgers—and it is probable that the boldly mendacious Weems did less harm than the more ingeniously dishonest President Sparks of Harvard. In the last ten years a valiant effort has been made to find the real Washington; all the resources of modern historical method have been brought to bear, and the real Washington appears—not a worse but a better and nobler man than the intolerable lay-figure of the early hagiographers.

CHANCES OF FORTUNE

Born a younger son of a second-rate Virginian gentleman, Washington had his way to make in the world, and was made in the process. Of great physical strength and endurance, of unusual regularity and application in business, he would have been an important man in any society. He was not quick, he was not eloquent, his education was very faulty—a defect of which, in the very height of his fame, he remained pathetically conscious—but the resolution and patience he possessed and cultivated were worth more in his world than even the great asset of the "babbling tongue of saucy and audacious eloquence." To make his way in the world Washington became a surveyor, an office of high rank in colonial Virginia, requiring moral qualities that were manifested to many of the most powerful members of the Virginia gentry. Washington, was by his profession, given many chances of fortune, which he took: he acquired an unrivalled knowledge of the West, the Indians, and of the frontier problem. So when Virginia at last determined to bell the cat and warn off the French from the Ohio country, on whose acquisition depended many a Virginian family's solvency, the errand was given to young Washington. In a few months he was world famous, for he fired the first shots in the Seven Years War. Whitehall might try to placate the French, might suggest negotiation: the die was cast and the expulsion of the French from North America had been begun by a young man just past his majority.

VIRGINIA AND THE TRONGATE

Out of the Seven Years War emerged Colonel Washington. He had had little military glory; his most important campaign had been with the unfortunate Braddock, but as commander of the Virginian troops Washington had had his capacity for military administration and for endless patience tried and proved. He was when peace came the most famous American soldier; he was known all over the colonies, and he was at last firmly embedded in the highest ranks of Virginian Society. By the death of his brother, Lawrence, he was now the head of his family and master of the estate which bore the name of Mount Vernon, for the same reason that Edinburgh has Portobello, as a permanent memorial of the unfortunate War of Jenkin's Ear. He had married a wealthy widow, and was owner of perhaps the finest, and of certainly the best managed, plantation in Virginia.

Yet Washington was not satisfied; like all of his class he felt that he was being cheated by an economic system that seemed to throw all the burden of tobacco raising on the Virginia planter and to leave most of the profits in the hands of the British merchant. From this point of view the revolution was a war between Virginia and Virginia Street, and Washington's enemies were not in Whitehall, but pacing, in sober dignity, the plainstanes of the Trongate. In all the boycotts and petitions that marked the early days of the struggle Washington was a leader. He allowed other more ingenious Virginians to provide the theoretical pleas, but there was no more zealous practical patriot than he. When at last it came to blows, and the Congress at Philadelphia decided to "adopt" the Massachusetts militia besieging His Majesty's forces in Boston, John Adams had the command of the new "Continental army" offered to Washington, and the General began the eight most trying and most glorious years of his life.

THE TRIUMPH OF WAR

Few men who have won fame as soldiers have known less of the pride, pomp, and circumstance of glorious war than Washington. When he fought pitched battles he was beaten with more than Austrian regularity. His few successes were brilliant little raids in the manner of De Wet, and for the rest skillful retreats in the face of a sluggish enemy. He had inadequate resources, and he did not usually make the best of them; his campaign round New York was a model of how not to do it, yet the fame of General Washington grew with each doubtful year. In the black winter of 1777-8 the starving and frozen troops at Valley Forge had little other reason to stay by the colours than their faith in their general. What was said of the Roman demagogue two thousand years before was true a thousand times of Washington; he had deserved well of the republic because he never despaired of her. The end came, and in that end Washington played, from one point of view, a minor role. The real hero of the Yorktown campaign was Admiral de Grasse, but when General O'Hara led out the British troops to surrender it was to Washington that all eyes turned. The British bands played "The World Turned Upside Down," and the impassive Virginian saw troops pass the army in which he had served as a despised auxiliary and before which he had had to flee.

From Yorktown to the election as President was perhaps the most pleasant period of the great man's life. His fame filled the world, he was busy at his tasks as a planter; full of honours and projects, Cincinnatus came to life again for the delight of the Plutarchian imaginations of the age. But his friends called on him, they worked on his patriotism, and, first as president of the Constitutional Convention and then as first President of the United States, Washington turned his hand from the plough to the tiller of the ship of state.

His eight years as President were useful, if not very happy. The dignity and powers of the Presidency owe more than can be assayed to the fact that the office was once held by Washington, as indeed, it was planned with the understanding that it would be held by him. Stiff and formal, no orator and less of a debater, helpless when he lost his spectacles and could not read his speech, with his stiff smile not made more easy by his primitive false teeth, the President faced the new duties in which he was so much less at home than on the farm or in the field. Party feeling grew; the background was darkened by the first storms of the French Revolution. La Fayette sent the keys of the Bastille to Washington as a souvenir; the name of the republic was spoken above a whisper in France, and the evocations of the ancient name grew more and more confident as eyes were cast across the Atlantic to the new Republic governed by this great citizen.

A FAMOUS FAREWELL

Yet Washington knew little of the spirit behind all the European turmoil. His concern was with his own country and his own Cabinet. He saw Jefferson go into private life, which meant opposition; he found himself, how he could never understand, degraded into being the chief, even the mascot, of a party. He had had enough of the stress, the violent abuse, the intrigues of the Presidency. In a famous farewell address, he gave counsels to his people that have been added, by tradition, to the great American collection Sybilline books, and, leaving all the heat and passion of Philadelphia behind him, returned to Virginia. He was for a time commander-in-chief of a mythical army prepared for a most improbable war with France, but in his plantation and in the making of the new capital city which was to bear his name he found more happiness than in any formal glories. He was not an old man, but he was a weary one, and so quite suddenly, amidst the trees and fields, he died. In the world his death was a great event in the disillusioned epoch that followed the great Revolution. The young first counsel, Bonaparte, ordered official mourning for the great incarnation of the Republican principle, which he was already seeing as an adversary, and beyond the mourning lay the empire.

A FIGURE OF AN ANTIQUE MOLD

The American people, which was about to reject his political principles with all possible vigor, mourned him as "first in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen." Yet the traditional praise is false. He was not a great soldier, and in an office that has been often filled by soldiers he must rank behind Jackson and Grant. He had no talents to compare with those of Jefferson and Franklin, no power of appeal such as Lincoln had, no overwhelming personal popularity such as was the glory of Henry Clay and Stephen Douglas. Yet he was a great, and a very great, man. Perhaps Weems and Sparks were right in their concentration on his character, for he had in the fullest sense public virtue. In his manner and appearance, his gravity and probity, he does seem a figure of an antique mould and worthy of ancient laudation, and as, after all, the old tags are the best tags, we can hardly do better than call on Horace to praise one who never failed to obey the precept:

Aequam memento rebus in arduis servare mentem, non secus in bonis ab insolenti temperatam laetitia, moriture . . .

PORTRAITS PRESENTED TO UNIVERSITIES

The American Consul at Dundee, Mr. John J. C. Watson, offered to the great universities at St. Andrews and Aberdeen, reproductions of the Stuart Athenaeum portrait of George Washington, to be hung in their halls with appropriate ceremonies in celebration of the Bicentennial. The offer was immediately accepted by both universities.

The portraits were presented by Consul Watson on behalf of the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission. They were framed and placed in conspicuous positions in the college buildings. Dr. George Adams Smith, principal of the University of Aberdeen, and Sir James Colquhoun Irvine, principal of the University of St. Andrews, wrote letters of thanks to both the American Consul and the Commission, stating that the pictures were valued as permanent and highly worth-while additions to the decorations and atmosphere of the schools.

Mr. Maurice P. Dunlap, who succeeded Mr. Watson as American Consul in Dundee, reported that a Thanksgiving Dinner was given by the Dundee Rotary Club on November 24, recalling the fraternal ties with the United States. More than two score American students were present. Mr. Dunlap read President Hoover's Thanksgiving proclamation, quoting especially that part which set out in full the Thanksgiving Proclamation of President Washington. Mr. Dunlap called to the attention of the Scottish Rotarians the significance of the 200th Anniversary of George Washington's birth to Americans of today. He said that Washington was coming into his own—to be looked upon as less of an idol and more of a genuine human being. He "regretted that in the process of elucidating the character of George Washington the pendulum had swung from the ultra-sentimental to the ultra-realistic and that some biographers were guilty of the worst of literary crimes—'muckraking'—in their modern treatment of the life of Washington." He said he was thankful, however, that "the better class of historians were taking a middle course which would reveal George Washington in his true greatness," adding that Washington stands in the same relationship to Americans as do Bruce, Wallace, and Douglas to Scots.

The Rotarians gave Mr. Dunlap a hearty vote of appreciation and renewed their pledge to unite with Rotary Clubs throughout the world in furthering the great theme of service—a theme that was dear to the heart of George Washington.

THE CHERRY TREE "GREW IN ABERDEEN"

The Bicentennial celebration in Scotland aroused a new interest in the history of George Washington with the result that the press devoted considerable space to the subject. The ABERDEEN PRESS AND JOURNAL on December 29, 1932, printed an article in which it is asserted that "George Washington's Famous Cherry Tree Really Grew in a Garden in Aberdeen!" Some excerpts from this article are quoted:

George Washington's Famous Cherry Tree Really Grew in a Garden in Aberdeen!

George Washington was born in 1732. He was a man who towered above his compeers, remarkable for his great courage, his far-seeing wisdom, and his lack of self-interest.

But, for all his great qualities and his remarkable career, the one thing which is universally remembered of him is an apocryphal anecdote which he owes to Aberdeen.

It seems strange that the little city of Aberdeen in the eighteenth century should have had any close contact with the great American Revolution and the events which led up to it; but, apart from the Washington anecdote, there were other links.

In Freemasonry there was one, for in 1752, when he was twenty years old, Washington became a member of a Scottish Lodge in Virginia. Independent lodges had been established throughout the Colonies before 1733, and among these were some originated by far-travelled members of the Measson Lodge of Abirdene—which still flourishes as Lodge Aberdeen. No. 1—ter. It has in its possession fascinatingly interesting records dating back to 1660.

In religion we find another link. It was forged in Long-acre, Aberdeen, in 1784, and connected the direct Apostolic Succession with the 6,000 and more clergy of the present Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States. This link was forged when Samuel Seabury, of Massachusetts, was consecrated as a bishop of the Anglican communion by our own Bishop Skinner and other Scottish non-juror bishops.

Washington and over two-thirds of those who signed the Declaration of Independence were Anglicans, and their descendants and co-religionists of that Protestant Episcopal Church inaugurated at Aberdeen still have a strong feeling of gratitude to the Diocese of Aberdeen.

But the most remarkable link, though not the most widely known, is the famous tale of George Washington and the cherry tree.

This tale is taught to and absorbed by every school child in the United States. It is the one incident of which everyone has heard and which comes into everyone's mind whenever the name of George Washington is spoken.

Four years after Washington's death Parson Mason Weems, of Mount Vernon, published a life of the national hero. Though written in a florid, bombastic style, it immediately became a "best seller." It passed through eighty editions, and is still being sold.

The cherry tree anecdote did not appear until the fifth edition, published in 1806. It was introduced as having been received "from an aged lady," so it was admittedly given forth as "an auld wife's tale."

After a flowery introduction of considerable length, the actual dialogue between father and son is given as follows:

"George, do you know who killed that beautiful little cherry tree yonder in the garden?" This was a tough question, and George staggered under it for a moment, but quickly recovering himself and looking at his father with the sweet face of youth, brightened with the inexpressible charm of all-conquering truth, he bravely cried out: "I can't tell a lie, Pa: you know I can't tell a lie. I did it with my hatchet." "Run to my arms, you dearest boy," cried his father in transport. "Run to my arms; glad am I, George, that you killed my tree, for you have paid me for it a thousandfold. Such an act of heroism in my son is more worth than a thousand trees, though blossomed with silver and their fruits of purest gold."

That is the legend which, stripped of its rococo ornament, is served up to children of America. It has become part of the national creed and is there to stay.

But instead of happening in Mount Vernon in 1738 as alleged, the original incident most probably took place in the garden of one of the professors of Marischal College, Aberdeen, in 1776. At that time Washington was already Commander-in-Chief of the army of the United Colonies.

In Marischal College there is a fine portrait, painted by Sir Joshua Reynolds, of James Beattie, author of the successful poem, "The Minstrel," and Professor of Moral Philosophy at Marischal College. He had the misfortune to lose a most promising son, at the age of nineteen, in 1790. This boy had inherited his father's literary talents, and, at that early age, had already been appointed associate professor.

Four years after his death his father published a little volume of selections from the prose and verse writings of the son, and added a memoir of his youthful years. It is here that the simply-told account appears of his having injured a tree in the garden, and having owned up to it when questioned by his father.

The actors and stage properties are so similar to those in the episode incorporated in the Washington biography in 1806 as to make the conclusion inescapable that, in the interval between the first and fifth editions of his book, Parson Weems had seen this little volume of Professor Beattie's.

Probably, from his surname, he was a prudent Scot from the Kingdom of Fife, and had the wit to see that this story of a truthful boy deserved to be rescued from oblivion. His success was greater than he could ever have imagined.

As an example of the enduring influence of this little tale in America, I quote a paragraph from an American newspaper of February, 1932:

"Gallup, New Mexico.—On the way through New Mexico we learn that Albuquerque restaurants are 'Observing a Cherry Pie Week' in honour of George Washington and his tree."

Little do they think that they are also celebrating the virtue of a little Aberdeen boy in a Marischal College garden.

NORTHERN IRELAND

NEWs dispatches from the Ulster end of the Emerald Isle and reports from the American Consul at Belfast indicate that George Washington was remembered with honor by Northern Irish churchgoers on February 21, 1932, by the press on February 22 and by Americans and citizens of Northern Ireland on Washington's Birthday, Independence Day, and Thanksgiving Day.

Mr. Lucien Memminger, American Consul General at Belfast, reported that "on the evening of Thanksgiving Day a reception to commemorate the birth of George Washington was held at his residence in Adelaide Park." The reception was attended by a mixed throng of American, English, and Irish citizens and officials. A musical program of selections from the days of Washington was enjoyed.

The American Consul explained to the assembled guests the meaning of the Bicentennial Celebration and told how the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission had been created by the American Congress to direct the celebration throughout the world. He continued:

All of the music that you are enjoying on this program, for instance, was furnished by the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission, and any of you may receive on request free literature that will enlighten you on the history of George Washington and his relations with your country. The first President of the United States you will discover was not the mere "rebel" that he was once pictured in this part of the world by ill-advised loyalists. He was a many-sided human being, a man, endowed with attributes by which he achieved liberty for his nation and yet left no hard feelings in the hearts of the British people. This is evidenced by the manner in which his name is being honored throughout the British Empire during this bicentenary of his birth.

Americans in all parts of the world have been asked to give thanks, on this day set apart for the purpose of thanksgiving, for the exalted life of her great hero, Washington. Let us here in Ireland do all in our power to perpetuate the ideals of our first President in our relations with the world about us. If we will do this, we shall have no need to fear for the brotherhood of the future.

The lofty attitude of the Irish press toward the Washington theme is indicated by the following editorial from the BELFAST TELEGRAPH, February 22, 1932:

For a hundred years and more the Americans have honored February 22 as being the birthday of George Washington. Today special honor is being paid to his memory because it is two hundred years since he was born. The passage of time has set him in a clearer light, but has diminished little of his fame. He had not the military genius of Napoleon, but his ambitions were less self-seeking. Instead of attempting to win a position of personal glory and supreme power, he devoted his talents, military and civil, to the establishment of the independence and the perpetuity of the liberties of his own country. He sought no financial reward. He coveted no public honors. He accomplished a wonderful revolution, and yet he has retained to this day the gratitude of his own people and the respect of other nations.

George Washington, as everyone knows, was of good English yeoman stock. His great-grandfather emigrated to America in 1657, having previously lived in Northamptonshire. The family settled at Bridges Creek, Virginia, and it was here that the future President of the States was born February 22 (Old Style, February 11), 1732. Nothing is known of his childhood, although several absurd stories, such as that of the hatchet and the cherry tree, are told about him. He seems to have been a good healthy boy of strong physique, with a sober-mindedness somewhat beyond his years. When he was fifteen years of age he removed to Mount Vernon, the residence of his half-brother, Lawrence. In this new environment he had access to books and good teachers. He became skilled in surveying, and at twenty was a competent manager of a great estate. He was fond of riding, fox-hunting, with a taste for dancing and theatricals. He was 6 ft. 3 ins. in height, with big limbs and hands, but not ungainly. He seems to have had more than his share of love affairs, but none led to marriage until in 1758 he fell in love with a rich young widow, Martha Custis (nee Dandridge). The Mount Vernon estate had now come into his possession through the death of his step-brother, and the combined estates of his wife and himself made him one of the richest men in the land. He kept open house with Southern hospitality, led the hunting, and was extremely popular.

He was, however, most industrious, punctual, and economical. He had several experiences of soldiering, and had proved himself a capable leader of men. The opportunity to prove his mettle came to him when he was 45 years of age. For several years the American States had been restive under British rule. If George III, and his advisers, had displayed either sympathy or wisdom in their dealings with America the uneasiness could have been cured. But their only idea was that America must obey England. Americans regarded themselves as equals to the British people, they desired to govern themselves, and would gladly have adopted any scheme involving Dominion status had it been offered to them.

They objected, for example, to a Stamp Act imposed on them from Westminster, and they refused to pay a tea tax imposed in the same fashion, arguing they would pay no taxes unless they were represented in Parliament. When the next cargo of tea arrived in Boston Harbor a number of young Americans, disguised as Red Indians, boarded the ships and threw the tea overboard. This act, which is known to history as the Boston Tea Party, led to war with England. For seven years the war dragged on. At first Washington was in command of the Virginian troops only, but his ability came to be recognized.

After the Colonists had been defeated at the Battle of Bunker Hill in 1775, he was chosen as Commander-in-Chief of all the American forces. He refused all payment except bare expenses. He showed business genius combined with military enterprise in his command. He put recruiting on a proper basis, he reorganized the provision of food and munitions, and by his bravery and enthusiasm inspired the troops. He drove the English out of Boston, he captured General Cornwallis, and presided over the group of leaders who drew up the Declaration of Independence. When the United States of America was set up as an independent Republic, George Washington was chosen as its first President. There were many who wished that he should be entitled King, but he withdrew in horror from such a plan.

To follow his career as President would be to write a history of America through the eight years most creative in its existence. After the war there was chaos. No institutions of government had been in existence previously and there were few men capable of managing them. To the task of producing order out of chaos Washington brought the same qualities which had helped him to win the War of Independence—the same methodical precision, sober judgment, honesty of purpose, and dignity of character.

He saw that the great failing of the Colonists lay in their happy-go-lucky disrespect for authority, a disrespect which is bringing still on the States its nemesis of graft and lawlessness. He urged as the chief purposes of his Presidency:—A union of the States under one Federal head, a sacred regard to public justice, and the adoption of a proper peace establishment. He thought America should stand aloof from the conflicts of Europe. He resigned the Presidency in 1796 and returned to live in seclusion with his wife at Mount Vernon, where he died three years later. A phrase used by General Lee in his tribute to Washington's memory has become almost colloquial in America: "First in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen."

When news came to England that Washington was dead the British Fleet lowered their flags to half-mast in his honor. He was one of the most disinterested patriots of his own or any day. He used to say: "Labor to keep alive in your breast that little spark of celestial fire, conscience," and he always endeavored to live up to this principle. The Americans adopted his family arms, Stars and Stripes, as the basis of their national flag; they built their capital city beside Mount Vernon, and then they called it Washington. Not content with these honors paid to his memory, they named a State of the Union after him, and they have given him first place in their hearts of all their national celebrities.

AUSTRALIA

N AUSTRALIA the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington was celebrated by Australians, Americans and other English-speaking groups with real enthusiasm. The newspapers expressed the measure of respect in the hearts of the people of that great Continent for George Washington in an impressive outpouring of tribute on February 22, Independence Day and Thanksgiving Day, 1932.

Although Australia was not colonized by white men until fifty years after the birth of George Washington, it celebrated the great patriot's Bicentennial for the reason that Australia has a deep and inherent respect for George Washington and the ideals symbolized in him; because Australia is indebted, indirectly, to George Washington for its own existence as a colony and later as a Federation of States, and because Australia is part of the great British Commonwealth of Nations, all parts of which gave honor to America's greatest hero.

The newspapers, especially of Sydney, Perth, Adelaide, Melbourne and Brisbane, devoted generous space to reports of the various Celebrations in which the people of Australia joined Americans in a great Bicentennial Ball, a commemorative meeting and a library display at Melbourne and a Consulate reception at Adelaide.

Telling of the plans for the celebration of the Bicentennial THE DAILY TELEGRAPH of Sidney said: "After all, George Washington was the step-father (shall we say) of Australia, as well as the father of his country. Australia would not have been settled when it was but for the success of the American Revolution."

THE ADVERTISER, Adelaide, in an editorial entitled "Washington's Bicentenary," sounded high praise for General Washington and recounted many of his patriotism-building achievements. Particularly is the value of his services in the formulation of the Constitution of the United States recognized and attention is called to the fact that Australia's own constitution is largely based upon the American instrument.

When it is realized that without Washington's leadership and inspiration the American Revolution might not have wrought freedom for the Colonies and with this freedom served to divert the attention of loyal English colonizers to other worlds to conquer—Australia, among the number—the true significance of what THE DAILY TELEGRAPH says is apparent. And when it is brought to mind that back of the magnificence of the Constitution of the United States, the pattern for Australia's government, was the guiding genius of Washington and the wise statesmanship of his contemporaries, the truth of the conclusions drawn by THE ADVERTISER cannot be gainsaid.

With these introductory thoughts in mind let us go more fully into the details of the Bicentennial in Australia:

JULY 4 IN AUSTRALIA

It seemed like Christmas in Charleston, S. C., or Savannah, Ga., on the Fourth of July, 1932, in Adelaide, South Australia. Poinsettias, log fires, and candle light in the early dusk of a rather chilly afternoon warmed the hearts of those seventy Australians and fourteen Americans who gathered at the American Consulate to celebrate in honor of George Washington. In this picturesque setting 11,800 miles from Broadway the celebrants raised their voices to the tunes of "Father of the Land We Love" and the proposed state song of South Australia, "Song of Australia"; and the candle light cast a flickering glow on the features of America's first president, whose portrait hung among the folds of the flags of the two countries.

Sir Josiah Symon, K.C., K.C.M.G., one of Australia's first-in-war-first-in-peace patriots, who in the future will be enshrined in the hearts of all Australians as one of the framers of their Constitution and formerly a Federal Senator, bore testimony of the high attributes of Washington, Hamilton, Franklin, Jefferson, and other Americans instrumental in the founding and preservation of the United States. He said:

There was a supreme wisdom guiding Washington through the network of anxieties created by the enemies of his leadership at every stage of the conflict of arms and emotions that ended in American Independence, Sir Josiah affirmed. I know from personal experience the gigantic task of creating a form of government for a democratic people. The creators are subject to intrigues, to political factionalism, to personal ambitions, to filibusters and criticism. The utmost in patience and diplomacy is necessary to bring such a Herculean task to a successful culmination. Australia was fortunate in having as a pattern, when we decided to frame our own Constitution, the great governmental instrument that pilots the United States and which George Washington helped develop from a meleé of political thought and state-right ambition into a perfected code under which future generations could live and prosper.

Henry M. Wolcott, American Consul at Adelaide, and the host at the gathering, said that the government and people of the United States feel justifiably proud of the fact that so great a nation as Australia would emulate the American form of government. He affirmed in the words of Lincoln, "that American government was conceived in liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal." Australia has fostered this same idea from its colonial days and it is to be expected that under wise leadership Australia will continue to flourish economically and to hold its enviable place in the diplomatic circles of the world.

WELCOMED BY CONSUL

Consul Wolcott welcomed, in the name of his government, all of the guests, among whom were the following distinguished Australians: Lord Mayor of Adelaide, the Right Honorable C. R. J. Glover; Alderman George McEwin, President of the English Speaking Union; the Honorable A. A. Simpson, ex-Mayor and Vice President of the Chamber of Commerce; Colonel Edward Deaner, D.S.O., V.D.; Colonel Tristram James, members of the local consular body and other representative Australians.

The portrait of Washington that was dedicated at this splendid event was later presented to the Y. M. C. A. in Adelaide where it now hangs in a conspicuous place for all members and visitors to view. The Consul reports also that in honor of George Washington he presented several volumes of American History, including Truslow Adams "Epic of America" and Bicentennial literature to public libraries in Adelaide.

Of particular significance, the Consul says, was the attitude of the Adelaide Press with respect to the Bicentennial. Full accounts of the reception at the Consulate appeared in the ADELAIDE ADVERTISER and the ADELAIDE NEWS together with the picture of the American flag and George Washington. On Washington's birthday the ADELAIDE

ADVERTISER, in editorial form, outlined the life and achievements of George Washington as follows:

"The world knows nothing of its greatest men." Fortunately the much quoted aphorism of Philip van Artevelde is not true in all cases, for, if it were, biographical literature would be deprived of one of its principal glories, in George Washington, the Bicentenary of whose birth in Virginia will be celebrated next week. He is the subject of many volumes, historic, military, constitutional, and anecdotal, and his own writings were not meagre in quantity or substance, so that those who, with tongue or pen, will presently be sounding his praises on both sides of the Atlantic, will not find themselves gruelled for lack of matter. Only the other day THE ADVERTISER noticed in its literary columns the latest contribution to the epic story of the War of Independence in the shape of a voluminous monograph which naturally was chiefly concerned with the part played in that eventful struggle by the Commander-in-Chief of the rebel forces. In the light of a century and a half of research, it is able to ascribe the success of the Americans less to their own prowess, than to the strategic blunders of Lord Cornwallis, and—a great factor—to the accession of strength derived from the co-operation of the French fleet, whose superiority to the available British warships deranged the plans of the generals and fatally disheartened their army.

Apparently, the military genius of the war was not George Washington, but Nathaniel Greene, who, by taking the fearful risk of dividing forces already small, fatally harassed Cornwallis in guerilla tactics—in his own words, "fighting, getting beaten, and fighting again," and becoming in turn pursued and pursuer. But while Washington might have been supplanted in the field by Greene without much injury to the American cause, it was the extraordinary diplomatic skill and tact of the former which carried America through her early post-war difficulties. For a time it seemed as though the independence which had been won so laboriously was to be wrecked by the jealousies of the individual States, which had been so long "colonies" with their own traditions and prejudices, that they found it difficult to bring themselves to submit to any general head. The constitution on which our own is so largely based, is often spoken of as a masterpiece, but it was in reality a compromise. So far, indeed, from being regarded by the leading members of the convention that framed it as perfect, or even as an approach to what might, in other circumstances, have been formulated, many of them despaired at times of ever being able to weld the thirteen colonies into anything like a nation; and only dread of the dangers which their isolated weakness would have invited compelled the assent of the various communities to the compact which, in 1789, brought the labors of the Congress of the Confederation to an end. But these difficulties only reflected the greater lustre on Washington, when he was called upon as the first President to rule like a pedagogue this refractory school. His way to the Presidency was not plain sailing. In the eyes of the world, Washington was the father of the New Nation, the one man to whom the most malignant enemies of the independent Provinces united in according respect, and even admiration. The Presidential College was not, however, in those days chosen by the people. In most of the States, the local legislatures arrogated to themselves that privilege, and in New York so bitter were the feelings between the Assembly, which was in the hands of the anti-Federalists led by Clinton, and the Senate, which was controlled by Hamilton and the Federalists, that no electors were chosen.

Hence the State in which, for the time being, the Capitol was placed did not cast a vote in the great Presidential election, and, during the first session of Congress under the constitution, had no representative on the floor of the Senate.

New Hampshire all but disfranchised itself in a similar manner, and so torn by faction were the other States that when the sixty-nine electors met, not six of them were formally pledged to support any particular candidate, not that any other choice than the national hero was possible. But, "fickle as the restless sea," the masses soon ceased to be of one mind as to the character of their leader; and the varying estimates formed of that character give point to Robert Walpole's exclamation, "Don't talk to me of history, for that I know is false!" Even when the facts are clear, their interpretation is often a matter of controversy. It is certain, for example, that Jefferson was given the highest post in Washington's Cabinet, notwithstanding that he led the opposition to the constitution and thus established himself a political opponent of Washington. Was this magnanimity on the latter's part, or was it, as his critics still say, ignorance of Jefferson's constitutional views? If we adopt the rule of the law courts and give Washington the benefit of the doubt, we may dismiss most of the charges against him, and for the rest admit extenuating circumstances in the provocation he received from his foes who, as he said in a letter still extant, attacked him in terms that could "scarcely be applied to a Nero, a notorious defaulter, or even a common pickpocket." One accusation was that, like Cromwell, he aspired to royal honors, an allegation which seems to have had no better foundation than the sparing use he made of his hand, which he held behind him at Presidential receptions, substituting for the usual handshake a stately and perhaps too distant bow. He certainly never forgot the aristocratic stock in the North of England from which he descended; and if he "gave himself airs" on the strength of it, the fault was a venial one to set against the benefit his country derived from his highmindedness, courage, and public spirit. The love of liberty which inspired his protest against the encroachment on it by the Government of George III, was shown in his advocacy of the legislative abolition of slavery, and the emancipation by will of his own slaves, the aged and infirm among whom he generously supported. Not all the anecdotes recorded of him are correct; but he would be remembered, if for nothing else, for having involuntarily endowed his countrymen with the generic term "Brother Jonathan," a playful appellation he was frequently heard to apply to his secretary, Colonel Jonathan Trumbull. The Bicentenary is not to pass unregarded in Great Britain, where, according to the preparations, there will be a liberal display of the Stars and Stripes. Such a demonstration will appeal to the American mind, which even in W. H. Lecky's day had come to take a more kindly view of the British case, recognising, as that historian puts it, that, if taxing America was a blunder, yet it did not spring from selfish motives, since every penny raised was to be devoted to the defence of the thirteen colonies against French or other aggression.

STREETS NAMED FOR WASHINGTON

The American Consul in Sydney, Australia, Roger Culver Tredwell, motivated by the Bicentennial, made diligent inquiry into the question as to whether there were any places or objects in Australia named for George Washington. He discovered that on the Island of Tasmania, the City of Hobart, there was a Washington Street, and likewise two Washington streets in the suburbs of Sydney, in Bexley and Rockdale, in the city proper and there are three thoroughfares bearing the name of Washington; Washington Place, Washington Lane and Washington Street.

The Consul submitted this information to show the past regard in Australia in honoring this great man.

WASHINGTON HONORED IN MELBOURNE

Melbourne, Australia's second largest city and capital of the state of Victoria, asked itself during 1932 "What manner of man was this soldier-statesman, Washington, who is thus internationally honored?" The answer to the question was given by way of public and editorial tribute, by a series of articles on the biographical details of Washington's life and a library display of documents and letters contemporaneous with colonial America.

What THE SUN, Melbourne newspaper, terms "Melbourne's Washington Bicentenary celebration" was held on September 1, 1932, in Melba Hall. The event was in the nature of a public testimonial and was arranged by authority of the city officials and under the direction of the Bureau of Social and International Affairs. At the head of this institution is Mr. Herbert Brookes, former Australian Commissioner General to the United States.

To Mr. Brookes must go the credit for bringing about this celebration. While on duty in the United States Mr. Brookes became acquainted with Dr. Albert Bushnell Hart at the Cosmos Club in Washington, D. C. At the time Dr. Hart was Historian for the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission. He explained the international significance of the George Washington year to Mr. Brookes, who later returned to Australia filled with the desire to stage a suitable celebration in his homeland.

ENTHUSIASM BRINGS RESULTS

That this enthusiasm took material form is evident from correspondence had by the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission with Nora W. Collisson, secretary of the Bureau of Social and Industrial Affairs, who says in a letter of March 30, 1932:

Both as a gesture of friendship towards your great country and as an opportunity of valuable educational work among our own people, we strongly feel that the opportunity of joining in the world-wide celebrations, in connection with the Bicentennial is one of which we should take full advantage. We shall deem it a privilege to celebrate as splendidly as lies within our means, the glorious anniversary that your nation is commemorating.

The Bureau of Social and International Affairs in Australia is a central secretarial and organizing service for international societies including the League of Nations and the Institute of Pacific relations. It carries on its educational and pacific activities through the schools, county centers, women's clubs, the radio and quasi-governmental organizations. Consequently, the sponsorship of a George Washington event by this organization was at once dignified and far-reaching in effect.

The first part of the program consisted of an address by Mr. Bernard Heinze upon the subject "Music Contemporaneous with the Time of Washington." This address was especially interesting, being punctuated by music dedicated to Washington in his day and rendered for the event by a string quartet and two vocal soloists.

The principal address of the evening was delivered by Mr. Brookes and it was thought so splendid a discourse that it was later issued in pamphlet form by the Victoria Protestant Federation and circulated in considerable number. We herewith quote Mr. Brookes' address in full:

Let us now praise famous men and the fathers who have begotten us. Leaders of the people by their counsel, wise and eloquent in their instructions, all these were honoured in their generations and were the glory of their times. Their bodies are buried in peace, but their name liveth for evermore.—Ecclesiasticus, The Apocrypha.

No wonder that their glory standeth, when all dissemblers have passed away.—Translation from a Tamil manuscript.

He is like a tree planted by a stream, that bears fruit in due season, with leaves that never fade; whatever he does he prospers.—The Psalms.

The mind and soul of a great nation has been directed for decades upon the character and achievements of George Washington. No historic personality has ever won the reverence and affection of so many millions of people in so short a period of time.

During this year, from February the 22nd to November the 24th the Bicentennial commemoration of his birth has been arranged throughout the United States and, indeed, in every country of the world. Every hour of his life has been carefully investigated by the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission which has been engaged for the past three years in making arrangements for the ceremonies on a nation-wide scale.

No detail of his life as a man, as a soldier, as a citizen, as an American, as founder of the Republic and father of his country has been left unexplored. There would be no justification, save from the point of view of an International gesture, to turn over this already intensely cultivated soil. I want to do something quite different to-night, something, I hope, worth while and something which the average American speaker generally avoids even if he has, which is questionable, an understanding of the particular point of view set forth to-night.

It has become far too customary in this modern world, and especially among ourselves, to associate with one's conception of the United States of America a composite picture of high power salesmanship, super criminality, corruption, sensuality and reckless lawlessness.

Let us turn away to-night from this partial view and concentrate our attention on the dimension and dramatic interest of one of the greatest and most characteristic products of American civilisation.

The world, and especially America, knows George Washington as the father of his country, "first in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen."

To this aspect of his life nothing can be added, so carefully has every sixty seconds been traversed by his biographers. He himself has been of great assistance to them by reason of the fact that, in addition to having made innumerable contacts with individuals who have left records of his personality, he himself kept a diary and was, moreover, a most voluminous letter writer.

Naturally, I do not desire to dwell on this aspect of the man, though, of course, one must inevitably pay one's homage to his greatness and his achievement in this regard. Rather do I desire to concentrate upon some aspects of his character and his life which stamp him as the greatest and truest of Colonial Englishmen and the finest flower of English civilisation of the eighteenth century British Empire—an Empire which easily transcended anything of the kind that had existed up until that time in the history of the world. While it is perfectly true that it had not yet reached the highest possible point in Imperial relationship, and had yet to discover by trial and error what were the exact functions, what the limits, and what the spheres of influence, respectively, of the Motherland and her Colonies, nevertheless it was "facile princeps" amongst the colonising nations of the world.

I want to re-create very briefly a conception of that Empire in rough, bold outlines, in order to reveal the environment and the conflicting ideals that obtained in this, the freest Empire the world has yet witnessed. I want to discover our man, George Washington, in this setting, living and moving to high and dramatic issues, driven by the force of circumstances and by his own conceptions of freedom, justice, fair play, and the will of God.

My hand shall be guided by those modern American historians who have practised the divine art of reconstructing the past. Chief amongst these, whom I select, are Beard and Beck and Butler, Hart and Channing and Vantyne, Truslow Adams, and Munro.

With their aid let us try to visualise the environment of the thirteen English colonies on the east coast of North America towards the end of the eighteenth century as far as it is possible in a few brief minutes.

I have chosen these historians as a guarantee that my foundations are laid secure upon the foremost research workers in the United States. It cannot, therefore, be argued that I am raising my superstructure upon a false bottom. Granted it will sound very strange to most American ears, accustomed as they are to hearing about their leaders of the past invariably and hopelessly entangled in a mesh of myth and legend having no more foundation in fact than the myths and legends of ancient Greece and Rome.

Following close upon the heels of the dissolution of the Feudal system in England, which was the first country in Continental Europe to witness this spectacle, and accompanying the emancipation of the minds of men as a result of the renaissance, there went a moral revival which found its expression in the Reformation and subsequently in the counter-Reformation. The outlook on life was enlarged. The submission to restraint by either King or Church began to be challenged.

The break-up of the Feudal system in the United Kingdom resulted in men and women being sundered from their enforced attachment to the land, cast adrift and induced or compelled to migrate to wherever opportunity beckoned. In addition to this a bourgeoisie had been growing up in the cities and towns with capital to invest in enterprises, such as land settlement overseas. The lure of the new and more spacious world stimulated an enthusiasm for such development.

Yeomen, farmers and farm labourers, without ties to the soil or institutions or classes, were also eager to seek fresh fields and pastures new.

The freer position of woman in the United Kingdom fitted her as an admirable partner for the settler, the hunter, and frontiersman. Such women, both as mothers and wives, were skilled in many crafts, and along with the man constituted a unit that was capable of subduing the wilderness or the forest under conditions of perfect freedom, and in great measure accounted for the success of the Anglo-Saxon settlements as opposed to the Latin.

The influence of corporations in establishing settlements, developing self-dependence, and self-determination in the new lands which had been discovered by Columbus was unique.

In addition to this, the harsh measures adopted, both in Church and State under the Stuarts and the Archbishops, which conspired to enforce the supremacy of the King and conformity in religion, constituted an additional inducement and increased the flood of migrants.

Furthermore, the peculiar genius of the English people themselves for political and religious freedom was another factor contributing to their success. The philosophy of the rights of man developed by political thinkers like Locke, whose tercentenary falls this year, and Bentham and Hobbes; and the sovereignty of the individual soul as opposed to the divine right of King or Priest as asserted by the reformers, possessed their souls and qualified them as pioneers of a new civilisation in a new world.

In this way it will be seen that, in addition to those multitudes who went to the new world to better their material condition and prospects, there were other multitudes who sought freedom from the tyranny of the throne and the church, each of which assisted the other in their claim to authority. Furthermore, when England herself was plunged at a later date into the struggles of the Civil War, the issue of which temporarily removed these tyrannies within the United Kingdom, there developed another stream of migrants to the new world who, faithful to the Stuart cause, the Roman Catholic Church and the Established Church, fled from the tyranny of Parliament and the Protector and sought refuge in the colonies across the Atlantic and, for the most part, in the more southern ones of Virginia and Maryland.

Thuswise it developed that there were to be found in the colonies of America pilgrims and Puritans and dissenters in the northern and middle States, and Royalists and Episcopalians and Roman Catholics in the southern States.

For approximately 150 years, these subjects of the King and the English Empire were in constant contact with the frontier and frontier conditions of freedom, and were left for the most part for a considerable portion of this time to their own devices, with the result that English institutions and the English genius for freedom, political and religious, developed even more rapidly than in the Motherland.

We know, as a matter of fact, how, even as far back as around the year 1670, trouble arose when the Stuart King tried to enforce certain restrictions on the people of Massachusetts which, be it noted, was just a little over 100 years before the War of Independence.

One of the first cases of colonial defiance of the English Government was in 1664, when Charles II sent commissioners to regulate New England. At the mere hint that Massachusetts was to be asked to admit the substitution of the new Charter establishing a royal colony in place of their Corporate Charter with its self-rule, the Puritan rulers put their Charter in safe hands, manned the harbour forts, set new guns on its ramparts, and petitioned the King to let their law and liberties live.

"And it was so."

And their laws and their liberties grew by what they fed on and became more and more ingrained.

A similar spirit developed in varying degrees in the other colonies, so that by the middle of the eighteenth century the Lower House in nearly all the colonies had accepted, in practice at least, the powers and privileges of the British House of Commons, and, protest as they would the English authorities seemed unable to curb them.

When we turn to the more southern States we observe the growth of a similar self-dependence. In Virginia, the House of Burgesses supervised most expenditures, aside from the salary of the Governor, by insisting on their own right to appoint their own treasurer. To demand this right and to gain it was but to repeat in an American province the exercise of a right which Parliament first successfully asserted over Henry IV two centuries before in the Motherland.

In such an environment and with such a spirit English colonies lived and moved deeper into Democracy.

Of a truth, American civil liberty and American political institutions began wherever civil liberty and English political institutions began. Magna Charta and the rise of the power of Parliament are part of American history.

The Petition of Right and the Bill of Right applied to and directly affected the inhabitants of the American colony. By general consent and by explicit provision in some of the earlier state constitutions in America the common law of England was incorporated as part of American law.

It must be remembered that the American colonies were English constitutions worked for the most part by English men, although under new conditions, and that they cannot possibly be understood without a knowledge of the British Imperial system of which they were so essential a part.

To form any adequate conception of the Imperial situation in the eighteenth century, and to understand England's position and that of her colonies, we must place ourselves in a world not wholly unhappy under absolutism, and for which the curtain had not yet been lifted upon the stage where democracy was to take the leading part in the drama. We must see England, not yet fully prepared, compelled to solve at once the problem of Imperial organisation, and with such dim light as the experience of mankind then offered.

The lessons of history, the lamp of reason, the observation of contemporary colonizing nations were not sufficient guides to the upper regions of Imperial statesmanship. Unable to penetrate the veil that hid Great Britain's own successful future in Canada and Australia, and her other self-governing dependencies, the choice seemed to her statesmen to lie between letting the colonies set up for themselves like Greek cities . . . or in mild imitation of Rome and Spain, to keep them in a state of at least partial subordination.

The plan actually attempted, that of centralizing the control of the colonies, was chosen with perfectly good intent on the part of the British Government, but because of the whole colonial experience in the freedom-giving life of the American forest, it looked to the Colonial like a plot to establish tyranny.

In 1763 British Imperial attainment had reached the crest of the wave upon which it had been rising since the days of Raleigh. Not even the most dismal Cassandra would then have prophesied an approaching loss of half the Empire which had been growing so rapidly for one hundred and fifty years.

No less a person than Chief Justice Marshall, however, is authority for the statement that "at no period of time was the attachment of the colonies to the mother country so strong, or more general, than in 1763, when the definitive articles of the treaty which restored peace to Great Britain, France, and Spain were signed!"

As can be seen to-day, Great Britain was so nearly in sight of the promised land that one wonders why she did not enter in and possess it.

But there was some distance to be traversed still.

Had the men who held in their hands the fate of the King's dominions looked less to theories of the imperial law and more to what was actually going on within the Empire, a federal solution would have been all in their grasp.

It had long been the custom for the Crown, the active instrument for Imperial Government, to control through instructed officers many colonial affairs. Its charge throughout the Empire of the navy, and army, of war and peace, of all foreign affairs was scarcely opposed. The colonial postoffice was in its charge, Indian trade and affairs were being taken over, as was the regulation of the back lands and the building of new colonies. Imperial trade and navigation laws were enforced by the Crown, and though offensive in a degree to the colonists, the right was little questioned.

On the other hand, the colonies levied their own local taxes and looked after their own internal police. They even contributed in a niggardly way, but of their own will, to the defence of the Empire. They managed a multitude of the concerns of the colonists' daily life with only a little nagging from the royal governor.

Great Britain had, by 1760, a working plan that was federal, a political system in which the usual powers of government, separated and distinguished, were distributed between governments accustomed to keep within their own spheres and to exercise only their proper quotas of authority.

Except for the disputed right of Parliament, the central authority to exact money directly from the colonists for imperial use, the scheme of distribution of powers which, a generation later, was to be embodied in the American Federal Constitution was already the practice of the British Empire.

But alas for the majesty of the Empire, it was upon this very rock it split and bifurcated into two great segments of the English-speaking world.

Fundamentally, it will be found that beneath all the conflicting claims and causes of disagreement one alone stands out pre-eminent and sufficient. The Parliament at Westminster challenged the Parliaments of the Colonies, and in particular those of Massachusetts and Virginia. Herein was the real cause of the rupture, concealed as it is so frequently beneath the assertion of unjust claims by a tyrant king.

The unfortunate thing for the British Empire of that day was the fact that the Parliament at Westminster lagged behind those of its daughters in the colonies in America, which had become, during well nigh one hundred years of development under frontier and distant conditions, free to respond to the ideals and aims of the American democracy. Whereas in the United Kingdom, and especially in England, the Parliament at Westminster unfortunately only represented a minority of the English democracy until half a century later, when the great Reform Bill helped to make vocal a greater percentage of the English electorate.

Herein lies the real explanation of the clash of the systems and the challenge and claim of the freer colonies. Devolution—Imperial Devolution—had not been then completely discovered, although that same English Empire came so close to it that it is almost a marvel that it did not then materialize.

The battle of the Parliaments was waged at the Philadelphia Convention behind closed doors, between Englishmen of the Colonies of such intellectual stature as the world had not, and has not since, witnessed. In their hearts the majority were still loyal to the Empire and the throne, and agreed to the Declaration of Independence only as a threat to force a compromise with King and Parliament satisfactory to the Colonial claims.

But the feeling outside was rebellious and resentful in many quarters, and was aggravated by the propaganda of an active and vigorous minority, chiefly from Massachusetts and Virginia, who saw to it that such conflicts arose as to make compromise impossible. And so the Revolution was launched and the Second English Civil War was fought, not on the soil of the Motherland, but in her Colonial possessions, fought by Englishmen against a handful of other loyal subjects with a section of the British Fleet and thousands of hired mercenaries who were continually deserting to the rebel colonists.

It has been estimated, says Butler, that by 1776, when the population of the Colonies amounted to something more than two millions, two-thirds were English stock, one-sixth of Scotch-Irish stock, one-tenth of German stock, and the remainder of other race origin. Nevertheless, it was from those of English stock that the chief impulses to revolution came. It was by them that the fires of discontent were fed, and it was largely under their leadership that national independence was achieved.

Read the signatures to the Declaration of Independence and marvel when you find other than an English name.

The British Empire, says Van Tyne, was doomed to be broken asunder, but it was brought to that disaster by the insistent demand of Englishmen in America for the full enjoyment of those liberties which England had fostered beyond any other country of the world.

The Revolution developed out of this Imperial evolution and struggle. Independence was won by thirteen English colonies to develop their English institutions in their own way. And the Constitution of the United States was framed by Englishmen along the lines of English tradition, English law, and English constitutional government.

As the Harvard American historian, T. B. Munro, has written, "The makers of the American Constitution neither began nor finished their work in the summer of 1787. Their descendants have kept bravely at their work ever since the great convention at Philadelphia adjourned."

And may I add their descendants at Westminster, at Ottawa, and in Australia and New Zealand and in South Africa and in the British Islands of the Seven Seas have likewise devoted themselves to the fashioning of this constitutional instrumentality. With none of them has the perfect instrument yet been devised. But it shall yet emerge somewhere within the English-speaking Union.

This, then, is the stage upon which, and the environment in which, one of the great epic dramas of history was played to the bitter end and turned the current of history. And this was the spirit of the age. Behold the actors.

Statesmen and politicians and lawyers on the one side in the Motherland struggling with constitutional and imperial problems and just missing the solution which had hitherto never troubled the Empires of the past to discover. On the other side a group of colonial parliamentarians in the thirteen colonies on the American seaboard, of such political calibre and mentality and character as had scarcely been seen in the world before.

And behold, out of their midst steps forth into the position of leadership and command the majestic figure of George Washington.

He was the living embodiment of all these forward-looking Colonial principles. In him they were made flesh and walked glorified. In presenting these ideas I have at the same time revealed in part the soul of George Washington.

No one amongst the two million and more colonists approached him as a full-orbed personality, not even such giants as Benjamin Franklin, Jefferson, Hamilton, and the rest.

This great Colonial Englishman and Virginian gentleman had no peers among his contemporaries, and of a truth there were many giants in those particular days. His forbears in England had been loyal supporters of the Stuart cause. They were Royalists and fought with the King against Parliament. And when that cause was lost decided to sacrifice all and leave the United Kingdom and settle in the colony of Virginia rather than submit to what they regarded as the tyranny of the Commonwealth Parliament and Protector.

Viewed from any other standpoint than that of "Sub specie æternitatis," the Muse of history might appear to have an ironic strain in her character. Who would have suspected that the great grandson of that ardent young Royalist, John Washington, who migrated when the King of England was beheaded, would become in his day and generation the leader of a colonial rebellion against the same throne which had to a degree by then changed its personnel from the House of Stuart to the House of Hanover? And yet the philosophic student of history is accustomed to such apparent "volte faces" and paradoxes with the generations and is forced to admit that God is wiser than man.

John Washington fled his country and founded his family fortunes in Virginia. Another relative and predecessor who lived in England, Lawrence Washington, was a well-to-do wool merchant and Mayor of Northampton. He built Sulgrave Manor in the heart of rural England in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, and was a Bencher of Gray's Inn. This Inn not only suggested the design of the building in Philadelphia wherein the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution were both written, but supplied inspiration to many of the leaders of colonial thought.

It is surely more than a coincidence that the Washington family's coat-of-arms—two red bars and three stars—suggested the conception of the flag of the Republic. "Old Glory," in all probability, then, with her additional stars and bars for the States that were formed and embraced within the federation subsequently, is even more English than the Union Jack in its origins.

The world knows well the outstanding incidents in George Washington's career. His early youth was lived in close contact with the soil and the life of the farmer. After his school days were over he launched out on the career of a surveyor, and in pursuit of his profession spent several years in this work out on the frontiers and amidst the forests and mountains of the hinterland. How well he got to learn its capabilities and its possibilities! His family and himself invested in the land settlement schemes of those days and held great areas of this virgin country which was the happy hunting grounds of the Red Indians. France was disputing the claim to expansion in this new world and was throwing a line of forts down along the Mississippi valley from the Great Lakes and Canada.

Washington is sent to negotiate by the English Governor of Virginia, and subsequently leads the Colonial militia and joins the staff of the English General engaged in contesting the claims of France.

Disaster, defeat and failure at first, for which he is in no way responsible, was followed by complete and ultimate success subsequently, with laurels of renown for Washington. Then follows the triumph of the English and the attempt to organise this new Empire, which led to the rebellion and, under the leadership of Washington, the Declaration of Independence and the framing of the Constitution.

The soldiers and their general offer him the Crown and throne of the new England in the West. His reply and refusal makes a being like Napoleon look a pigmy alongside his majestic stature, with its self-effacing, man-loving, and God-trusting characteristics.

And then at a later date, when his country had been steered through the perils and pitfalls of its earliest years by his wise leadership as President, he makes the second great renunciation and refuses the third term of office as President, in part as an example to all future aspirants, and in part to demonstrate that he has no designs on a permanent rulership under cover of the title of President.

Surely in this regard he transcends that other great Englishman, Cromwell, from whose life and work he drew such inspiration. I need not traverse the incidents in his life story any further, save in one direction only, and that with an object to support the aspect I am endeavoring to emphasize.

Not only was he for many years a good and efficient and loyal soldier of the King, but he had in his early life set his heart upon a commission in the Royal Navy. His half-brother, Lawrence, who had been a Captain under Admiral Vernon, in command of the English fleet in the West Indies, and who, on retiring through illness, settled on his farm lands in Virginia and called the place Mount Vernon, after his commander, encouraged his brother, George, whom he deeply loved, in his ambition, and purchased for him the necessary outfit and arranged for him to enter the service. George was on the point of departure when the two brothers visited their mother on the farm she managed since she lost her own husband, and broached the subject. Mary, his mother, forbade her young son to go, and was so adamant that he, after one of the heroic struggles of his career, yielded obedience to his beloved mother.

Thuswise did the Sentinel of this world, that slumbers not nor sleeps, shape this youth into an instrument to accomplish His will in quite another direction.

The freer step, the fuller breath,
The wide horizon's grander view,
The sense of life that knows no death,
The Life that maketh all things new.

So in very truth the spirit of God moves over the lives of men all powerful as the wind that blows, and viewless, too.

And so this exquisite Puritan and grave cavalier, this spiritually-minded man of the world, was chosen by the Eternal to become the father of his country and the founder of a new and great Republic.

But this does not alter the fact that he is and was one of those stars of greater magnitude that shine forever within the English-speaking constellation.

In the education of mankind, as of the individual, it is not the times of peaceful and gainful prosperity that test the character, light up the thoughts, and quicken the hearts of men. On the contrary, as Martineau had said, it is in the days of peril, in the crises of anguish, that the force of character steps forth, and constitutes itself, and under some high and daring guidance, finds a footing on the rock and retakes the citadel of hope.

Had Thebes never been humbled she would have found in Epanimondas no deliverer to illuminate her page in history. Had Athens never been abandoned to the Persian invader, there would have been no magic in the name of Marathon of Salamis.

Had Rome seen nothing but an Augustan age, she might have had historians if there had been any history to tell, and poets, if they could dispense with high admirations and sing without the material of great actions, and philosophers if the problems of the world had ever agitated the sleeping experiences of men. But it was tyranny of Tarquin that created the Republic, it was from the cloud of Carthaginian invasion that Scipio emerged, it was amid the shame of spreading corruption that the noble protest of Stoic virtue arose, and mingled a melancholy majesty with the Empire's fall. Nor is it otherwise with any State that has earned a remembrance of itself.

Had it not been for the struggles and sacrifices endured during the War of Independence, the colonists would never have won a place in the eyes of the world or on the page of history in the way they did.

A world without a contingency or an agony could have no hero and no saint. Without Valley Forge and the crossing of the Delaware, or some such similar experiences, Washington would have pursued the even tenor of his way and life at Mount Vernon, and the world would have never known one of its greatest heroes.

There never was a time in all probability, when life was so strenuous, intense and complex as it is in the whirl of civilization today.

The clank and clamor of its vast machine. Competition and publicity crowding out leisure and privacy. Peace of mind lost in the nervous hurry. The consuming and thronging interests of business and the business-like character of our amusements leave little room for a quiet composure of soul; and life, which should be liberty, becomes imprisonment, as that present-day saint, Francis G. Peabody, has said.

The contemplation of a soul like Washington's gives us peace and hangs a compass in our lives, and enables us to steer our vessel over the wildest waters and through the darkest nights.

The Constitutional historian, Beck, has said, "The ages have enthroned him in the great arena of history as a Homeric king of men, and before him the unending generations pass with the salutation, MORITURI TE SALUTAMUS."

His pre-eminence can be tested by the fact that if the wise and good of all the cultural nations of our present civilization were asked to select the three noblest characters of history, the name of George Washington would be on almost every list. Name another of whom this could be said.

Today, as always, his character is, as the shadow of a great rock in a weary land, it is their noblest heritage.

Any eulogy must be inadequate, for the immortal substance of his reputation defies definition, and posterity contents itself by saying, with Abraham Lincoln, "In solemn awe pronounce his name, and in its naked deathless splendor, leave it shining on."

OTHER EVENTS IN MELBOURNE

Although the public celebration on September 1 in Melbourne was perhaps the outstanding contribution to the Bicentennial in Australia, there were other Washington commemorative events in Melbourne during the year. Notable among these was a Bicentenary ball on the evening of July 4. This social function was under the auspices of the English Speaking Union and was held in one of the large halls in the city. Mr. Herbert Brookes, Vice President of the Union, and Mrs. Brookes, and the American Consul and Mrs. John W. Dye received the guests, among whom were prominent Australians and Americans resident in Victoria. The display of American and Australian flags, the rendering of patriotic music of both countries, and the general atmosphere of camaraderie at the ball made it one to be long remembered in the relations of the two great continents.

The public library in Melbourne displayed in its main reading room beginning July 4 a collection of original letters by famous Americans. The exhibit included a three-page letter by George Washington and a long letter written during the War of Independence by John Adams, second President of the United States.

During the latter part of the Bicentennial year the American Consul at Melbourne wrote to the George Washington Bicentennial Commission to the effect that the "revised curriculum of the Victorian State schools provides in the senior grades, for an increased study of the United States from both an historical and a geographical standpoint." The Consul requested a supply of historic material in the form of pictures, maps, and pamphlets, believing that the furnishing of this material by a governmental agency would assist in increasing friendly feeling and awakening interest generally among Australians toward the United States.

In response to this request, which no doubt owes in a measure its inception to the Bicentennial celebration, the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission sent a large supply of material for distribution in the schools and at the time of the compilation of this record it was the understanding of the Commission that the distribution had been made. Thus another link was welded in the chain of friendship between Australia and America.

Brisbane and Perth had no public celebrations in honor of George Washington that were recorded, but it is interesting to note that the leading newspapers of both cities gave liberally of their space for explaining the history and character analysis of Washington. The following editorial, for instance, appeared in THE COURIER, Brisbane, February 20, 1932:

On Monday the United States of America will celebrate throughout its length and breadth the Bicentenary of George Washington, who first saw the light of day, on the southern shore of the Potomac, on February 22, 1732. Nowhere will these celebrations be carried out with greater enthusiasm than in his native Virginia. "Virginia gave us this imperial man," exclaimed James Russell Lowell in his noble panegyric, "Under the Old Elm," and there the two hundredth anniversary of Washington's birth will be commemorated with almost proprietary rights. Yet George Washington does not belong to Virginia alone, or even to America alone, but to the world; and no civilized country, least of all the Commonwealth of Nations which makes up the British Empire, from which he broke away, is likely to let so notable an event pass without paying a worthy tribute to this king of men.

It has to be confessed that certain of the early biographers of George Washington have invested his character with an air of priggishness which did not belong to it, especially the Rev. Mason L. Weems, of Virginia, who deliberately invented the celebrated cherry tree and hatchet legend in order to inculcate in young readers the virtue of truthfulness, and whose books, Professor Trent, of Columbia, ruefully admits, "still sell among readers who represent the intellectual level of large masses of the American people a century ago." The Duke of Wellington suffered from the same hagiological instinct, and readers know how much more enthralling is the unblurred portrait of "The Duke" by Mr. Philip Guedalla. A somewhat similar service has recently been done to Washington as a soldier by Lieutenant-Colonel Whitton, a recognized military authority whose "American War of Independence," published by John Murray, has illuminated many obscure passages in that great struggle, and, by correctly focussing the genius of the American commander-in-chief, has added lustre to that great name. The process of canonization has too often provoked a reaction to the opposite extreme of denigration, but from this Washington has suffered less than most idols of the people.

Lieutenant-Colonel Whitton certainly has not yielded to this reaction. He is only concerned with Washington as a soldier, and with all the resources of the Clements Library in the University of Michigan at his disposal he has written a history of the American War which is not only documented with extraordinary thoroughness, but has the charm of perfect lucidity. Most popular histories of Britain's one great failure in colonial government are content with recording the campaigns in the main theatre of the war, but Colonel Whitton has also described the operations in the South, which are usually neglected, although it is necessary to understand them in order to appreciate the campaign which culminated in the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown.

Anyone inclined to think that the temporary loss of sea power by England would not affect Australia to any extent should carefully study the part played by the French navy in that disaster to British arms. Perhaps George III, derived some consolation from the fact that the French, after securing for America the blessings of freedom, bethought themselves of enjoying the same liberty at home, and carried thither the seeds of a revolution compared with which the American Revolution was a humane and bloodless affair. Colonel Whitton makes it perfectly plain that the geographical obstacles to speedy communication between England and America were among the chief factors in creating the bad blood that led to the War of Independence. Every schoolboy knows the incident of "the Boston Tea Party" on the evening of December 16, 1773, by a gang of men dressed as Mohawk Indians, under the direction of Samuel Adams; but it is not so generally known that the tea thrown into the sea was both finer and cheaper, in spite of the duty, than the stuff which colonial merchants were smuggling in, and that it was the fear of this competition which induced these otherwise conservative traders of Boston to get rid of it. As a contemporary writer put it: "The Sons of Liberty were sensible that if the tea was landed and stored it would somehow or other receive a sale; and that the virtue of the people to decline buying and using a commodity to which they were so attached from love and habit was too precarious a ground on which to risk the salvation of their country." One has only to read the letters of Horace Walpole, another contemporary, to his friend, Horace Mann, in Florence, to discover how little the hearts of the English people were in the American War. British officers, retired to New England, did not think themselves traitors in supporting the exasperated Colonials; while General Benedict Arnold, disgusted with the unreliable American militia, deserted to the British side.

Amid all these confused issues and swerving loyalties Washington stands out in the strength of his incorruptible soul. Though in the French and Indian war he had fought with consummate coolness, he had so little taste of campaigning that he married a wealthy widow and settled down to the domesticities of his Virginia estate while the war raged for those two stirring years which culminated in the battle of the Heights of Abraham and the surrender of the French army to Amherst at Montreal. During that heroic struggle for American freedom from French encirclement George Washington "was living peacefully on his estate in Virginia, like a country gentleman, growing and selling tobacco, purchasing slaves, and ordering dandified suits from London."

As Colonel Whitton puts it: "It would almost seem that the great struggle between French and English for dominion in America was to Washington nearly as remote as would have been a planetary struggle between the inhabitants of Mars." This, however, is on the negative evidence of Washington's frigid diaries, which have filled his romantic biographers with despair. But when the hour of his destiny struck, Washington stepped into the arena a very different person from "the shrewd young man" of Thackeray's "Virginians." It was not his military record that warranted his appointment in 1775 as commander-in-chief of the American forces, for there were others with higher claims and more recent laurels. But it was considered a fine stroke of diplomacy to secure Virginia and the South to the Revolution. But if Washington was placed in this position of supreme responsibility for other reasons than his own soldierly skill, he is one of those men whom responsibility makes greater and greater, till they out-top all their fellows. Colonel Whitton reminds us of the illusive militia over whom Washington was placed—men who thought nothing of throwing down their arms and going home. Yet, in spite of deserters, he made the army which endured that terrible winter at Valley Forge in hunger and cold, while political schemers were plotting to supersede him. None but a man of heroic mettle could have merged from that double ordeal. And then, when independence was won, it was he whose political wisdom welded the States together in face of the rampant divisive courses of place-hunters and log rollers.

George Washington was a king of men, like Abe Lincoln after him. Yet little more than a century ago a man was sent as a convict to Australia for praising him.

The following item is taken from THE WEST AUSTRALIAN, Perth, February 22, 1932:

Today the bicentenary of the birth of George Washington, "The Father of the American people," will be recognized not only in the United States, which he helped to found, but in many other lands. Phillip Guedalla, one of the brighter historians of our day, has remarked that it is a wise country that knows its own father and goes on to point out how fortunate it is for the United States that one man should have been so definitely its chief founder, for in that grand and aloof figure they have been able to idealize the true American citizen, an exemplar for all time. It was fortunate, for this purpose, that Washington was the man he was and, no doubt, all fervant Americans today will hope that from the contemplation of that figure there will come a stirring of men's hearts with the highest ideals of patriotism and good citizenship during the solemn pilgrimages to Mt. Vernon and the gatherings at the National Monument. The outside world, hoping with the same hope, might risk being considered rude if it gently quoted on the same occasion one of the best-known sayings of Washington: Let us impart all the blessings we possess, or ask for ourselves, to the whole family of mankind.

NEW ZEALAND

NE hundred and sixty citizens of Auckland, New Zealand, joined in celebrating the Bicentenary of George Washington on February 22, 1932, as guests of the American Consul, Mr. W. F. Boyle and Mrs. Boyle, at a Bicentennial luncheon. Among the honored guests were the Mayor of Auckland, Hon. G. W. Hutchinson and Mrs. Hutchinson, Archbishop and Mrs. Averill, Sir Alexander Herdman and Lady Herdman, and representatives of various Government departments, the consular corps, local bodies and semi-public, professional, and commercial activities.

MAYOR OF AUCKLAND SPEAKS

The Mayor, in the course of a few informal remarks, said he recalled that in the eighteenth century there had been born in America a man who always told the truth. This, he had understood, was so unique that for two centuries the people of that country had celebrated the event every year. He believed that since Washington's day many people who told the truth had been born in the United States.

Speaking seriously, the Mayor said that any intention on his part to pronounce a eulogy upon Washington had been abrogated when he came across a passage in a recent American speech: "No sum can now be made of Washington's character that would not exhaust language of its tributes and repeat virtue by all its names; but, whether his character or achievements be regarded, the riches before us only expose the poverty of praise." The Mayor concluded by offering the Consul and Mrs. Boyle his felicitations upon the Bicentennial festival and the guests' gratitude for their hospitality.

Mrs. Boyle, who at her husband's request briefly addressed the gathering, recalled the pleasure that they both had found in entertaining Auckland friends at the Fourth of July luncheons. She did not intend to say anything about George Washington, but she would like to pay a tribute to the beloved wife who presided over Mount Vernon. No woman who visited that famous house and wandered about its lovely old garden could escape the home-like atmosphere of the place. It was easy to visualize there the "power behind the throne," the haloed and benignant face of its mistress, Martha Washington.

"On this great American anniversary a consul representing that nation would ill live up to tradition if he did not at least try to make a speech," said Mr. Boyle. No more fitting words could be used of Washington than "Lighthouse" Harry Lee's: "First in war, first in peace and first in the hearts of his countrymen," although orators had made the air blossom with panegyric and eulogy, statesmen had held up as an example, and unnumbered writers had recorded his heroic deeds.

The Consul spoke of Washington's military prowess, especially in defeat, and his inspiring example of unselfish leadership in the concrete affairs of State. "Though we of America honor the sword of Washington as the symbol of our independence," he said, "we honor him even more as the great civic leader who fixed the course of our ship of State and set the seal of his greatness on our national existence.

"And now, my British friends," said Mr. Boyle, in ending his eulogium, "though my words have come to me as an American, who from his mother's breast did nurse the spirit of his homeland, and who exults to share the heritage of Washington, I am yet aware that there could not be time more meet, nor company more fitting, to recall that Washington was born a subject of Great Britain and that his sword was first drawn in the service of a British king. And though your loyalties and ours are not as one, still between us there are everlasting bonds of tradition, of race and of blood. My friends, nothing is born into this world without pain, and the birth of the American nation was not without suffering, both by mother and by child. But even the pains of the Mother Country have long since healed, and those of us who think are coming more and more to understand just what the good will and the friendship of the English-speaking nations mean to this world."

CONSUL DISCUSSES WASHINGTON

Consul Boyle amplified the above remarks in a statement given to the New Zealand press and printed fully together with reports of the luncheon by such papers as THE NEW ZEALAND HERALD of February 23, as follows:

The place occupied by Washington in the hearts of the American people has been so high that at times it has been called deification, but although the average American has given to Washington a very high place among his ideals, it certainly does not approach deification, said Mr. Boyle. Only once in the history of the United States as a nation or as a group of colonies has a man so held the confidence and support of the people that his election to the Presidency has been unopposed. Our Presidents, with the exception of Washington, have always been the candidates of political parties, but it may be said of Washington that he has held the same non-party relation to the people of the United States that the British King holds to the people of his Empire.

The policies and precepts of Washington still serve as ideals for our contemporary political life. Although the days leading up to the revolution were marked by a great deal of oratory, and many harsh things were said of many of the leaders, the memory of Washington is always that of a cool and deliberate man, who weighed carefully that which he had to say, and was thoughtful of the worth of those to whom he was opposed.

Perhaps the greatest document by Washington was his Farewell Address to the American people; and it is this address which is still quoted in almost every political campaign in the United States. Perhaps the most used passage is that in which he advises us to cultivate friendly relations with all nations but to avoid all political alliances.

WELLINGTON HONORS WASHINGTON

Brief reports from Wellington, New Zealand, indicate that George Washington celebrations were held there on February 22, and July 4, 1932, and that both Americans and New Zealanders joined therein.

THE EVENING POST of Wellington, one of the progressive papers of the nation, devoted two columns of editorial space on February 27 to a discussion of President Hoover's George Washington Bicentennial address of February 22 before the joint session of Congress. The theme of the editorial was to the effect that Washington's more human attributes ought not to be minimized by any insincere and extravagant glorification of his name; for after all, he was no demigod, but a man. Its significance, so far as this record is concerned, lies in the fact that a newspaper on the other side of the world participated editorially in the Washington Bicentennial.

INDIA

TO three hundred and fifty million people of divergent religious, social and political views in India, George Washington is a great hero. But he is something more than that—he is a symbol of liberty. As such his memory was honored during the Bicentennial year of his birth in all parts of India.

A special George Washington number of an Indian magazine was issued; a group of Calcutta natives organized themselves into a George Washington Memorial society and sent a cablegram of felicitation to President Hoover on Washington's birthday; a Washington biography was translated into Sanskrit and circulated among natives not schooled in the English language; Indian newspapers and periodicals were generous with their news space and editorial comment on Bicentennial themes; and in many other ways did the people of India show their admiration for George Washington.

United States Government officials and representatives of business houses in India likewise honored George Washington. In Calcutta, Karachi, Bombay, and Rangoon, Burma, Americans paid tribute to the First President, by holding athletic contests, receptions, garden parties and colonial teas on Washington's birthday and again on Independence Day.

Kalidas Nag, a leader in Indian political life, alluded to George Washington as one whose "magnetic personality helps to concentrate the diffused idealism of the Indian youth into a scheme of life and action which will inaugurate a new era in the history of India." Benoy Kumar Sarker, a professor at Calcutta University, affirmed that—

The participation of the Indian people in the two hundredth birth anniversary of George Washington is well calculated to remain a landmark in the history of India's orientations to America and of America's orientations to our country.

Articles in the native press stressed Washington's self-effacement to fame and the personal sacrifices he made for the ideals of freedom. It is significant that in the printed matter received from India by the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission, George Washington is pictured as a patron saint of the liberty that is attained by right and righteous means. In no one of the articles is he portrayed as a usurper or a revolutionist who would over-ride all bounds of law and order to achieve his freedom-loving ends. Washington's philosophy was employed, it would seem, to temper and modify, rather than to incite the restive elements of the vast country. It might be said that India honored George Washington by associating his name with its own ambition, to take its place among the great nations of the world by applying the principles he advocated.

The Bicentennial in Calcutta, India's largest and most metropolitan city, was celebrated by the American diplomatic corps, government officials, native Indian organizations, and representatives of various American business enterprises.

Hon. A. C. Frost, American Consul General in Calcutta, informed the Bicentennial Commission that on July 4, 1932, he entertained at a George Washington dinner at his residence. More than twenty-five members of the American colony in the city attended this function. American flags and Bicentennial decorations were used and all of the toasts of the occasion were devoted to the Bicentennial theme.

WASHINGTON SOCIETY FORMED

Because of the complicated political situation in India, public displays of any extensive nature were under a ban, the American Consul General reported, and this prevented the holding of any great civic celebration such as had been contemplated. But that the year did not pass unnoticed by the native Indian is indicated by the fact that the native inhabitants, among the acts of honor to Washington, formed an organization called the "Bangiya George Washington Smriti Parishat" or the "Bengali George Washington Memorial Society."

On February 15, 1932, a pamphlet was issued by this organization signed by native Calcutta editors, authors, attorneys, city officials, bankers, land owners, pleaders, mill directors, teachers, and other professionals. The pamphlet, which bore the Stuart portrait of America's first President, was in the nature of an invitation to all Indian societies to do honor to George Washington during his Bicentennial and read as follows:

We have the honor to call upon the public associations, literary societies, scientific academies, industrial and commercial unions, libraries, research societies, universities, colleges and schools in different parts of Bengal to take steps in the matter of celebrating the George Washington Day (bicentenary) in the manner and on dates most convenient to them.

They are requested to make use of the Calcutta press in regard to the publication of their activities in this connection.

February 22 is the official date. But different dates during the year 1932 may be selected in different district, subdivisional and rural centres. The dates for Calcutta will be announced later. It is to be observed that the Day need not be given over exclusively to George Washington. The function should also comprise a reference to the diverse phases of American achievements in human welfare and progress.

The journals and reviews may issue a special "Washington and America" number, in order to signalize the occasion. It is in contemplation to publish in Bengali a book entitled George Washington and the United States. The volume, which is to be edited by Prof. Benoy Kumar Sarkar, will have among its contents a number of poems and essays by different authors on George Washington, as well as on American constitution, law, industry, technology, sciences and arts, literature, social service, education, etc.

This same organization met in formal capacity on Washington's birthday in the committee room of the Albert Hall in Calcutta, and unanimously shaped the following resolution, information concerning which was forwarded to the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission by Dr. Rafidin Ahmed, joint secretary of the Society:

"Resolved, that the following cable be sent to President Hoover of the United States of America over the signature of S. J. Ramananda Chatterjee, the President of the Parishat.

"Bengali George Washington Memorial Society celebrates George Washington's two hundredth birth anniversary and offers greetings to the American people.

"Ramananda Chatterjee,
President."

The cable message was duly received by the President of the United States.

PRESS OF INDIA COOPERATE

Calcutta newspapers and periodicals gave considerable publicity to the George Washington Bicentennial. A well written article in the AMRITA BAZAR PATRIKA, issue of Sunday, February 21, 1932, by Ramesh C. Ray, and an editorial in LIBERTY, Calcutta, February 22, 1932, sketched the highlights of Washington's biography. More lengthy articles in Sanskrit appeared in BANGABANI and ANANDA BAZAR on Washington's birthday, describing the life of the great American to those millions of Indians not versed in English.

The MUSSALMAN, Calcutta, of February 23, 1932, remarked: "It is gratifying to note that Bengal has associated herself with the celebration of the anniversary of the birth of this great historical personage. It is ennobling."

The following editorial of February 23, 1932, from ADVANCE, one of Calcutta's leading English newspapers, indicates the high regard for George Washington in the hearts of the sons of India:

Great men are objects of universal respect, admiration, and homage. No wonder, the second centenary of the birth of George Washington has inspired civilized humanity to pay their heart's tribute to a man who was an apostle of human freedom and was mainly instrumental in laying the foundation of American greatness. A noble cause never suffers from the want of a leader. The man comes at the right moment. If Americans were not fit to be a free nation in 1774 the world would not have heard of Washington. He would have lived and died as an honest and God-fearing farmer without leaving the impress of his life and character on the history of the world. Had he failed in his mission Washington would have swelled the list of rebels and anarchists. Success made him what he is today—the father of American Independence and the idol of a great and progressive nation.

The history of American Independence has always been a lesson for statesmen on whom devolves onerous responsibility for dealing with the affairs of millions of their fellow beings. But for the egregious bungling of George III and his Ministers, the history of America as well as of the world would have been differently written today. Had the British statesmen of the eighteenth century been a little less imperialistic in their outlook and temperament, and had they the same regard for the principle of "no taxation without representation" in its application to affairs of other parts of the Empire as they were zealous in upholding it in England, there would have been no War of Independence in America. The sagacious counsel of a small band of Imperialists of the right type with Edmund Burke at their head was brushed aside with thinly veiled contempt. The protests of Americans against taxation made no impression on British Ministers. Exhortations of Burke urging the British Government to make the tie binding the American colony with England as light as air and asking the British to treat the Colonists as grown up children who must have a voice in shaping their destiny, sounded as strange and incongruous theories in the ears of British Ministers. Burke's passionate appeal in the House of Commons to conciliate America by admitting in practice their right to protest and to be heard before they were made to pay any tax imposed against their will was treated as a counsel of perfection by an idealist.

More than a century and a half has elapsed since the great British political philosopher enunciated his doctrine of freedom for the constituent units of the Commonwealth as the surest way of cementing the loyalty of the colonies to the Mother country. Successive conventions culminating in the Statute of Westminster have completely changed the relations of the colonies to England. The tie binding them is not less strong today because it is "lighter than air." How far realization of the grave blunder committed by George III and his Ministers by their successors has led to the modification of the British policy in dealing with the Dominions it is not our purpose to speculate upon. That it has some bearing on the growth of the present day ideal of the British Commonwealth of Nations, where no member of the Commonwealth is "in any way subordinate to one another," can hardly be disputed. If America owes her present position and prosperity as the leading nation on earth to George Washington, his indirect contribution to the growth of the idea of Federation of fully autonomous States which Deshbandhu Chittaranjan Das held in his historic Faridpur speech as even a higher ideal than isolated independence, is no less valuable. Great a patriot as he was, Washington was still greater as a man who found his delight in serving humanity and the country. Duty was the watchword of his life so pregnant with lessons for generations of men.

The same issue of ADVANCE of Calcutta, carried a feature article written by Priyaranjan Sen, calling upon all people of India to remember "what a strong moral sense combined with a deep religious idea" characterized Washington, and concluding with the affirmation that "George Washington stands a remarkable ideal for mankind to aim at for ages to come." This article is quoted in full:

TRIBUTE TO GEORGE WASHINGTON

George Washington, the noble-hearted fighter in the cause of liberty!

Washington, who became successful in his fight for the salvation of the United States.

On the 22nd of February, two hundred years ago, the man was born in Virginia: he did not spend his time in winning laurels from schools and colleges, but after his sixteenth year became a surveyor; enlisted as an officer and fought with distinction in a war against the French and the Indians, when he was only 22; married at 27; responded to his country's call in 1774, when 42 years old; was appointed commander-in-chief of its army; retired, when he had fought to a successful finish; was persuaded to accept the Presidency, to which office he was elected unanimously for two terms; and finally retired to his estate at Mount Vernon, where he lived as a private gentleman till his death in 1799.

What is there to remember in his life, apart from the humdrum affairs with which our life is crowded and which bid fair to crowd out life from us?

He was not a professional soldier; he had no regular training in the line. Perhaps it was for this that he fought better, and conditions which would have seemed insurmountable to a regular soldier could not stop him. As a leader of men, his position was a difficult one; so difficult it was that many resigned, but not he. We read in the history of those days: 'There were not enough huts to house the army nor camp-kettles for cooking. Blankets were so few that many of the men were without covering at night. . . . The sick in particular suffered severely, for the hospitals were ill-equipped.' No straw, no blankets could be found for the sick who lay dying on the frozen ground, and about three thousand were reported unfit for duty, because they were almost naked through the long winter season. Many had to march barefoot, their blood dripping on the snow or the frozen ground. Washington writes of a certain camp that there were few who had more than a sheet, many only part of a sheet, and some nothing. Among the volunteers there were many who could not shoot and many who were either too old or too young to shoot effectively. To add to this, there was corruption, scramble for profiteering, craze for making money out of the American army contracts,—enough to shock the stubborn patriotism of a George Washington, or of a young La Fayette, who had joined in the fight,—not because he had some material gain in his view, but because he had been driven to it in a fine burst of idealism.

But his was a serenely poised soul,—George Washington's. He came nearest to despair in 1779–80 but he did not give in. The strain of a great movement is not in the early days of enthusiasm, but in the slow years when idealism is tempted by the strife of opinion and self-interest which brings delay and disillusion. But the soldiers stood by him,—no pay—no clothes—no provisions—no rum—this was their time, and they sang an ode to the glory of war and Washington. This was possible because he realised there was one and really one final issue.

In his first inaugural address as the Chief Magistrate or President he referred to 'frequent interruptions in his health'; still, he accepted the work; because it was of supreme importance. Was not the welfare of America closely linked with the welfare of mankind? Was not America 'the hope of the human race?' Hence his country's voice stirred always in him feelings of love and veneration, and he resolved to renounce every pecuniary consideration in the performance of his duty to the mother country, and, what is more, from this resolution he did not depart in a single instance.

Let us remember what a strong moral sense he had, combined with a deep religious idea. As a public man he had the greatest faith in a virtuous conduct.

'There exists in the economy and course of nature an indissoluble union between virtue and happiness, between duty and advantage, between the maxims of an honest and magnanimous policy and the solid rewards of public prosperity and felicity. . . . The propitious smiles of Heaven can never be expected on a nation that disregards the eternal rules of order and right which Heaven itself has ordained.'

Great both in his disinterested service and in his silent retirement (practically a self-effacement), George Washington stands a remarkable ideal for mankind to aim at for ages to come.

A most remarkable Bicentennial feature in India was the publication of a special George Washington edition of INDIA AND THE WORLD—An Organ of Internationalism and Cultural Federation—by the India Bureau, Calcutta. It is pointed out by Kalidas Nag, the editor of this magazine, that "India with her 350,000,000 population is no longer a negligible partner in the world federation. Her social, political, economic, and cultural problems have their direct bearing upon contemporary history. To focus the attention of different international organizations of the world upon India and to develop India's feeling of friendliness and co-operation, the India Bureau has decided to publish an organ INDIA AND THE WORLD." The magazine is devoted to affairs of international interest, education, survey of American organizations, science and letters, humanitarian movements, folk arts and crafts, religion, international understanding, and world peace. The George Washington issue was a symposium of these subjects with special relation to Washington ideals.

FAMOUS POET CONTRIBUTES ARTICLE

The leading article, "To America," contributed by India's famous poet, Rabindranath Tagore, to this magazine, is thought worthy of quotation in full in this record:

The discovery of America was followed by the discovery of Europe in a new soil and surroundings. Such an access of new experiences is necessary for all old cultures for their own rejuvenation. It was a fortunate accident which helped the western civilization through this transmigration to win a new term of life and further explore its possibilities under an unaccustomed stimulus.

During the middle ages the restless spirit of adventure in Europe went out seeking fortune in foreign lands. In America it built up a new habitation and produced its own wealth with the resources of a virgin continent and resourcefulness of a heroic inheritance. Through this process of creation strenuously followed it found back its youth and, severing its political connection with the mother race, began its independent career of nation building.

The first impulse of growth in this new national life went to the development of its material body.

Structure grew fast, inexhaustible sources of wealth were opened up and the material prosperity took on a magnitude unequalled in the whole world. But the inner spirit naturally takes a much longer time to mature its personality, and thus for a considerable period of time, the American mind appeared like a repetition of European mentality.

But life enriches and maintains itself in vigour, not through repetition, but through its renewal by variation, and I feel certain that such a course of life's variation is evolving a new personality in American civilization. Being young, she still has her faith in the eternal reality of ideals, and that faith is creative. Disillusionment is the fatal malady produced by the self-poisoning that grows on in old civilizations from their decaying tissues. Though occasionally a display of cynicism, which is a sure sign of senility, is met with in American literature, one feels that it is merely an imitation and not a genuine expression of negation of faith in this youthful and energetic people. I have no doubt about the independent individuality of the great continent of America, which is not a mere cultural annex of Europe but a civilization with a truly distinctive and progressive character of its own.

America, due to its ocean barriers and its vast self-contained continent rich in natural resources and its possibilities of intensive expansion, has started on a career unbound by any narrow limitations. Secure on the foundation of a consolidated state, it can perfect its freedom to the furthest degree. The high standard of living naturally fits in with the richness of the country's resources and its inventive genius, but this very supersaturation of wealth produces in the American mind a yearning for the riches that belong to the inner realm of the spirit. Spiritual ends of life are pursued with a keenness in America not found anywhere else in the modern world, and the production of wealth instead of hampering her inner vision has emancipated America's imagination of a creative democracy which will offer true freedom to the human spirit.

One cannot but feel that this spiritual adventure of the American civilization will find ever-renewing avenues of self-expression; that she will exploit her material resources for the well-being of humanity, conquering disease and spreading scientific habits of living, and offer by her directive control of scientific knowledge benefits which will spread far beyond her own geographical limits. The quest of spiritual realization which distinguishes America today and therefore attracts true prophets from other countries to her shores is sure to reveal itself in a new civilization in which Europe will be reborn, freed of its discordant inhibitions and its heritage of dead past, and the vitality of a forward marching idealism will find its growing perfection assimilating the true gifts of the East as well as the West in the unity of human spirit.

In addition to a Washington anthology and several pages of "Tributes to George Washington," the magazine INDIA AND THE WORLD contains articles by Kalidas Nag on "Washington and America"; by Professor James B. Pratt, of Williams College in America, on "Leadership and Manhood," and by

J. W. T. Mason, of the International Philosophical Society on "George Washington and the American spirit." The article by Kalidas Nag follows:

While offering our homage to George Washington and conveying our felicitations to the American people on the celebration of the two hundredth birthday of the Father of the American Republic, we voice the feeling of instinctive admiration and fellowship of India for America. Few Indians analyse their minds to discover the cause of this inborn affinity, but the overwhelming majority feels today a spontaneous kinship, as it were, while speaking of America and the Americans. And this in spite of the fact that American history, literature and culture are but poorly represented in the syllabus of studies of our Indian youths. Still, they know of Columbus and his voyages of Discovery; they know, through the writing of Edmund Burke, about the sublime vindication of elemental justice and human rights through the wars of American Independence, and they look up with admiration and awe towards the epic character of George Washington, whose magnetic personality helps to concentrate the diffused idealism of the Indian youth into a scheme of life and action which will inaugurate a new era in the history of India.

Circumscribed as is his knowledge of America, the Indian youth follows keenly the political and economic evolution of the United States of America; the profound utterances of Emerson respond to his ancestral philosophy, and the prophetic lines of Walt Whitman make his sensitive nature to vibrate, and his imagination to be fired, by the dawning of a "Democratic Vista" which ever urges the Indian youth to hope for and believe in a great future. Crammed and suffocated as he feels today, through innumerable obstacles, absurd lack of opportunities, and almost desperate poverty and deprivation, the Indian youth is still ever inspired by the sublime "Song of the Open Road":

"Afoot and light hearted, I take to the open road,
Hail thee! free, the world before me. . . .
. . . From this hour freedom!
From this hour I ordain myself, loosed of limits and imaginary lines
I inhale great draughts of space;
The East and the West are mine and the North and the South are mine.
I am larger, better than I thought;
I did not know, I held so much goodness.
All seems beautiful to me. . . . Forever alive, forever forward."

Professor James Bisset Pratt, of Williams College, Williamstown, Mass., contributed the following article to INDIA AND THE WORLD:

LEADERSHIP AND NATIONHOOD

In success in pure theory, high intellectual powers alone are needed. The demagogue or the mere politician may excel only in force of will. The truly great man and great leader must combine to an unusual degree both intellectual and moral qualities. First of all, he must possess the power of clear thinking in his own field. The world needs intelligent leadership; too often we have an abundance of leadership and a minimum of intelligence. But intelligence alone is pathetically inefficient. And it was the good fortune of the thirteen American Colonies that, in the days of their trial, they found a leader who combined the intelligence and the moral qualities that the times called for. Among the prominent men of the young Republic, there were several who equaled George Washington in intelligence; a few who excelled him; but the character traits that he combined with his intelligence placed him head and shoulders above them all.

The moral qualities to which I refer were such things as courage, patience, persistence, singleness of purpose, devotion. Others will suggest themselves to every reader. But there is one quality that distinguishes the Father of his Country which deserves especial stress. This was a certain objectivity, closely related to intellectual clarity, on the one hand, and to the virtue of justice on the other. It was the ability to see things as they are without the disturbance of personal prejudice, the ability to be just to political opponents and public enemies, the power to leave out irrelevant personal questions in making decisions. The repeated attempts of zealous opponents to displace him from his command did not affect his actions nor induce him to change his plans. His one aim was the success of the great public cause, and he refused to allow little distractions, captious criticisms, personal attacks, petty politics, the loss of property, or any other irrelevant matters to lure his eyes away from his lofty and distant goal.

In spite of enormous differences—differences which, I fear, are too often under-estimated—the similarities between the condition of America in 1776 and of India in 1932 are probably in the back of every Indian's mind when he considers this two hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington. And, in spite of the many differences in the two situations, it is plain that India needs in its leaders today the same combination of qualities that marked the Father of American Freedom. It needs intelligent and clear thinking. It needs to know its own mind, to know just what it really wants, and to face with courage the difficulties that would have to be met if it should get what it wants. It was the clear and cool thinkers like Washington, the Adamses, Jefferson, Hamilton that enabled the Thirteen Colonies to grow into the Great Republic, not the eloquent and emotional Patrick Henrys, with their "Give me liberty or give me death!" And, most of all, India needs in her leaders that calm, impersonal thought which can be just to friend and foe alike, which can forget self for the common good, which can rise superior to every kind of personal gain or loss, to fame and reputation, to what the newspapers say and the critics whisper,—and instead can fix its dispassionate attention on the relevant and great things. It is this kind of intelligent devotion that will count in the end.

J. W. T. Mason, Vice President of the International Philosophical Society, contributed the following article:

GEORGE WASHINGTON AND THE AMERICAN SPIRIT

It is especially fitting at this time that nations everywhere should pay respect to the memory of George Washington, whose two hundredth birth anniversary falls on the twenty-second day of February. Washington's towering greatness rests not on his military fame nor on his statesmanship, effective and successful as they were. His special genius was his power of conciliation and cooperation. In his ability to get things done through the medium of others and in his unequalled talent for persuading rivals to work side by side for their country's sake, Washington stands on a level occupied by no other personage in human history.

So it is that at the present time when the world is struggling through the difficulties of developing a new spirit of international conciliation and good will, the peoples of East and West alike can naturally join in remembrance of the birth of this man of destiny. Destiny, that is to say, in a sense not militaristic and not of the dictator kind, but destiny in the sense of modern democracy, which points to cooperation and coordination as the two primal necessities of human progress.

It is not too much to say that if it had not been for Washington, the infant republic at whose birth he attended would have faced a crisis that might have crippled it for life. Washington was not essentially a warrior. He knew how to fight, and some of his campaigns are studied today by military experts; but one does not naturally associate him in the mind with a Napoleon or a Caesar. He did not have the ruthlessness which is essential in the natural creator of a great military machine.

He had far more than that. He knew the human soul and he knew how to touch the hearts of mankind, not only emotionally, but for practical results. You will find many pure emotionalists in history who have brought to their beck and call disciples without number; but search as you may, you will not find another personage who had Washington's skill in gathering about him leaders of diverse views and holding them to the practical work of their positions.

Washington was not a politician. He distrusted politics, and thought it might be possible to organize human civilization so that partisanship and party rivalries could be abolished. In that idea he was in advance of his time. We are hoping the time may soon be here when the Washington ideal will become a fact; but none among us is able to move against the current as it now runs, and none since Washington has ever been able to do so. Washington alone made the machinery of government work without partisanship and without allying himself to any political organization. Washington alone was able to do what a dictator might do, without himself becoming a dictator. Washington alone inspired those about him to cooperate for the public welfare, though they were of different party affiliations. When called upon for decisions, his verdicts were such that posterity invariably has applauded them.

One of his most far-reaching decisions was the support he gave his Secretary of the Treasury, Alexander Hamilton, in preserving the financial honesty of the young American republic. There were in those times, as there have been since, people who believed a nation could start its movement of freedom by repudiating some or all of its debts owing to foreigners. Alexander Hamilton owes much of his great reputation in America to the fact that he prevented any such disgrace; but he would not have succeeded had it not been for the support of his chief, President Washington.

He who studies Washington's career must be struck by Washington's own moderation in all his activities, coupled with an essentially conservative outlook. He refused to take rash chances, and he knew that only by strict observances of the rules of honest effort can success be gained. He is the ideal of all who realize that cooperation and coordination of activities must be made the basis for success of individuals and for the success of any nation.

On June 15, 1775, when George Washington was unanimously elected Commander-in-Chief of the Continental Army, few could have dared to believe that he would be able to break the back of the British offensive by the year 1781, and would lead the nation to its triumphant assertion of national independence in 1783, when the final peace terms gloriously announced the birth of a new people. That itself was a grand achievement, but it could not hide from the clear vision of Washington the dangers lying ahead. One section of his countrymen was threatening with separation, while another was struggling painfully towards federalism. With the inborn genius of a true nation builder, Washington succeeded in making the two antagonistic elements work together and to create the first effective federal nation known in history. By his force of character he held together the dangerously discordant elements prevailing in the different colonies and convinced them of the necessity of accepting the principle of "give-and-take." That is why the Constitution of the United States came to be generally adopted, although differences of opinion and bitter personal jealousies prevailed between the partisans of Jefferson and of Hamilton, attacking one another now on the question of paper money and then on the project of repudiation of the public debt.

As a creative activist, George Washington believed in individual initiative, but he never allowed it to disturb corporate action. The noblest example and lesson which he has left to the American people is to reconcile and balance harmoniously the claims of the individual with the well-being of all. America is a land of the supreme manifestation of this spirit of collective effort which has come to be an axiom of her political and social existence. Thus on the eve of the Bicentenary celebration of the Father of the American Republic, the message of America to the world would necessarily be that of cooperation between the individual and the collective man through efficient and beneficent work.

IMPORTANCE OF BICENTENNIAL

It is worthy of note that in the article "America's Business Contacts With People of India," appearing in the same periodical, the author, Benoy Kumar Sarkar, a Professor at the University of Calcutta, asserted that "the Bicentennial will mark a turning point in India's appraisal of America's fundamental importance in India's international relations as well as in the appreciation by Americans of the growing value of India in their scheme of democracy, idealism and social energism."

The following excerpts are taken from this article:

The men and women of India are immensely interested in the activities and movements of the people of the United States of America, the fatherland and handiwork of George Washington. American economic development, American commercial policies, the changes in the structure and rhythm of American economy possess a deep significance for economic India, for our merchants and industrialists. America is one of the largest purchasers of Indian goods. . . .

The participation of the Indian people in the Two Hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington is well calculated to remain a landmark in the history of India's orientations to America and of America's orientations to our country. It will be a turning point in our appraisal of America's fundamental importance in India's international relations as well as in the appreciation by the Americans of the growing value of India in their scheme of democracy, idealism, and social energism.

Greater India and Greater America will thereby meet on a common platform of a genuine people-to-people cooperation in regard to the problems of constructive internationalism and world reconstruction.

BICENTENNIAL EVENTS

The entire membership of the American colony in Karachi, India, "without exception," according to Honorable J. G. Groeninger, American Consul, responded to invitations to attend George Washington commemorative events on February 22 and July 4, 1932.

The Washington birthday celebration was in the nature of a reception and garden party and was held at the home of Mr. and Mrs. H. Howard, who courteously loaned their house and garden for the purpose.

On Independence Day a reception was tendered the American and British colonies by the American Consul at his residence. The decorations, the entertainment, and the invitations of this event signified that it was primarily in honor of America's first President.

More than a million citizens in the age old city of Bombay, India, had called to their attention the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington by the resident American colony in distinctive celebrations on February 22 and July 4, 1932.

American Consul, Dayle C. McDonough, took the initiative in formulating plans for the Bicentennial in Bombay. Under his direction a meeting of all Americans in the Consular district was held during January, 1932, and a committee consisting of the following persons was elected to arrange commemorative events: Dayle C. McDonough, American Consul, ex-officio, chairman; Mrs. C. E. Atwood; Mr. W. O. Babb, treasurer; Mr. T. W. Brough; Mrs. W. R. Cuthbert (President, American Women's Club, Bombay); Dr. G. W. Eklund; Mr. A. M. Wade.

The committee set the date of the first event for Washington's birthday, and limited the attendance to American citizens and foreign husbands or wives thereof. Dr. G. W. Eklund, an American dentist practising in Bombay, placed at the disposal of the committee his beautiful home, "Kali Lodge," on the shore of the Arabian Sea.

Invitations were sent to one hundred and ten Americans residing in the district and more than ninety responded. As Consul McDonough describes the scene:

"The house and veranda were brilliantly lighted and the lawn was flooded with the glow of multi-colored bulbs strung above the tables where the supper was served. A large colored picture of George Washington furnished by the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission was conspicuously placed at the entrance of the building and appropriately draped with bunting and illuminated with flood lights."

WOMEN PREPARE AMERICAN SUPPER

A buffet supper was prepared under the direction of the women of the American colony, one of the features of which was the serving of special

American dishes "including cherry pie as an appropriate reminder of the Washington cherry tree myth." Consul McDonough says in his despatch to the Department of State regarding the event:

"It was voted a great success and a sincere tribute to the memory of the 'Father of our Country.' The reunion was perhaps the most representative meeting of Americans ever held in Bombay . . . and was treated as an occasion where all Americans, including representatives of business and banking interests, travelers, missionaries, and officials should gather to do homage to the memory of the immortal Washington."

A July Fourth celebration, under the direction of the Bicentennial committee, was held at the exclusive Willingdon Sports Club, the use of which was donated for the evening. More than ninety persons, according to the American Consul, were present at this affair and "its significance as being co-incidental with the Washington's bicentennial was emphasized. At the dinner table the entire gathering arose and stood at attention for a moment's silent tribute to the memory of Washington and the country which he founded, while the "Star Spangled Banner" was played by an Indian band which had previously been taught the music."

The American Consul further reports that "it is not known in detail what formal celebrations of the Washington Bicentennial have been held by American missionaries or teachers residing in this district outside of Bombay, but it is understood that the anniversary has been kept in mind by them."

Hon. Winfield H. Scott, American Consul in Rangoon, Burma, paid this tribute to George Washington:

We, here in Rangoon, represent only a very small number of the Americans scattered throughout the world who today are, unfortunately, so far from our native land where every homage and tribute is being paid to one who is, and always will be, the First American.

It is, of course, not only the 22nd of February, but the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the birth of that man for whom no true American can ever feel or manifest sufficient appreciation, admiration, and reverence.

Since you cannot and I cannot be in our Country today, where, from North to South, East to West, there should be but one thought—permit me, on behalf of Mrs. Scott and myself, to express our pleasure in being with you, all of you, who in our hearts are offering homage to that very great American gentleman, pioneer, soldier, statesman, and our First President, the man who declined a crown—George Washington.

The address was spoken on the afternoon of February 22, at a Washington picnic held under the sponsorship of the American Association in Burma. The association chose as a site for its celebrative event a rural paradise called Cabin Island, situated on the Kokine Lakes about six miles from Rangoon and adjoining the estate occupied by the Judson College of the American Baptist Mission.

Among those present were Consul and Mrs. Winfield H. Scott and Vice Consul Leland C. Altaffer, the American representatives of the National City Bank of New York and the Standard Oil Company.

ACTIVITIES IN BURMA

Again, on July 4, 1932, the American Association of Burma entertained at a George Washington-Independence Day dinner at the Superintendent's home in the Cushing High School compound, Rangoon. All the guests appeared in colonial costume. According to the invitations printed for the occasion, the guests of honor were "George and Martha Washington and Mr. and Mrs. John Quincy Adams." Consul Scott also reports that the American Club of Yenangyaung, the center of the oil industry in Upper Burma, held a general field and sports day dinner and dance on July 4, to celebrate Independence Day and in commemoration of the two hundredth anniversary of Washington's birthday. More than a hundred persons attended this characteristic American celebration. English newspapers of Rangoon made mention of the above events, calling attention particularly to the significance of the occasion that gave rise to them.

From Miss Beulah N. Allen, superintendent of the American School at Taunggyi, in Burma, American Consul Scott received the following report of Bicentennial activities, which he transmitted to the State Department:

On July 22, 1932, the American School gave a series of little plays taken from the life of George Washington. For weeks before the celebration the children and teacher read material from many sources in order to get the most suitable material for the occasion. The episodes selected were: A School of Washington's Childhood Days; Washington Is Commissioned to Take a Message to the French Commander; The Declaration of Independence Is Signed; Betsy Ross Makes the First Flag; Washington Meets His Mother; Washington at Home with His Family; and Washington's Last Birthday.

Some of the outcomes proved well worth the effort. The children themselves put some episodes into play form. The invitations were designed and written by the children. They helped to plan and make the costumes and staging. They learned to speak, sing and dance better.

The working out of these episodes gave a fine opportunity to teach citizenship. Emphasis was placed on the character of the man rather than on his military career. An English lady, whose children took part on the program, pronounced the entertainment an excellent lesson for the making of good citizens.

Consul Scott reported that, in addition to a dinner given to the American residents of Rangoon by the Consul and his wife on Thanksgiving Day, November 24, 1932, a very impressive Thanksgiving Day service was held by the American Association at the Methodist English Church, Rangoon, at 5.30 P. M., at which Rev. D. C. Baldwin presided and introduced the chief speaker, Rev. C. E. Olmstead.

THE STRAITS SETTLEMENTS

HE Straits Settlements, a Crown colony in British Malaya, best known to the world through its capital city, Singapore, contributed to the success of the George Washington Bicentennial by supporting the American Consular Service in a festival on Washington's birthday at the home of Consul and Mrs. Lester Maynard. The reception was an impressive demonstration of American patriotism and universal regard for George Washington in an oriental setting.

Mr. Maynard reported to the Secretary of State at Washington that the Singapore event was attended by the principal British officials of the colony, and the Unfederated Malay State of Johore as well as British army, navy, and air force officers.

In commenting on the social phase of this Bicentennial occasion, the MALAYA TRIBUNE said:

"The difficult problem of providing for over 300 guests in a private house, though a roomy one, was skillfully solved. True American hospitality was thoroughly appreciated. The bungalow and grounds were prettily illuminated. There was dancing downstairs and upstairs, and a number of tables for bridge, mah jong, and other games. On a flood-lighted tennis court, Chinese conjurers gave a clever exhibition."

American flags and George Washington portraits lent a Bicentennial note to the occasion.

From the Consul's report it is apparent that the significance of the occasion was deeply appreciated by all present and that a better understanding of the United States and the life of Washington was inculcated in the hearts of the guests.

BERMUDA

WHAT must have been the largest and most delightful reception in honor of the occasion of the birthday of George Washington in Bermuda," according to THE ROYAL GAZETTE AND COLONIAL DAILY, Hamilton, Bermuda, was given by the American Consul, Hon. Graham H. Kemper, and Mrs. Kemper at the Hamilton Hotel on February 22, 1932.

More than 400 guests, including not only Americans but visitors from many other lands wintering in the British West Indies, accepted the invitation to be present. His Excellency the Governor of Bermuda and Lady Cubitt honored the occasion by their presence, and the distinguished company included representatives of the navy, army, heads of government departments, and social celebrities.

An enormous Washington birthday cake with 200 candles was a conspicuous feature of the reception. His Excellency the Governor performed the ceremony of lighting the candles while the guests stood at attention honoring the great American in whose name the day was set apart. The musical program given by a famous orchestra of the isle contributed a Bicentennial atmosphere to the occasion, rendering music from the days of George Washington. Flags and Washington emblems enhanced the setting.

The Hamilton newspapers reported that "the whole event was thoroughly appreciated by those present, and Mr. and Mrs. Kemper were the recipients of many congratulations on the splendid hospitality offered and the excellent arrangements made for the enjoyment of the guests. The inclement weather failed to keep any guests away, for the privilege of taking part in this event was appreciated by all."

JAMAICA

JAMAICA, an island of the British West Indies, honored the name of George Washington with enthusiasm during the Celebration of the Two Hundredth Anniversary of his Birth.

The principal celebration was held at Kingston on February 22, 1932, under the auspices of the Pilgrim Club of America. On that occasion more than 60 members of the club and their guests assembled at the Myrtle Bank Hotel, and dined and danced in commemoration of the day.

Mr. A. Scoggin, President of the Pilgrim Club, who occupied the chair, proposed toasts to the King of England and to the President of the United States. The American Consul, Hon. Paul C. Squire, in the course of his toast, "The Day We Celebrate," said:

We owe our thanks to the Pilgrim Club, its alert officers and effective committee, for affording us the opportunity of celebrating the two-hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington in this befitting fashion and in keeping with President Hoover's proclamation wherein he said:

"The happy opportunity has come to our generation to demonstrate our gratitude and our obligation to George Washington by fitting celebration of the 200th Anniversary of his birth.

"To contemplate his unselfish devotion to duty, his courage, his patience, his genius, his statesmanship, and his accomplishments for his country and the world, refreshes the spirit, the wisdom, and the patriotism of our people."

Continuing, Mr. Squire pointed out that both the north and south of Jamaica were admirably represented at the Washington event. Friends had even come from Montego Bay to enhance the brilliant occasion. The speaker complimented the British citizens who had contributed greatly to the success of the George Washington gathering.

"We must realize," declared Mr. Squire, "that our two nations are populated with persons of the same broad vision and mutual understanding and a similar respect for both the land which bred the 'Father of His Country' and the motherland. The mere conception of strife would be an impossibility. Americans rejoice that Washington was the son of English parents, thus helping them better to aspire to their heritage of those noble qualities of the British race, its ideals, sense of justice, its rich language, and unexcelled literature."

In conclusion the speaker said that in these days of Anglo-American cooperation and amid the kindness of both British and Americans, which he had so many times the pleasure of enjoying, he could not but recall the words of Emerson—"The only way to have a friend is to be one." With this fraternal sentiment, he raised his glass to "The Day

We Celebrate" and to the memory of George Washington, yesterday, today and forever "first in the hearts of his countrymen."

Mrs. H. A. Lake proposed the toast, "The Land We Live In," and Dr. C. W. Wells toasted "The Ladies." Dr. I. W. McLean raised his glass to "Our Guests" and this was replied to by Professor Jordan, of Harvard University, and Mr. W. Gamble. In a short address Bishop Emmet paid tribute to the tolerance and hospitality he had observed in Jamaica.

Following the dinner the guests repaired to the ballroom and enjoyed modern and Colonial dances for the remainder of the evening.

EULOGY ON WASHINGTON

At the request of the Americanization School Association, through Consul Squire in Jamaica, Mr. Herbert G. de Lisser, C. M. G., one of the leading citizens of the island, contributed a written eulogy on George Washington for the Association brochure, "Tributes From Many Lands." We quote the article herewith to reflect the spirit of the George Washington Bicentennial in the Caribbean:

No eulogy of George Washington from any British country could sound a note of originality today, since for decades and generations he had been acclaimed by British writers as one of the world's great characters. But it should be interesting to know what was thought of him in those far-off days when he was leader in the American struggle for independence, the Captain of the Armies of the Thirteen Colonies. To those in England who were unsympathetic with the contentions of the American revolutionists, Washington, naturally, was but an arch-rebel; yet there were others who saw him differently, and down the years still come ringing the noble words of Chatham exalting the men who would never lay down their arms until their fight for political freedom was accomplished.

How was it in the British West Indian Colonies, in Jamaica especially?

Here the War of Independence, from its inception to its close, was followed keenly, and the name of General Washington was of necessity known to every literate person in the island. With a cause or with an army one man is usually pre-eminently identified, and just as in these days most Americans think first of Washington when they recall the struggle that separated the States from Great Britain, so in the last quarter of the eighteenth century the colonists of Jamaica thought and spoke of George Washington as the head and front of the American War.

Their sympathies were with him. It is not generally known, yet it is textually provable, that the Jamaica Legislature actually petitioned the British Sovereign, while the War of Independence was in progress (and the issue yet doubtful) to interpose to prevent free colonies from being reduced to a condition of "slavish dependence" on the Mother Country. Naturally the representations of the Jamaica colonists had not the slightest effect, except to show that Jamaica, and the other British West Indies also, sympathized with the American colonies. As a matter of fact, their feeling ran high and was bitter against the British Government of that day. As Gardner, the Jamaica historian, has put it: "The isolation of the sugar colonies, and the overwhelming proportion of the slave population, alone prevented more tangible cooperation with the struggling colonists of the American States."

The Jamaica colonists looked upon George Washington as, in a very real sense, a representative of their own order. Like them, his forbears had been British: his great-grandfather had emigrated from England to America and his father had been to school in England. Thus the tie with the old country was remembered and had been maintained by the Washingtons. Until the Declaration of Independence Washington was a British subject, technically at any rate, and up to the outbreak of disputes he had not only considered himself a Britisher as well as an American but had been an officer in the King's armies in America, showing then that calm resolution and efficiency he was afterwards to display in greater measure when fighting against the King's soldiers. He had been, too, a large slave holder, a planter (or farmer, as the term goes in America), a man of local influence and substance. No wonder the Jamaica planters looked upon him as almost, but for the accident of distance, one of themselves. And the battle he was fighting was, they considered, their battle also, for they had always endeavored to maintain the practical independence of their country and Legislature. To them, then, Washington was a representative hero long before he won to the position of one of the world's great men.

One almost feels that there is a kind of identification of the West Indies with Washington when one remembers that the only country outside of his own that he ever visited in his life was a West Indian island, Barbados.

TRINIDAD

TRINIDAD, the most southerly of the British West Indies, according to the American Consul, Hon. Alfredo L. Demorest, "evinced a great deal of interest in and sympathy with the commemorative program being carried out by the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission," and expressions of this interest were made "in all quarters in Trinidad."

The Consul declared that it had been the pleasure of his office to "cooperate with the Bicentennial Commission in the dissemination of all available information concerning the Washington celebration" to various agencies on the island.

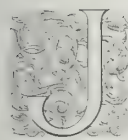

It seems "that purely local factors prevented the staging of a formal event on February 22" but "that the day was marked by a receipt of numerous messages of felicitation by members of the Consular corps, local government officials, and leading private citizens, expressing the high esteem felt by themselves, by their government, and the people whom they represent for George Washington."

On Thanksgiving Day, to bring the Bicentennial to a fitting close in Trinidad, the Consul gave an official George Washington dinner to which were invited the leading American citizens and principal government officials of the crown colony of Trinidad and Tobago, including the Deputy Governor and the Colonial Secretary. The Bicentennial was referred to by the Consul as a "noble cause" and a "great success" in strengthening the bonds of international friendship and political relations.

GIBRALTAR

UST 100 years after Washington's birth and 33 years after his death, the United States Government sent its consul to Gibraltar in the person of Horatio Sprague. The office of Consul has since passed, on merit, from father to son for two generations, so that it has remained in the family for the last century.

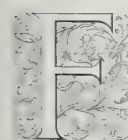

Honorable William W. Corcoran, serving in the place of Honorable Richard Louis Sprague who was on leave of absence, wrote the following letter to the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission regarding the observance of the celebration in the British stronghold of the Mediterranean:

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of June 28, 1932, requesting me to inform you as to whether any ceremony was held in this territory on February 22, 1932, commemorating the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington.

The regular incumbent of this office, Consul Richard L. Sprague, is on leave of absence. I am informed that on February 22, 1932, he held an informal reception at the Consulate to which were invited the principal Government Authorities of Gibraltar and the Consuls of most Governments represented here.

MALTA

IFTY-EIGHT miles due south of Sicily in the Mediterranean Sea is the small island of Malta, a protectorate of the British Empire; and even in this remote part of the world the name of George Washington was commemorated on the two-hundredth anniversary of his birth. The event brought George Washington into the spotlight before a quarter of a million Maltese.

American Consul, Hon. Mason Turner, was the moving force in the Bicentennial celebration in this British naval base. He was ably assisted by Mrs. Turner and the Consulate staff.

The principal event was an impressive reception held in the ballroom of the Imperial Hotel at Seima, Malta, on Washington's birthday. The Consul reported that "this reception was attended by 160 guests including practically all of the important officials of the local government, of the British Mediterranean fleet, of the air force, and of the military garrison stationed in Malta, as well as many of the prominent members of the local community.

"The ballroom of the hotel was suitably decorated for the occasion with British and American flags and with a large portrait of George Washington placed over the fireplace at one end of the hall. The list of guests included several admirals and lesser naval officers, members of the English peerage, Maltese officials, including the Prime Minister, Chief Justice, Secretary of the Maltese Imperial Government, the heads of many government departments, the Commodore of the Royal Air Force, the Canon of the Anglican Cathedral Church, and a number of army officers of high rank."

PERU

FROM Peru, once the land of the Incas and the Spanish conquistador, Pizarro, came the following message expressing the admiration and respect of the people of that republic for George Washington on the occasion of the two hundredth anniversary of his birth:

LIMA, FEBRUARY 22, 1932.

HIS EXCELLENCY
THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
WASHINGTON, D. C.

I BEG YOUR EXCELLENCY AND THE AMERICAN PEOPLE TO ACCEPT THE SENTIMENTS OF FERVENT ADMIRATION AND RESPECT FROM THE PERUVIAN GOVERNMENT AND PEOPLE FOR THE GLORIOUS MEMORY OF GEORGE WASHINGTON, FOUNDER OF THE UNITED STATES, ON THE OCCASION OF THE CELEBRATION OF THE BICENTENNIAL OF HIS BIRTH. WE ASSOCIATE OURSELVES MOST CORDIALLY WITH THE CELEBRATION FOR THE WORK OF REDEMPTION, WHICH HE CARRIED OUT IN HIS OWN COUNTRY IN SUCH WISE AS TO MERIT THE VENERATION OF MANKIND, PREPARED THE ADVENT OF LIBERTY ON THE WHOLE CONTINENT.

LUIS M. SANCHEZ CERRO,
PRESIDENT OF PERU.

GEORGE WASHINGTON MONUMENT IN LIMA. AT A PUBLIC CEREMONY ON FEBRUARY 22, 1932, A WREATH WAS PLACED ON THIS MONUMENT IN THE PLAZA DE WASHINGTON IN THE CAPITAL OF PERU BY THE PERUVIAN MINISTER OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS, SENOR DR. ALBERTO FREUNDT ROSSELL, IN THE PRESENCE OF THE AMERICAN AMBASSADOR, MR. FRED MORRIS DEARING, OTHER AMERICAN OFFICIALS AND A LARGE NUMBER OF PERUVIANS.

This cordial message of their President was not the first tribute that Peruvians have rendered to the first American to lead the way to liberty in the New World. Lima, capital of Peru, has for many years had a Plaza Washington, with a beautiful statue of George Washington occupying a central position and giving the square its name.

It was in Plaza Washington, most appropriately, that the Bicentennial Celebration in Lima was opened. There, with simple but impressive ceremony, the Peruvian Minister of Foreign Affairs, Dr. Alejandro Freundt Rossell, placed a wreath at the base of the George Washington statue the morning of February 22, 1932, in the name of the government and people of Peru.

Present at the ceremony were the American Ambassador to Peru, Hon. Fred Morris Dearing, accompanied by the various officers of the Embassy and Consulate General, and high officials of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, members of the American colony in Lima, and their Peruvian friends.

Declaring that he acted in the name of the government and people of Peru, in homage to the great North American hero, the two hundredth anniversary of whose birth was that day being observed throughout the civilized world, Dr. Freundt Rossell laid a beautiful wreath of laurel at the base of the statue.

Ambassador Dearing responded to this tribute to the First President of the United States with expressions of appreciation in the name of the government and people of the United States, and the ceremony closed with a cordial handclasp by these two representatives of two American republics. Many members of the American colony in Lima attended the exercises, the simplicity and dignity of which were in keeping with the character of the man they honored.

UNVEILING OF STATUE RECALLED

The ceremony recalled the unveiling of the statue a decade before, and the words uttered on that occasion by Dr. Augusto B. Leguía, then President of Peru. President Leguía said:

Washington represents to Peruvians the highest incarnation of patriotism. A soldier who earned the highest praise of Frederick the Great, a soldier to fight with whom, the self-denying and heroic Lafayette considered it a mark of glory, Washington was not of the founders who change the sword of victory into an instrument of oppression. Model of learning and disinterestedness, he curbed anarchy with a hand as firm as in his work of creation. He had innate knowledge of the wonderful destiny of his country. It can be said that from his quiet seclusion at Mount Vernon he gave a more effective lesson of patriotism than generations have been able to learn. From him, therefore, must we get inspiration in our civic conduct and our democratic customs.

The day's observance closed with a reception at the American Embassy, attended by the President of Peru. In a cablegram to the Department of State, dated February 22, 1932, Ambassador Dearing reported:

AT RECEPTION TO AMERICAN COLONY AT EMBASSY THIS AFTERNOON, PRESIDENT AND CABINET, OTHER PROMINENT PERUVIAN OFFICIALS AND ALL CHIEFS OF DIPLOMATIC MISSIONS WERE PRESENT. THE PRESIDENT RESPONDED COR-DIALY TO MY ADDRESS.

THE PRESIDENT ATTENDS

The reception was held in the attractive garden of the Embassy, favored by a beautiful, clear day and a gorgeous sunset. Ambassador Dearing had invited the entire American community in Lima, with His Excellency, Sr. Luis M. Sánchez Cerro, President of the Republic, members of his Cabinet, the President of the Congress, the members of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Congress and the President of the Supreme Court as honor guests. The drawing rooms of the Embassy were appropriately decorated, with the reproduction of the Gilbert Stuart Atheneum portrait of George Washington, which had been sent to the Embassy by the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission, occupying a prominent place amid a bank of flowers.

President Sánchez Cerro, accompanied by his Chief of Staff, Col. Antonio Rodríguez, arrived at the Embassy shortly after seven o'clock, and was received by Ambassador Dearing and the personnel of the Embassy. Then, with the President standing beside him on the steps leading into the garden, the Ambassador addressed his guests as follows:

Mr. President, Peruvian Friends, My Colleagues, Fellow Countrymen:

We are assembled today to pay respect to the memory of George Washington and the wisdom and heroism he displayed in shaping our nation.

Today, two hundred years ago, George Washington was born. Today, audiences similar to this are gathered everywhere to pay tribute to him; a tribute which will extend throughout the nine-month period and culminate on Thanksgiving Day.

The United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission in Washington has left nothing undone to make this tribute a sustained and universal memorial in which more than 120,000,000 Americans will join to honor a great man in the history of civilization.

We have all listened to speeches on George Washington; but we may look again at his acts of statesmanship and consider what his name means to our people.

Our first President was born two hundred years ago today in a town now called Wakefield, Virginia. During the French and Indian War he developed those qualities which were later to bring him command of the Continental Armies. His first experience in parliamentary procedure was as a member of the Virginia House of Burgesses. When the first Continental Congress was called in 1774, Washington was a member as a delegate from Virginia. In the second Continental Congress he again represented his State and was chosen to lead the army of the United Colonies.

On July 3, 1775, he took command of the Continental forces at Cambridge, Massachusetts, and for eight years thereafter led the American Army. His patience, wisdom and fortitude in this long struggle won for him the place he holds in American hearts.

The Articles of Confederation under which the new nation began its existence proved ineffectual, and a Convention was called to draft a Constitution. Washington was selected as the presiding officer and was a dominant figure in that body of truly great men, and when the Constitution had been ratified, was unanimously elected the first President of the Republic, and another eight year term of public service began, this time in the field of Statesmanship.

Many problems confronted the new Government. Relations with all nations were new and untried, France and England were embroiled in war with attending difficulties for American institutions and American commerce. On April 22, 1793, his Proclamation of Neutrality was issued, establishing the American policy of avoiding foreign entanglements. He recognized the fact that if we became involved in European affairs, the very existence of the nation would be jeopardized.

Washington had to cope with internal problems as well. These he met with tact, decisiveness and foresight. He served two terms as President but refused to run for a third, and on September 17, 1796, issued his Farewell Address, one of the great state papers in our history. December 14, 1799, he died.

We who are living today owe our institutions in great part to the man we are endeavoring to honor. He does not belong to any one state, nor even exclusively to our own. He is an international heritage and belongs to the world.

Let me quote the tribute paid to Washington by Abraham Lincoln, another great American:

"Washington is the mightiest name of earth—long since mightiest in the cause of civil liberty; still mightiest in moral reformation. On that name no eulogy is expected. It can not be. To add brightness to the sun, or glory to the name of Washington, is alike impossible. Let none attempt it. In solemn awe we pronounce the name, and in its naked deathless splendor leave it shining on."

Then, turning to President Sánchez Cerro, and speaking in Spanish, Ambassador Dearing voiced the appreciation of the American colony in Lima for his attendance at this celebration in honor of the First President of the United States as follows:

Mr. President: For Peru, also, Washington is a figure of aspiration and attainment. May it be given to us of this generation, both in Peru and in the United States, to do as much as he did for our countries and their mutual welfare.

If we could go back some hundred and fifty years and it had then been possible for the Peruvian Ambassador in Washington to celebrate the anniversary of the birth of one of the great founders of Peruvian independence, Washington would, I feel sure, have attended the Ambassador's reception with the same fine considerateness and good will, the same graciousness and friendliness with which you, Mr. President, and your Government have honored us today and for which we Americans in Peru so sincerely thank you and all our Peruvian friends.

and the resultant tense state of excitement, precluded any special observance of Independence Day and even made it difficult "to make plans for anything other than a very simple ceremony confined to the American colony . . . which will fittingly close the Bicentennial," he added.

However, under the auspices of the American Embassy and the American Society of Lima, the

Reporting the reception in a despatch to the Department of State, Ambassador Dearing wrote:

The President remained until about 8 o'clock. The Americans, for the most part, remained until about 9 o'clock. . . . It was particularly gratifying to have such a large and representative group of Americans take the opportunity to show their respect for the memory of our First President.

EXCITING POLITICS INTERVENES

The months intervening between George Washington's birthday and the close of the bicentennial celebration on Thanksgiving Day witnessed, in the words of Ambassador Dearing "a strenuous political life" in Peru. The Peruvian-Colombian dispute members of the American colony there gave a gala Thanksgiving Day dinner which echoed the closing observances of the Bicentennial celebration by fellow-Americans at home.

The dinner was held at the Country Club in Lima, and was attended by nearly all of the members of the American colony and a number of prominent Peruvians and foreign friends. A portrait of George Washington, garlanded with flowers, was placed in view of all the diners, and the decorations carried out the patriotic motif.

Mr. J. H. Torrens, president of the American Society of Lima, spoke briefly of the significance of the occasion and praised the work of the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission in Washington, both in the United States and abroad. Ambassador Dearing then made a short speech, closing with the reading of President Hoover's Thanksgiving Proclamation in which the first Thanksgiving Day Proclamation of President Washington was incorporated. The whole occasion was a happy and enthusiastic one, and gave evidence of "the abiding loyalty with which Americans in this part of the world regard the figure and conserve the memory of the Father of their Country," wrote the Ambassador, concluding:

The celebration seemed to me to be fitting in every way. . . .

ADMIRER BY SOUTH AMERICANS

The participation of the President of Peru and other high officials of the government, and the very real enthusiasm of the people of Peru, as shown by their participation in the celebration of their American friends, demonstrated, in the opinion of Americans and Peruvians present, what has often been said of George Washington—that he means almost as much to South Americans in general as he does to the people of the United States.

This found renewed expression in the newspapers of Peru during the Bicentennial year. All the newspapers carried articles detailing the life and achievements of Washington; the popular "Farewell Address" was often reprinted, and there was much favorable editorial comment. Of the latter, the article which follows, in translation, from EL COMERCIO, February 22, 1932, is representative:

Today the United States is celebrating the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington, that great hero who freed his country with the sword, and with the law, made it a powerful and stable democracy. This great North American had not only creative genius but a talent for organization. Other heroes have won battles, conquered kingdoms, freed nations; but the brilliance of their deeds is eclipsed by the night of their ambitions or lost in the clouds of their inconsistencies. In Washington, his victories are definitive because his character consolidated the triumphs of his valor and sustained with disinterestedness the fruits of his accomplishments.

This is his greatest glory: his morality, rectitude, citizenship. The victorious general did not listen to the whispers of ambition. He renounced, for the good of his country, military dictatorship of the nation he had freed. And when its citizens put him at the head of the first North American republic, he sounded the heart of his people and suited his acts to the fundamentals of democracy.

Great as a warrior, great as a statesman, he triumphed on the field of battle and the field of diplomacy, and although he was the most important of the nation's citizens, he knew how to be the simplest. For that reason it has been said of Washington that he was "first in war and first in peace."

The basis of his genius is harmony. Nothing in him was excessive, all was admirable. Other heroes might have more fire, but Washington had more light. He is not the lightning that flashes and passes; he is the star that shines and endures. Human, serene, he had not the extravagances that often mar genius. His was a balanced intelligence that measured facts as they really were. He was a strong man who walked the solid earth with firm tread. No chimera made him waver, nor did the dust of the road soil the purity of his ideals. Calm, just, determined, he always had the necessary resolution, and as he lived in reality, his success was positive.

His country needed independence, and Washington, with his sword, gave it to her; his country, freed, needed to be made into an organized nation, and Washington, with his talent and statesmanship, created the North American democracy on a sound basis. Today that powerful nation that is the United States sings the glories of its founder.

Liberator of the most prosperous nation in the world, creator of the most powerful democracy—that is George Washington.

PAN AMERICAN DAY MESSAGE

A notable tribute to the memory of George Washington was paid by the twenty Latin American Republics on April 14, 1932, in sending messages from their respective presidents to be read at Washington's tomb at Mount Vernon by their Ambassadors, Ministers or Chargé d'Affaires. The message from the President of Peru follows:

IN THIS COMMEMORATION OF THE SECOND CENTENARY OF THE BIRTH OF GEORGE WASHINGTON, THE FOUNDER OF AMERICAN INDEPENDENCE, THE PERUVIAN GOVERNMENT AND PEOPLE ASSOCIATE THEMSELVES THROUGH ME WITH THE REJOICING OF THE AMERICAN GOVERNMENT AND PEOPLE, AND PAY THE HOMAGE OF THEIR ADMIRATION TO THE HERO AND PATRIOT WHO ORDAINED IN THE UNITED STATES THE FREEST OF ALL DEMOCRACIES AND BEQUEATHED TO THE WORLD THE UNSURPASSED EXAMPLE OF HIS POLITICAL INTEGRITY.

LUIS M. SANCHEZ CERRO,
PRESIDENT OF THE REPUBLIC.

BELGIUM

THE people of Belgium and Americans residing there joined in honoring the memory of George Washington on the Two Hundredth Anniversary of his Birth.

Throughout the nine months period of the Bicentennial Celebration, the Belgians showed their admiration and respect for America's First President.

On every possible occasion they participated with the Americans in singing the praise of George Washington. Bicentennial events held in Brussels and Antwerp demonstrated the mutual feeling of good will existing between the people of Belgium and the people of the United States.

His Excellency the Belgian Ambassador to the United States, Paul May, in a eulogy on George Washington, written for the special Bicentennial edition of the WASHINGTON TIMES, Washington, D. C., May 30, 1932, asserts the claim of certain Belgian historians that Washington ancestry might have had its deepest roots in Belgian soil.

"We are proud to think that there may have been some drops of Belgian blood in the veins of the hero to whose incomparable character and virtues we now pay homage," the Ambassador wrote.

We quote the full text of his splendid article herewith:

AMBASSADOR MAY'S TRIBUTE

In this year which marks the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington, the people of all nations join to pay a tribute of respect and admiration to the memory of the immortal hero, soldier and statesman who was the founder of this great Republic.

To America he gave liberty and free institutions which have served as a model for those of many other nations, and to all mankind he gave an example of patriotism, courage, self-sacrifice and true nobility.

The achievement and example of Washington did not fail to affect my own country, which had temporarily lost some of her most cherished liberties and which was, like the American Colonies, under the rule of a distant monarch.

Shortly after the American Revolution there arose a movement in the Belgian Provinces to throw off the yoke of Austria and to set up a federation known as "The Belgian United States," with institutions patterned after those which Washington had recently given to America.

The chief leaders in the movement were popularly referred to as the "Belgian Washington," and the "Belgian Franklin." That revolt was ill-timed and unsuccessful, but it was a prelude which led eventually, in 1830, to the achievement of Belgian independence, under a liberal constitution, with those free institutions which we today enjoy under our beloved sovereign, King Albert.

In Belgium, our admiration for Washington is such that we have even tried to claim him as "one of our own" through participation in his ancestry. It is well known that Nicholas Martiau, who came to Virginia about 1620, was one of the ancestors of George Washington, but no man knows where Martiau was born.

By some he is claimed as a native of France, while other historians hold that he was of Belgian origin. The name of "Martiau" seems to link him with our southern (Walloon) province, as it is a distinctive Walloon word, the equivalent of the French "marteau," meaning "hammer."

Researches are now being carried on to discover the origin and ancestry of Martiau, and, in the absence of proof to the contrary we will maintain our claim, however shadowy it may be, to some part in the ancestry of your great Founder. We are proud to think that there may have been some drops of Belgian blood in the veins of the hero to whose incomparable character and virtues we now pay homage.

But it is not with Washington's ancestry that we need be concerned today, but rather with his deeds, his achievements, his wisdom and above all, his noble character.

America has furnished the world the character of Washington. That, in itself, is enough to entitle America to the gratitude of the world. There have been other great soldiers, able statesmen and devoted patriots, but in Washington we find a combination of high qualities which is rare among mortals. "The elements were so mixed in him that nature might stand up and say to all the world, 'This was a man.'"

Other generals have won brilliant victories, but it was the indomitable fortitude and transcendent personality of Washington that enabled him to hold together an ill-equipped army of raw recruits, to maintain their courage through such bitter days of suffering as those at Valley Forge, to mold them into first-class fighting men, to harass and out-wit his adversaries by his superb strategy, and finally to lead his troops to victory at Yorktown.

Had Washington been killed at Yorktown, he would have been revered as a great soldier, but his fame would have been only half complete. Fortunately, he was spared to exercise his qualities as a great statesman in molding the 13 separate colonies into one united and powerful nation.

It was through his wise counsel and rare tact that regional differences and personal jealousies were composed. It was under his guiding hand that your fundamental institutions were established and your feet placed upon the path which has led you to your high place among the nations of the earth.

And throughout it all, he had no personal ambition, no thought of self. He could have had dictatorial power, had he wished it—some even proposed a royal crown—but he thought only of his country's good, and having served her long and faithfully, retired to private life at Mount Vernon.

As some one has remarked, Washington's career "changed the world's idea of greatness." It gave mankind a new ideal. No figure in modern history has had an equal influence on public conscience.

His life has purified the ambitions of great men and has set an example for the emulation of the youth of the world. His deeds and his ideals have inspired statesmen far and wide. His wisdom, justice and integrity have won the confidence of mankind.

His life is the triumph of patience, of courage, of loyalty, of service to his country, and he has left for all the world the lasting inspiration of his noble character.

DINNER AND BALL AT ANTWERP

The Burgomaster of Antwerp was the guest of honor at a George Washington dinner and ball given under the auspices of the American Club of Antwerp on the 200th anniversary of the birth of George Washington.

The President of the American Club, Mr. Harry C. Carr, in the name of the American colony at Antwerp, expressed his appreciation to the Belgian government officials for "the hospitality which they had at all times extended American business interests in Belgium."

Mr. Carr declared the celebrants were met to honor America's greatest son, who though being a son was also the father of his country. President Washington's parting counsel to the nation, Mr. Carr pointed out, was to avoid all permanent foreign entanglements and alliances, but this does not mean the United States is not to be charitable to all nations and cooperate with them in legitimate means for the betterment of world conditions. It is this spirit that prompted America to respond to the call of Europe during the World War.

Mr. Carr then proposed a toast to the King and Queen of Belgium, and introduced Hon. F. Van Cauwelaert, the Burgomaster of Antwerp, who responded to the toast of the American Club President, saying that it was the pleasure of the citizens of Belgium to entertain the Americans in their midst and to foster at all times relations between the countries that will serve to perpetuate peace and international good will. The Burgomaster closed by proposing a toast to the President of the United States of America.

In the absence of the American Ambassador, Hon. Hugh Gibson, who was called on a diplomatic mission to Geneva, Hon. F. Mayer, American Chargé d'Affaires, delivered the principal address of the evening. Mr. Mayer stressed the point that George Washington "was a man of facts" facing events as they were presented to him, not as a dreamer, and not as a superhuman hero, but as a realist whose four principal qualities were: courage, business acumen, staunchness, and self-control.

The address follows in full:

If anything were needed to prove the enduring quality of George Washington's fame, it would be the continuing nature of his biography and yet it is doubtful if there was ever a man in public life so inaccurately dealt with by his early biographers as Washington. They made of him an unreality of pen and ink when he was the most actual of men. Fortunately for Washington's memory and our sensibilities, there has been a gradual drift away from the "sugary" inaccuracies of the early days.

And the odd part is that Washington was first and last a realist; the most prosaic and practical of men. If I were asked to suggest a motto for him, it would be "The Things That Are."

At first blush it seems strange that it should take more than a century and a quarter after his death to arrive at the real man. Only lately, however, has the sugar coating been melted away, revealing the true George Washington, so infinitely greater in reality than in his graven image; so much more a fit subject for national worship.

We can perhaps best approach a consideration of Washington's realism, the keystone in his character, by examining briefly in turn the mettle of his four principal qualities as I see them—namely, courage, business acumen, staunchness and self-control. For they all are founded upon his realism. It is dominant throughout, permeating each of these traits.

In 1753, when Washington was a young man of twenty-one, the Governor of Virginia wanted to send a written demand to the French commandant of the disputed Ohio territory to evacuate it at once. The first messenger sent by Governor Dinwiddie failed in his task; it was too difficult a job for him to get through the wilderness that lay between Virginia and his goal. The Governor then turned to Washington. There was no real necessity nor any particular occasion for Washington to accept this arduous and hazardous mission. He was even at that age a landowner of considerable prominence—he had his fields to see cultivated, his important personal interests to safeguard. But apparently Washington did not hesitate for a moment. He received the appointment, accepted it and started on his journey, all on the same day.

After considerable hardship and danger Washington delivered the letter, received a reply and returned to Virginia. As one of his recent biographers states in reference to this mission, "His matter-of-fact coolness in the presence of danger is illuminating. We shall see it appear again and again throughout his life." This same biographer describes Washington in the light of this incident as the original "Do it Now" man. There are no vain imaginings or conjectures as to possibilities of difficulties or of dangers. Some one asked him to do something. He was faced with a fact and he met it courageously and straight on. The same quality evidenced itself at Braddock's defeat, and was even more pronounced perhaps at Fort Necessity.

From a military point of view this latter campaign in which Washington succeeded to the command was a complete fiasco—wretched judgment was shown by him in the choice of a site for a fort—a choice driven upon him by his unwise impetuosity in attacking the French. He was confronted by a situation in which the only thing to do was to surrender. This he did, obtaining liberal terms which permitted the command to return to Virginia with the honors of war. This surrender, however, did not injure Washington's reputation; he was given a vote of thanks by the House of Burgesses. Another might well have had very different treatment at the hands of his fellow countrymen after such a disastrous defeat. It seems clear that the Virginians accepted Washington at his own valuation. He had been confronted with a fact—the necessity of surrender. There was only one thing to do, and he did it. To him there simply was no question of blame. And that was the attitude apparently adopted by the House of Burgesses.

In no way is Washington's realism shown more clearly than in regard to his business capacity. Here he was a practical man to the nth degree.

At school Washington took especial interest in arithmetic, the counting of things. This characteristic ran through his life in a number of ways—in the methodical, meticulous manner in which he catalogued his possessions, every penny, every foot of land. One biographer records a memorandum in Washington's own handwriting, giving the number of windows in each of the houses on the Mount Vernon estate, and even the number of panes of glass in each window. Washington was a man who dealt with things, with the concrete and not with abstractions.

Land indeed was a passion with him—the acquisition of land and its exploitation. There is nothing more real than land. He would surely have been an exceptional business man had the opportunity afforded.

The mainspring of Washington's staunchness—the attribute for which we have to be most grateful—was due to his being a realist in every sense of the word. A more finely articulated character, full of theory and imagination, looking forward to what might take place, would, I fear, never have stuck it out at Valley Forge. Again there was a job of work—the army had to be kept together. There was no side avenue for thought or speculation. It was a look straight ahead—a task at hand—and it was done. Staunchness won the revolution—Washington's staunchness, and it was due to the essential realism of his psychology.

To my way of thinking this is also responsible in large measure for his self-control, as it likewise explains his capacity for clear-cut decision, which Washington derived from his great self-knowledge and control.

Generally speaking, his correspondence, both during the Revolution and while President, and his diary, are most illuminating.

There is a directness and a decisive tone to his written expressions which perhaps give a truer picture of Washington than any amount of explanation or description. The very pessimism of much of his correspondence with the Congress when he was trying to urge it on to greater effort during the conduct of the war, is part of Washington's actualness. It was not the depression of Neurasthenia but the plain, blunt truth of the case. Here were the facts and if something were not done to deal with them, such and such would inevitably result.

While Washington was thoroughly human, there was without doubt something majestic about him. He stood apart, not with the distinction of elusiveness, but with that of substance, of the unmistakable reality of his courage, business capacity, staunchness, self-control, and of the supreme honesty that goes with such qualities. Washington must have been one of the most vital men in all history, but vital with a great self-contained strength of character—not with a flashing, dynamic force of personality.

It is interesting to contemplate that the man who has rightly come down to us as the Father of Our Country, heralded as having abstract virtues he did not possess, was actually the rock on which we could build because of his dominant realism.

The dinner was followed by a George Washington Bicentennial Ball which was featured by patriotic decorations and Colonial music. More than 200 guests attended, among whom were the following notables:

Mr. Lebon, Head of the Town Council, and Mrs. Lebon; Mr. Gyselinck, Secretary of the Town Council, and Mrs. Gyselinck; Mr. Fabry, Head of the Customs, and Mrs. Fabry; Mr. Adriaensen, Captain of the Port of Antwerp, and Mrs. Adriaensen; Major Goetz, United States Military Attaché at the embassy in Brussels; Mrs. M. Letcher; Mr. Mitchell, American Consul in Ghent, and Mrs. Mitchell; Colonel Maud, and Major Streickmans; Mr. Ross Blair, Mrs. Ross Blair, President of the American Women's Club at Antwerp; and Mrs. H. C. Carr.

SPECIAL CHURCH SERVICES

The principal Bicentennial event in Brussels was a George Washington memorial service at the American Church on February 22, 1932. The chapel was converted into a patriotic shrine with American and Belgian flags and banks of flowers from Flemish fields. A large congregation of Americans attended, outstanding among whom were the members of the American Legion resident in Brussels who appeared in uniform. Many Belgians also participated. The services were opened by the singing of "America" and an invocation by Rev. Edward Harris, Baptist missionary from Burma. "The Star Spangled Banner" was rendered as a solo by Miss Mignon Spence, and was followed by the principal address of the occasion, by Rev. F. C. Woodard. In this sermon, parts of which are quoted, Rev. Woodard dwelt on some of the little incidents of Washington's life at his home and fire-side, which, the speaker contended, contributed to the greatness of Washington's character:

At one time, as Washington entered a shop in New York, a Scotch nurse-maid followed him, carrying her infant charge. "Please, sir, here's a boy was named after you." "What is his name?" asked the President. "Washington Irving, sir." George Washington, it is said, placed his hand upon the child's head and gave him his blessing, little thinking, I suppose, that in the years to come that boy would write as a labor of love, a life of Washington. Many biographies of this great man have been written, some of them fulsome with praise, others stressing his human frailties and desecrating his life. Neither type is a just estimate of the man. George Washington was a man, not a God; but as a man, he has done more to establish righteousness upon that part of the earth which we call today THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, than has any other man. Let the Slavic statesman speak for us for a moment, his name being Kossuth: "Let him who looks for a monument to Washington look around the United States. Your freedom, your independence, your national power, your prosperity and your prodigious growth, all these are a monument to him."

George Washington was an inheritor of those characteristics which have distinguished Englishmen from the early days of their national life. Always there have been found Britons who dared to resist tyranny, whether offered by kings or over-lords. Washington and his Continentals were of this class, and their resistance to oppression was but standing up for their rights as Englishmen. When finally they were victorious and had set up a united government composed of the thirteen American colonies, they embedded in their Constitution those same rights, dear to the hearts of all our people. Those rights are our heritage today; they must be guarded from all insidious undermining influences. I feel strongly that the observance of a day like this, and honoring the memory of a man like this, will help our sacredness of our birth-right. I am proud, therefore, to use this chapel and pulpit today for a just appraisal of "The Father of His Country."

I wish to give you a picture of our first President at home, to show you his Mount Vernon, his habits and customs of daily life. When Washington became the owner of Mount Vernon, it was an estate of 2,700 acres. He increased his holdings by the purchase of contiguous lands to 8,000 acres, and the borders of his estate were washed by ten miles of tide water. Washington was one of the wealthy men of his time. I honor him for this enterprise and honesty in using his talents.

To this beautiful estate, Washington brought his bride, Martha Custis, in 1759. On the Mount Vernon lawn were magnolia, willow, locust, oak, cedar, ash, pine, poplar, maple, linden, hemlock, gum, hawthorne, acacia, and dogwood trees. In the orchard were cherry (tree of blessed memory), peach, pear, apricot, plum, walnut, chestnut, filbert, and hickory. In his garden were jessamine, honeysuckle, holly, laurel, lilac, and ivy. His stables were well filled. Among his horses were: Ajax, Blueskin, Magnolia, and Valiant. On hunting days Washington rode Blueskin, a fiery iron gray horse, and was dressed generally in hunting costume of blue coat, scarlet waistcoat, buckskin breeches, top boots, and velvet cap.

Washington was an agriculturist. His chief crops were tobacco and wheat. Vessels came up the Potomac and took on his products which were carried to England. Fields, forests, and rivers furnished table luxuries in abundance, and "Father Jack" and "Tom Davis," hunter and fisherman, respectively, were attached to the household establishment. Washington delighted in the chase. In season, he would be out fox or duck hunting two or three times a week, with his many guests. Martha Washington had her "carriage and four" and was often found on these outings, or could be seen driving on the road between her home and Alexandria.

Washington was an early riser. He lighted the candles, made a fire and went to his library at 4 a. m. without disturbing the slumbers of the house. After a seven o'clock breakfast of corn cakes, honey and tea, he made a daily tour of his farms, a ride of from ten to fifteen miles. At about 2.45 p. m. he would return to the home for lunch, and the entire afternoon he spent in the library, where he had assembled a good collection of books. He often read aloud from current publications and on Sundays he would read a sermon.

After resigning his commission as Commander-in-Chief of the Army, he said of his home life: "I hope to spend there the remainder of my days in cultivating the friendships and affections of good men and in the practice of domestic virtues." The doors of his mansion were ever open, and all who had a claim on his friendship were hospitably received.

George Washington was a sincere believer in the Christian faith and a devout man. In "Rules of Behavior" copied in his early teens, we find this: "Labor to keep alive in your breast that little spark of celestial fire called conscience"; again: "Honour and obey your natural parents altho they be poor"; and "Speak not evil of the absent for it is unjust." He was a vestryman of Truro parish. Robert Lewis, Washington's nephew, and his Secretary during the first term as President, reported that he often saw his uncle in his library on his knees, with an open Bible in his hands.

More than all else, Washington was master of himself. See him with those shivering Colonials crossing the Delaware on the ice for that great victory over the Hessians; watch his nerve when under the shadows of desertion, insubordination, treachery; follow this brave leader through the ice, of that winter of desperation in 1776, when the snows were splashed with the warm, red blood of barefooted Americans all looking to him for the victory so long delayed. Less than a master of himself would have failed here; less than a man whom God delighted to honor and help would have given up under the strain of it all. Not so Washington. Conscious of a divine mission, his heart and hand, his fortune and skill—all were sacrificed for the cause of freedom. Master of himself, friends, there is the secret. The poet expressed it thus: "Self-reverence, self-knowledge, self-control, these three alone lead men to sovereign power." O, that in these turbulent times of 1932 all of us Americans might come to realize through the life of this great leader or otherwise, how essential self-mastery is to the welfare of a nation! O, that we might make that quest an object of prayer in our individual lives!

We are trying to tell about the simpler virtues today, for in them, more than in military exploits, I think one can see the soul of a man. I do not know exactly how it has been in your life, but for me I find that from my youth up I have had a fair knowledge of the military leadership of George Washington, but not so good a knowledge of the essentially gentle and Christian nature of the man.

Here is another anecdote to show Washington's love for children. "One winter night, a large house in a northern state was brilliantly illuminated; the table was spread with fine silver and cut glass and a number of good things were provided for eating. The servant said that the guest of the evening had arrived an hour before; had been shown to a room where he might wash and refresh himself before the dinner. But as the invited one did not make his appearance, the host excused himself, went up the stairs to search out the guest. As he passed the nursery he saw him, and marvel of marvels, he had a little baby astride his foot and was singing to the cunning little creature 'How the Derby Was Won,' while the babe chuckled to its little heart's delight. When he saw his host, the guest was a little confused, but finishing the song he rose, and bade the kiddy goodnight. 'Goodnight, and thank you, General George Washington,' cried out the child." How happy the child must have been in later life to recall the time when the great leader forgot his dinner engagement in order to play a bit with him. Washington's great heart was denied the supreme joy of children of his own.

Thus our leader was great in all respects. Like a rare gem of purest ray, turn and examine it from whatever point of view you choose, you will be struck with the piercing beauty and fineness of this nature. Rich, talented, cultured, loving, friendly, respected—yet ready to give up all possessions to help men to be free, willing to sacrifice all for an ideal of justice. To appreciate the greatness of Washington, ask yourself now, as I ask myself: "What would I have done under the circumstances which he faced?" How many chances he had for an "Honorable peace" as the Tories spoke of it; and how his soul must have yearned for rest and quiet beside the still waters in Virginia. Yet, for eight long years, friends, he fought, he inspired, he lent, borrowed, gave, suffered and plodded on for an ideal. God helped him win; God delighted to honor such a man then. God delights to honor such men today.

"We have seen many soldiers who have left behind them little but the memory of their conflicts; but among all the victors, the power to establish among a great people a form of self-government, which the tests of experience have shown will endure, was bestowed upon Washington and Washington alone." These are the words from the lips of ex-President Coolidge, and how true we feel them to be: "Many others have been able to destroy. He was able to construct. That he had around him many great minds does not detract from his glory. His was the directing spirit, without which there would have been no independence, no Union, no Constitution and no Republic. His ways were the ways of truth. He built for eternity. His influence grows. His stature increases with the increasing years. In wisdom of action, in purity of character, he stands alone. We cannot yet estimate him; we can only indicate our reverence for him and thank the Divine Providence which sent him to serve and inspire his fellow men."

BRAZIL

BRAZIL'S participation in the Celebration of the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington was marked throughout by a spirit of fraternity between the peoples of the two largest republics in the Western Hemisphere that was happily sounded on the opening day of the celebration by the Minister of Foreign Affairs of Brazil in the following cablegram:

RIO DE JANEIRO, FEBRUARY 22, 1932.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE OF THE UNITED STATES
WASHINGTON.

ON THIS GLORIOUS DATE WHEN HUMANITY CELEBRATES THE BIRTH OF THE GREAT AMERICAN WHO CREATED AND ORGANIZED THE FEDERATIVE REPUBLIC OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA ON INDESTRUCTIBLE FOUNDATIONS, AND WHO, BY HIS GREAT PUBLIC AND PRIVATE VIRTUES GAVE TO THE WORLD THE CLASSIC TYPE OF APOSTLE OF DEMOCRACY, I HAVE THE HONOR OF EXPRESSING TO YOUR EXCELLENCY AND TO THE AMERICAN PEOPLE IN THE NAME OF MY GOVERNMENT, MY CORDIAL COMPLIMENTS AND BRAZIL'S FRATERNAL CONGRATULATIONS.

(SIGNED) AFRANIO MELLO FRANCO, MINISTER OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS OF BRAZIL.

That same spirit of fraternity between Brazil and the United States was evidenced on each of the many occasions during the Bicentennial year when the Brazilian people, through their official representatives in the Government, and as organized groups, expressed their admiration for George Washington and their friendship for the nation he founded. Even the school children of Brazil entered into this general expression of international union invoked by the bicentennial anniversary of George Washington, to whose name, in the words of a prominent Brazilian, "is attached the idea of liberty of all the peoples in the American continent . . . Brazil, whose republic was based on the North American federation founded by Washington, can not but join in this commemoration."

In Rio de Janeiro, capital of Brazil, the first celebration of the bicentennial year was organized by a Brazilian patriotic society, the "Centro Carioca," and took the form of a wreath-laying ceremony at the base of the American Friendship Monument in the Esplanada do Castello the morning of February 22.

The American Friendship Monument was donated to "Rio" as the city is popularly known, by the American colony there, but the "Centro Carioca" had made its erection possible by the contribution of the pedestal and by the preparation of the ground. It was therefore particularly appropriate that the celebration in honor of the "first American" should have begun at this statue and under the auspices of this organization.

The ceremony was simple, but dignified and inspiring in character. Prof. Benevenuto Berna, president of the "Centro Carioca" and a warm admirer of the United States, laid a beautiful wreath of laurel at the base of the statue in the name of his organization. Then Dr. Edmundo de Miranda Jordão, on behalf of the "Centro Carioca," delivered an eloquent address, which was acknowledged in the name of the American colony by Mr. Philip Fitzpatrick, president of the American Chamber of Commerce for Brazil.

The American Ambassador, Hon. Edwin V. Morgan, was present at the exercises, as was the Mayor of the Federal District, Dr. Pedro Ernesto, and Prof. Ariosto Berna, secretary of the "Centro Carioca." His Excellency, Dr. Getulio Vargas, President of Brazil, was represented, and members of the Cabinet and other high officials, the diplomatic corps, and practically the entire American colony attended.

Addressing the large gathering, Dr. Miranda Jordão pointed out that the successful foundation of an independent nation in North America "was the forerunner of the independence of all the nations in the American continent" and that "the brilliant activity of George Washington" in the cause of American independence "had repercussion in our country which was then Portugal's colony under the domination of a despotic government." Dr. Miranda Jordão's speech follows in full:

In the history of peoples there appear extraordinary types of men destined to glorify a nation and whose names shine in the universal orbit, invoking the admiration of mankind. George Washington was one of these men, and his individuality was so great and so exemplified in the foundation and organization of a new nation, that his name passed beyond the frontiers of his own country and he became a citizen of the world.

According to tradition, George Washington's mother saw in a dream when he was still a child, the future greatness of her son.

An old Indian chief, referring to George Washington when he began his warrior life, prophesied:

UNITED STATES AMBASSADOR EDWIN V. MORGAN AND SCHOOL CHILDREN AT BICENTENNIAL CELEBRATION IN RIO DE JANEIRO.

"There is a something bids me speak in the voice of prophecy. Listen! The Great Spirit protects that man, and guides his destinies. He will become the chief of nations, and a people yet unborn will hail him as the founder of a mighty empire!"

As a matter of fact, in the heat of battles, George Washington placed himself in front of his troops, insensible to danger, and the enemy's bullets passed now and again above him, even killing the horses he rode, but his life was always preserved by a miracle, as if he were under the protection of a lucky star.

Glorious winner of the War of Independence of his Country, George Washington displayed also an extraordinary capacity as a statesman, and his opinions effectively prevailed in the organization of the nation which was being formed and which elected him afterwards its first President. He was reelected for this high position and became to such an extent the benefactor of his country that American people proudly proclaimed him "First in War, first in Peace, and first in the Hearts of his Countrymen."

Fighting for the liberty of his people, George Washington symbolized this liberty in the first Independence Flag, under which he led his soldiers, thus describing it:

"We take the Stars from the Heavens, the red from the Mother country, separating it by white Stripes, thus showing we have separated from her, and the stripes shall go down to posterity representing liberty."

It was the worship of liberty which, consolidating the great American nation, spread itself throughout the New Continent, inspiring its peoples in the battles for independence.

George Washington may thus be considered as the forerunner of the independence of all the nations in the American Continent.

João Ribeiro, one of the most conspicuous of our historians, wrote on this very subject:

"The Republican Independence in the United States caused, little by little, the adoption by all American countries of republican governments. Little by little federalism, of which the United States was the spontaneous expression, became the political theory of all the new Republics."

Brazilian history shows that the echoes of the independence of the thirteen English colonies in the North of the Continent had repercussion in our country, which was then Portugal's colony, under the domination of a despotic government which tortured our people. In spite of preventive steps taken by the government to withhold from the people any news considered prejudicial to public order and likely to cause popular dissatisfaction, the events reached our people's knowledge.

The brilliant activity of George Washington in behalf of American Independence received general recognition among our people and soon afterwards we knew also the terms of Jefferson's proclamation written on July 4th, 1776, particularly the famous preamble to the Declaration of Independence.

A great interest was aroused among the cultured elements of Colonial Brazil by George Washington's circular letter, dated June 8th, 1783, stating the following principles:

"There are four things, which, I humbly conceive, are essential to the well-being, I may even venture to say, to the existence of the United States, as an independent power.

"First. An indissoluble union of the States under one federal head. Secondly. A sacred regard to public justice. Thirdly. The adoption of a proper peace establishment; and, Fourthly. The prevalence of that pacific and friendly disposition among the people of the United States, which will induce them to forget their local prejudices and policies; to make those mutual concessions, which are requisite to the general prosperity; and, in some instances, to sacrifice their individual advantages to the interest of the community."

The fact is, that in October, 1786, a patriot of Rio de Janeiro, José Joaquim da Maia, wrote a letter, in his own name and in that of some of our countrymen then in Europe, addressed to Thomas Jefferson, Ambassador of the United States in Paris, requesting an audience to initiate a movement for the independence of Brazil, for which the help of North America was sought.

In answer, although Jefferson remarked that the United States was on friendly terms with Portugal, he appointed an interview in Nimes, and José Joaquim da Maia explained the possibilities which would be open to Brazil by the victory of the revolution and the foundation of a new republic. Jefferson wrote to John Jay, then Secretary of State of Foreign Affairs: "Brazilians consider the American Revolution as precursor of the one they long for."

While Maia was in Europe taking the first steps towards our independence, in the heart of Brazil, the Capitania of Minas Geraes, a revolution was being prepared to implant a republican government similar to that of the United States. This was the famous Conspiracy of the State of Minas in 1789. The organisers declared that they wished "the mother country made independent, free tillage and exports, the abolishment of taxes, that constitute slavery and robbery; the establishment among us of a university, local justice, administration and government." Their motto was "Libertas quae sera tamen"—Liberty although late. This program became a reality, although many years later.

It is recorded that Lieutenant Tiradentes, the soul of this movement, addressing Dr. José Alvares Maciel, had put on record the political comparison between Brazil, indifferent to everything, and the United States, vigorous, confident and gloriously triumphant in the first war they had undertaken.

Conspiring openly, the enterprise in behalf of independence was soon discovered and the conspirators arrested in Minas and in Rio de Janeiro and condemned, some of them to banishment, others to confinement. Tiradentes, as an exception, suffered the supreme penalty, being hanged in a public square of this city, his corpse cut into quarters, so that the punishment might be a lesson to the people, as was cruelly proclaimed by the Portuguese royalists.

Tiradentes thus became the martyr of Brazilian Independence, actually proclaimed in 1822, and also the forerunner of Republican Government, which was implanted in Brazil a century after his death.

As mentioned above, to George Washington's name is attached the idea of liberty of all the peoples in the American continent and the principle of the federal form of Government in America. Referring to this subject we deem it convenient to remember here another page of that eminent statesman's glorious life, which constitutes, moreover, an example to posterity.

Some ten years after the United States Independence, General Washington, who had just left command of the Nation's army, received the suggestion that, considering the apparent weakness of republican institutions, there were weighty arguments in favor of his accepting the title of King. To this George Washington indignantly answered:

"No occurrence in the course of the war has given me more painful sensations . . . you could not have found a person to whom your schemes were more disagreeable. . . . Let me conjure you, then, if you have any regard for your country, concern for yourself or posterity, or respect for me, to banish these thoughts from your mind, and never communicate, as from yourself or any one else, a sentiment of the like nature."

This answer is a clear definition of the character of the remarkable statesman, who upheld principles in behalf of his native country, but who had no personal ambition for pompous titles. He preferred to establish democracy on a solid basis in his country, which is a precious lesson to the whole world.

Writing about Democracy in the New World, Helio Lobo says:

"I have no need to relate what has been constructed on the foundation of 1787. The building of your democracy, with the federation, the autonomous and independent powers, the 'habeas corpus,' the jury, in short, every guaranty referring to persons and properties, are all among the gifts of America to civilization. For me the greatest element is this original and eternal lesson of democracy and the basis of all the other advantages which spread itself throughout the world is the fact that inside your frontiers men of all births have been able to work out their political destiny so harmoniously and efficiently."

This commemoration is thus most fitting, and the whole civilized world is celebrating the second century of George Washington's birth. Brazil, whose republic was based on the North American federation founded by Washington, cannot but join in this commemoration, as evidence of her admiration for this extraordinary and glorious personality of both warrior and statesman.

Mr. Fitzpatrick, speaking in Portuguese, then acknowledged Dr. Miranda Jordão's splendid tribute, as follows:

Last Fourth of July the North American colony residing in this cultured and hospitable country, contracted a debt of the deepest gratitude to the "Centro Carioca." To this patriotic organization, interpreter of the noble sentiments of the people of this magestically beautiful corner of the world, we owe the erection of this symbolic statue, this evidence of friendship which cannot be viewed by North Americans except with emotions of pride and patriotism that well from the heart.

In this statue we see, beautifully interlaced, the flags of the sister-republics, Brazilian and American. But above all, the illustrious sculptor, Prof. Benevenuto Berna, worthy president of the "Centro Carioca," has symbolized the faith, the community of ideals and aspirations of the two countries, by uniting in the same wreath of laurel those two great international figures—José Bonifacio and George Washington, sublime and intermingling spirits, who so gloriously represented their countries in their most difficult and trying times. This wreath interprets beautifully the cordial relations and strong friendship always increasing between our countries, just as our flags—forever commingled in this monument—symbolize Brazilian-American amity.

This brilliant and spontaneous celebration to honor the memory of George Washington, (I speak from my heart and interpret the unanimous sentiments of my compatriots,) touches us deeply, especially those of us who have the privilege of living in this beautiful capital and assisting at this significant ceremony.

Let me thank, then, the "Centro Carioca," which, in this solemn observance, as the representative of the Brazilian people, has given another proof of consideration and real friendship. Let me also extend our gratitude to Dr. Miranda Jordão, who as spokesman for the "Centro Carioca," has referred to the great international importance of George Washington in such an eloquent and brilliant discourse.

The ceremony at the statue closed with the singing of the "Star Spangled Banner" by the pupils of the American Graded School who had attended in a body. The children were accompanied by the Military Police Band which followed the singing of the American anthem with a stirring rendition of the Brazilian national anthem.

The morning program was followed at noon by a George Washington Birthday Luncheon under the auspices of the American Society of Rio de Janeiro with the cooperation of the American Chamber of Commerce for Brazil. The luncheon, held at the Palace Hotel, was attended by 132 persons, including the American Ambassador, high officials of the Brazilian government, members of the American Society and American Chamber of Commerce and many Brazilian friends. The Brazilian Foreign Office was represented by Dr. Jayme Chermont and the "Centro Carioca" by its president, Dr. Benvenuto Berna and its secretary, Dr. Ariosto Berna.

Mr. Russell Manning, president of the American Society, presided and after a short address, introduced Ambassador Morgan. The American Ambassador then spoke briefly but effectively of the anniversary that was being observed that day and of the nobility of character that had made Washington a citizen, not of one nation, but of the whole world. He touched a responsive chord, in the hearts of the Americans especially, when he referred to the desolate, tragic winter at Valley Forge, and described the present distressing economic condition as "today's Valley Forge." He said that what everyone needed in these times were the splendid attributes of character which had "shown forth like a beacon from George Washington's spirit" and had made him loved and revered by his compatriots, even in the midst of adversity, just as he is loved and admired today.

The Ambassador concluded his remarks with an introduction of the principal speaker of the occasion, Mr. Carlton Jackson, American Commercial Attaché. Mr. Jackson's address follows:

In undertaking any discriminating appreciation of the Father of His Country more time would be required than is within the limits of a quarter of an hour's talk. The subject is too broad; there are so many aspects to be covered, that one must be limited to one or two phases. All of us here as Americans know, or should, the principal narrative of his life, his excellent breeding but poverty-stricken youth, his early and hard work as a pioneering engineer, his services against the French and Indians, his organization and management of the Continental Army, his great part in the formation of the Federal Constitution and government, and his final and long service as President of the country. Such a narrative would be easy for me or for anyone.

Of more novel interest, and more difficult, is the matter of his personality, by which I mean the combination of mind, spirit and body that made the man George Washington. There was no other of our statesmen who wrote more minutely than he of personal affairs, none who was a more diligent diarist, recording the purchase of a horse or a slave, the rotation and cultivation of the crops in his plantations, his production of malt and spiritous liquors, his winnings and losses on horse-races and chicken-fights. But in all the abundance of his writings the man himself is not easy to perceive; he is hidden behind the very volume of his words, and behind the stilted manner of expression that was regarded as proper writing in those days.

I myself, like most youngsters, felt an early dislike for the man—the cherry tree story made him impossible of emulation for me. I knew that under the circumstances I would have taken the easy way; it was far from impossible for me to tell a lie. Also, I always suspected that George knew that his father probably "had the goods on him" anyway. A few years later it happened that I fell into possession of what was then private and scandalous information about the great man. One of my forbears, the first of the name, to the best of my knowledge, to migrate to the district of Tennessee, had lived as a young man in Williamsburg in Virginia. There, like Washington, he kept an assiduous journal, now a prized heirloom in the family of my kinsman. I had the privilege of reading it, and learned, to my enlightenment, that Washington was a familiar but venerated figure at tavern and race-track, that he never missed a gay ball if he could help it, and that within the length of my ancestor's knowledge of him, he never failed in appreciation of a pretty face and figure. That did not sound like the prig that Parson Weems wrote about in his history book. Also, even our school histories tell how he "cussed" General Charles Lee for letting his men retreat in a battle. Other personal journals tell us that Washington had a most warm and feeling heart; he put up patiently with the irregularities of his stepson, and he wept at the death of his little stepdaughter.

So we can consider the qualities of his mind and spirit with realization that he was a man after all, and not the remote and incomprehensible being that the orthodox histories for awhile made him. Perhaps his outstanding personal quality was determination. The old German philosophers taught us that the ultimate and essential entity of the human ego is the will, and he had that to supreme degree. On his first official task with Christopher Gist to take the warning to the French commandant on the Ohio River, he encountered as many obstacles as did ever the man who carried the message to Garcia. Others before him had faltered and turned back, but Washington did it to the warm approbation of the royal governor. We remember, then, his unflagging persistence with the usually disorganized and frequently incompetent army of the Revolution, his scorn of the malice and ingratitude of some of his associates, his steady support of the plan and creation of a constitution and Federal government, and finally, his lofty strength in the presidency, his frustration of the clamors of theorists and of jingos.

But a will without wisdom—judgment—is a dangerous implement. Benedict Arnold and General Conway probably possessed wills as strong as Washington's, but good sense was lacking. Washington's mind could not have been called nimble, but he had the discretion to make himself study any matter before deciding about it; his continuous experience in directing people and in fighting gave him the capacity to know when his conclusion was right. Since stenographic records were not usually kept, and newspapers almost nonexistent, we do not know the details of many of his administrative actions and decisions, but we have the crystallization of them in his messages and farewell addresses, and his prescience in them is invoked now more than ever before. He, possibly more than any other man, contributed to the creation of the Constitution, a work called by Gladstone "the most wonderful work ever struck off at a given time by the brain and purpose of man." Behind the glamor of the earlier military fame, and of the later austerity of the presidency, many of us have not realized the overpowering influence of Washington at that critical period.

He lived his life in the objective rather than the subjective. He was above all practical. If any qualms ever assailed him about religious beliefs or about the organization of society he never mentioned them. He condemned slavery from economic and not ethical grounds; he did not like to see people hanged or otherwise killed, but when it seemed necessary he did not hesitate. It should not be forgotten that that was an age, too, of questioning and doubt. Paine, Rousseau, Voltaire, even our own Patrick Henry and Jefferson were image breakers, and their expressions were not unread by Washington, who indeed, was an indefatigable orderer of books. The robust strength of his mind and of his body kept him to realities; he may have admired some of the iconoclasm, but he knew unerringly what degree of Utopianism the American people could assimilate.

As an ethical quality, perhaps, could be called his utter faithfulness to his task, and that, indeed, to me is the most admirable quality that he possessed. To him, public office was not only a public trust, but a personal task. Public service no doubt tends to beget irresponsibility, for the public servant knows that his employer, the public, will probably be ungrateful anyway. Any employer of people will agree that entire loyalty to the employer and to the job is greater even than efficiency. It can be easily believed that in America, then, there was no other man available who had both the capacity and the loyalty to the task that Washington had.

Finally, from the standpoint of modern business he was a successful man. Although he gained much and early, by inheritance and by marriage, he knew how to keep and increase what he had. He was as modern a farmer as there was in Virginia, wholly a region of farms then. Like Laben's, his flocks and herds and fruits increased under his husbandry. Even the exigencies of military campaigns did not make him forget to look to his own, with admonition and instruction. On the base of present standards, he probably died a millionaire.

Thus for his spirit, his mind and his ethics. No reasonable person has ever disputed his being the greatest statesman, at any rate the one who did the most, of all the Americans. Two hundred years ago it certainly did not occur to his mother that the newborn, sturdy infant would ever be President, but she surely hoped and believed that he would be a great man.

How, in one word, to call his greatness? One thinks of "grandeur," but that is vague. "Wise," "determined," "good," "strong"; each is apt, but not enough. The Greeks, of course, had a name for it, but in the lack of that, I can think only in terms of place, and for that no one can ever better the ever-repeated characterization by his friend and life-long neighbor, Col. Richard Henry Lee—"First in War, First in Peace, and First in the Hearts of His Countrymen."

The luncheon concluded with music rendered by the Columbia Orchestra and was acclaimed by the enthusiastic guests as a great success and a memorable celebration of a great anniversary.

An added touch was given to the day by two other interesting, though informal events. In the morning, after the exercises at the Friendship Statue, the pupils of the American Graded School called upon Ambassador Morgan at the American Embassy. They had discovered that February 22 was the birthday of the Ambassador of the United States as well as that of the First President, and so paid their respects to him also, as the representative of their country.

That afternoon, the American members of the Rotary Club of Rio de Janeiro presented a library of reference books to the "Escola dos Estados Unidos" (United States School), a local public primary school. Dr. Richard P. Momsen, a prominent American attorney in Rio, made the presentation on behalf of his compatriots in the following appropriate speech:

Young friends of the Escola dos Estados Unidos:

You who make up the soul of this school, are already well known to the North Americans living in Brazil not only through the knowledge of the name of this school itself, of which we are proud, but also for your very fine rendering of the American National Anthem at the time of the inauguration of the Statue of Friendship last year.

Your accomplishments that day made a very fine impression upon us and it is therefore not surprising that the North Americans who are members of the Rotary Club of this city should have decided to contribute toward celebrating the Bicentennial of George Washington's birth by dedicating to you this library which I now present on behalf of my companions and myself.

As the school children of our country contributed toward the Statue of Friendship, so may we hope that the use of this library by you may bring your thoughts closer in friendship to your little friends in the United States.

Just a few words about George Washington.

You have probably heard of the story of the Cherry Tree. When George Washington was a little boy his father discovered that his pet cherry tree had been cut to the ground. He was naturally very angry and suspecting who had done the deed called in little George who said to his father: "Father, I cannot tell a lie—I did it with my little hatchet."—This story of a boy who later became a great soldier, a great general, freed his country and then was chosen the first president of the United States, is one of the first stories that are told to children in North America.

George Washington was, however, like most other boys. He liked sports especially, and most of all, playing war against the Indians because he had heard of real Indian wars which had taken place in his country not long before.

His education was much more limited than yours; he learned to read, write and do arithmetic from a servant in his father's employ. When he was about 15 years old he decided to be a surveyor and being a very good rider he got a position surveying some big farms. He then became a farmer and later when the United States fought for its freedom he became a great soldier, and finally as their general led the American armies to victory. He was so beloved for his uprightness, his kindness and his wisdom that he was unanimously chosen to be the first president of the new country.

As you go forward in your studies you will find men in the history of Brazil with the same character as George Washington and who have done for your country what George Washington did for the United States. I recommend that you study these men's lives so that, when you grow up to manhood and womanhood you will also be able to contribute to Brazil's great future, that it may continue to be a country of which you can be justly proud.

This concluded the actual program of events, but all day long, the city gave evidence of the admiration of its citizens for George Washington. Brazilian and American flags waved from all the government buildings, including the Brazilian Foreign Office—the handsome old Itamaraty Palace—while American residents flew the Stars and Stripes from their homes and offices. The result was a gala effect that gave added color and beauty to what is acknowledged as one of the most beautiful cities in the world—situated as it is on the picturesque bay whose name it bears, “River of January,” so called by its Portuguese discoverers because it was first seen by them on January 1, 1531.

Pan American Day, April 14, offered the next occasion in Rio de Janeiro for observing the bicentennial of George Washington’s birth, when the Brazilian Educational Association held a special commemorative session in honor of the double significance of the day.

The celebration, which was held in one of the large theaters, the “Theater João Caetano,” opened with the playing of the “Pan American Hymn” by the orchestra. The Minister of Foreign Affairs, Dr. Afranio de Mello Franco, presided and delivered an address that recalled the founding of the Pan American union between the republics of the Western Hemisphere, nations which had achieved independence by following the inspiration and example given by George Washington.

The Mexican Ambassador to Brazil, Dr. Affonso

Reys, was the next speaker on the program and he stressed the importance of intellectual exchange between the American republics. This was further emphasized by the other speakers, Dr. Fernando de Magalhães, rector of the University, Dr. Barbosa Lima Sobrinho and Sra. Orminda Bastos, who also pointed out the role of women, especially teachers, in the work of international friendship. The meeting closed with the singing of the national hymn of Brazil by the pupils of the Secondary School of the Institute of Education. As reported by Ambassador Morgan, who was an honor guest, “the attendance was large and the spirit of the meeting excellent.”

The following day, April 15, brought another outstanding commemoration in honor of Pan American Day and the First President of the United States. This celebration was held by the Brazilian Society of International Law and took place in the magnificent conference room of the Foreign Office in the Itamaraty Palace, that dates from the days of the Portuguese conquerors.

Dr. Rodrigo Octavio, a Justice of the Supreme Court of Brazil, presided, as president of the Brazilian Society of International Law, but after a few brief introductory remarks, yielded the chair to the Minister of Foreign Affairs, Dr. Mello Franco. Other prominent persons occupying places on the platform were the American Ambassador, Mr. Morgan, Dr. Epitacio Pessoa, former president of Brazil, and Dr. Raul Fernandes, legal adviser of the BRAZILIAN SOCIETY OF INTERNATIONAL LAW MEETING TO PAY HONOR TO THE MEMORY OF GEORGE WASHINGTON IN RIO DE JANEIRO. 1, Dr. Epitacio Pessoa; 2, Dr. Rodrigo Octavio; 3, Dr. Mello Franco, Minister of Foreign Affairs of Brazil; 4, United States Ambassador Edwin V. Morgan; 5, Dr. Raul Fernandes.

Brazilian Government and principal speaker of the occasion. The brilliant audience included representatives of the Foreign Office and other government officials, the diplomatic corps, representatives of Brazilian institutions of learning, members of the Society of International Law and other distinguished Brazilians, and prominent Americans of the local colony.

Dr. Octavio opened the program by speaking of the significance of Pan American Day and of this homage to the first American liberator. He said that in the United States there was an organization "for honoring the liberators of the nations of South America," and that the honor being paid that day to George Washington by Brazilians and by the Brazilian Society of International Law was, in effect, a similar activity in South America "for honoring the liberator of North America."

Dr. Mello Franco then spoke briefly of the purpose of this extraordinary meeting of the Brazilian Society of International Law—to honor George Washington in connection with Pan American Day, a day "chosen by the American Continent, of which he is one of the Patriarchs, as an occasion of fellowship among their peoples." Dr. Mello Franco's remarks follow:

This meeting of the Brazilian Society of International Law is for the purpose of honoring the memory of George Washington, the patriarch of the great Republic of the North and, indeed, one of the greatest figures of Humanity.

This year witnesses the bicentennial of his birth, and this commemoration is one of the many commemorations which are taking place in all civilized nations, especially in all the Republics of America, for the purpose of honoring, with gratitude and respect, the noble soldier, patriot, leader and apostle, who in the New World changed the political structure inherited from Europe and thus wrote his immortal name on one of the greatest pages of history.

In associating Washington's name with the idea symbolized by Pan American Day, which was celebrated yesterday, it was the desire of the Brazilian Society of International Law to commemorate the second centenary of Washington on the same day that was chosen by the American Continent, of which he is one of the Patriarchs, as an occasion of fellowship among their peoples . . . The generous idea which inspired the creation of Pan American Day is inseparable from the names of those great men who, at the birth of the Nations of this Continent, were the liberators of the peoples of America, the founders of their institutions, and the defenders of their independence.

Thus, it is impossible to evoke the symbol of the unity of the Continent under the rule of liberty, justice and peace, based on the indestructible foundation of loyal cooperation, without recalling, through an inescapable association of ideas, the austere figure of Washington, who, in the words of Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler, incarnated for a quarter of a century all that was best, all that was most unselfish, most brave, most noble and most profoundly patriotic in the aspirations and life of the American Nation.

Dr. Mello Franco then introduced Dr. Raul Fernandes, principal speaker of the day. In transmitting Dr. Fernandes' speech, a translation of which follows, Ambassador Morgan said that the speaker had "analyzed with judgment and appreciation the character and services of President Washington."

Dr. Fernandes first described the character and achievements of Washington, emphasizing his modesty and pointing out that the man himself had probably thought that he had done nothing extraordinary. He then continued:

. . . I think that George Washington must have looked thus retrospectively over his life, although to others it has seemed so great that the civilized world venerates him as a hero, and the United States has raised him up as the tutelary genius of its destiny. He died probably unaware of the consecration of posterity and of the surprising strength of his prestige, seeing in his life, from youth to old age, nothing exceptional or brilliant, no gesture or action capable of producing in thousands of men intelligent reactions, comparable to the physical forces which bring about disturbances or variations in the even tenor of events. . . .

. . . The best and most authentic picture of George Washington which we have is that drawn by Jefferson . . . A man seen thus in light and shadow after the fashion of Rembrandt, and cast into life with such contradictory qualities, might naturally be expected to act in accordance with these characteristics: at times magnificently, at times with mediocrity. Their average should give a character above the common, but far from that of those super-men whose mighty figures stand out from century to century above the dust of humanity.

Nevertheless, Jefferson, that analyst who saw all and hid nothing, ends his sketch with religious emotion, feeling that on the day that Washington died "a great man had perished in Israel." Posterity called him "first in war, first in peace and first in the hearts of his countrymen."

The victory over George III, was the result of patience, courage and tenacity, and was, in fact, inevitable in combination with Lafayette, Rochambeau and De Grasse.

The political victory of the constitutional organization of the United States was the result of loyalty to the people, of unselfishness, and of the lack of personal ambition. These are lesser virtues, perhaps, in that they do not sparkle or stand out in everyday life; but they are by no means insignificant, nor unheroic in this case.

The victorious general was not without instigation to maintain himself in power. This, in a way, was in keeping with the logic of the rebellion of the colonies, which claimed as essential to liberty certain principles of government professed in the mother country, which in the beginning was not anti-monarchial. Neither did this rebellion aspire at first to total independence; therefore history has called it conservative, and placed the responsibility for its revolutionary nature on the government of the King of England.

Thus, if in its first motives, the revolution was not republican, on the other hand, according to historical tradition, a victorious leader, after having crushed the established power, had only to choose between monarchy—keeping the crown for himself—or dictatorship.

Besides this, a republic on the lines upon which it would be necessary to organize the colonies was an entity totally without precedent, risky and full of dangers. The ancient Greek republics were cities, their populations were small and power was concentrated in the hands of a few individuals.

Rome, politically, was less than Latium; it could never extend to the rest of the country, and much less to the immense territory gained by conquest, the civic rights concentrated in the Senate or in the Forum, until factional controversies and cruel intrigues had raised the sword of Brutus and opened the imperial age. The annals of the Italian Republics of the Renaissance, also insignificant in area and population, were but a succession of town controversies and family quarrels, which were abolished through invasion and conquest.

Thus, the advocates of monarchy came and whispered these things to Washington—pure theory; an objective appreciation of the sequence of events and of the effects proved by history; a matter, in fact, for a majestic proclamation in which the usurpation of power would take on the aspect of an act of salvation.

The victorious general knew only his arithmetic, his bit of geometry, and the history of England; but his heart was brave and true; he was unpretentious and without personal ambition; he was loyal. He had won the war, indeed, but he had won it with soldiers, and these soldiers were farmers and countrymen who had fought unselfishly in order to obtain political liberty, and not to enthrone a new dynasty, and much less to set up a dictatorship.

Washington did not set himself up either as king or dictator, but disbanded his army and appeared at the Convention of Philadelphia as a member from Virginia.

As President of the Republic, Washington confessed that he was not sure of the political edifice erected by the Convention. He maintained, therefore, a few ceremonies and rites copied from the Court of England, so that in case of failure and the necessity of establishing a monarchy, the people might be prepared, at least in the outward pomp inseparable from the institution. But he declared firmly that it was his ardent desire to bend every effort to the experiment of a great federative republic. After eight years of two consecutive presidencies the experiment was complete. The child Hercules had left the cradle and had learned to walk. As there was then no legal impediment to a third term, the presidency was again offered him; but he refused, declaring that a long term held by one man might corrupt republican institutions. And after having established this precedent, which has been religiously followed by his successors, he retired to the country, and accomplished without difficulty the difficult feat, to some so disastrous, of again becoming a simple citizen, without privileges, special honors or following.

But I am wrong in saying "without privileges," for he did enjoy a difference, an exemption, a reward for his immortal services. As a token of public gratitude he was exempted from postal fees.

And so the enigma is solved. Without the attribute of easy geniality, without great or profound learning, without unusual military talents, without special ability and experience in statesmanship, Washington has risen to those immense heights where his memory endures as a symbol of those virtues which are not distinctions of the leader of men but which should adorn every man in the accomplishment of the inevitable task assigned to him by destiny.

We should think of Washington as a model offered to us for contemplation and an example at all times, in the past, the present and the future. For the citizens of the United States he is a national glory; for us a standard, like the platinum meter measure kept under glass at the International Bureau in Berne, or like the nuns whose life is given up to seclusion or militant charity—prototypes of renunciation and humility, of virtues which we cannot practice wholly ourselves. Nevertheless it is good to know that they exist and what they are like, for they serve as a kind of ideal, and in the greater or less measure in which we approach them, so does life become less sordid, more noble, more worthy and more real.

July 4, American Independence Day, was the occasion for two observances of the bicentennial in Rio de Janeiro—one at the "United States School" (Escola dos Estados Unidos), the other at the American Embassy.

At the school, a portrait of George Washington which had been presented by the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission was unveiled with simple but impressive ceremonies, attended by representatives from the American Embassy and high officials of the city and of the municipal school system. During the course of the ceremony it was announced that the "Escola dos Estados Unidos" would not long be alone in bearing a name that honors the United States, but that it is planned to erect more public schools in the near future, the first one of which will be named "George Washington"—an announcement that was received with real appreciation by the Americans in the audience.

This school ceremony in the capital of Brazil had an interesting aftermath in the presentation of an album commemorating the occasion to a school in the capital of the United States. The Raymond School in Washington, D. C., had been instrumental in increasing the interest of the "United States School" in the First President of the nation for which it was named, by an exchange of letters between the pupils of the two schools. In response, the Brazilian school compiled a "George Washington Album" containing compositions and letters on the great North American patriot and photographs of the unveiling of his portrait. The album was tied in the Brazilian national colors and sent to the Washington school through the Brazilian Embassy.

The other event of July 4 in the Brazilian capital, was the presentation of a portrait of George Washington made entirely of minute pieces of postage stamps, to the President of the United States through the American Embassy. This unique portrait was a gift of the "Centro Carioca" and was made by one of its officers, Mr. Agostinho Dias Nunes d'Almeida.

Calling at the American Embassy in recognition of American Independence Day, a delegation of Brazilian citizens representing the "Centro Carioca" presented the portrait to Mr. Walter C. Thurston, Chargé d'Affaires, ad interim, "as an expression of friendship for the United States and veneration for the memory of George Washington." Mr. Thurston accepted the portrait on behalf of President Hoover, together with the following letter which accompanied it:

Rio de Janeiro, July 4, 1932.

To His Excellency Herbert Hoover

President of the United States of America.

Eminent American Citizen:

On this great day, so dear to all independent peoples of the New World, the CENTRO CARIOCA has great pleasure in renewing to the glorious Sister Nation of the Northern Continent the assurance of the feelings of true friendship of the Brazilian people.

When the Friendship Monument offered to Brazil by the American people was inaugurated, the CENTRO CARIOCA, through the voice of its speaker, Dr. Edmundo de Miranda Jordão, in the presence and with the applause of the highest Brazilian authorities and of the people of Rio de Janeiro, thus expressed itself in the conclusion of his official speech:

"The CENTRO CARIOCA is confident that it expresses the feelings of all Brazilians in reaffirming publicly to the great brother nation its purpose of maintaining unalterable and even stronger the sincere and true friendship, which was so nobly perpetuated in this statue, and also was perpetuated, under the inspiration of the people and authorities of Rio de Janeiro, in the bronze figures of George Washington and José Bonifácio, founders of our respective political independence, symbolically bound on the granite base of this monument, being thus cast in the reciprocal significance of Friendship."

And in the present year, on February 22, as we commemorate the second centenary of the Patriarch of American Independence, George Washington, those sentiments were renewed in this city, beside the Friendship Monument, the same speaker of CENTRO CARIOCA closing his speech with the following words:

"In this demonstration of fraternity towards the great and noble North American Nation, worthily represented here by her eminent Ambassador, Mr. Edwin Morgan, who is so esteemed and so highly valued in Rio de Janeiro's society, that he has become one of its best known and most necessary figures—CENTRO CARIOCA, as legitimate exponent of the traditions and feelings of the people of the Capital of the United States of Brazil, and in accordance with its program, including the consecration of the Pan American ideal, which is that of all Brazilians, feels authorized to express, through the voice of its humble speaker, the thoughts of all our countrymen.

"In rendering this deserved honor to the memory of George Washington, CENTRO CARIOCA chose the place for the Friendship Monument offered to this city by the people of the great American Nation. On its base was engraved in bronze the figure of the greatest leader of the Independence of the new Continent—to whose memory all Brazilians render their tribute of admiration and enthusiasm, for his life as hero and statesman, the eternal glory of America and of Mankind."

Now, on this date, the CENTRO CARIOCA, in commemoration of American Independence, is happy to have the opportunity of offering to the noble brother people, personified by their honorable President, the image in stamps of the glorious George Washington.

This original piece of a new Brazilian art has been patiently made by one of the directors of the CENTRO CARIOCA, Mr. Agostinho Dias Nunes d'Almeida.

We respectfully reaffirm before Your Excellency the feelings of traditional and indestructible friendship between our two peoples, and ask for permission to present to Your Excellency, the assurances of our highest consideration and respect.

(SIGNED) BENEVENUTO BERNA,
President.

An interesting description of the new branch of Brazilian art of which the George Washington portrait in stamps is an example, is contained in the accompanying explanation supplied by the "Centro Carioca" to the American Embassy at the time the portrait was presented:

Pinacotelia, the art of making pictures with postage stamps, was established in Brazil at the time of the International Exposition held in Rio de Janeiro in 1922, the year of the Centennial of Brazilian Independence.

The author of this work, Mr. Nunes d'Almeida, does this work in spare time. He uses merely postage stamps and the mucilage required, a drawing pencil, scissors for cutting, and a tooth pick with which to apply the mucilage and transfer the little pieces of stamps to the proper places.

For this work, the essential conditions above all others, are time and patience, it being necessary sometimes to hold the breath so as not to blow away the tiny pieces of stamps.

It is by this new branch of Brazilian art that the "Centro Carioca" takes occasion to render homage to the noble American Nation on the day of its Independence and to the Great North American patriarch and statesman, George Washington, upon the second centennial of his birth, with his historical effigy made up entirely of stamps of several countries.

Later in the month, on July 15, the "Centro Carioca," again paid honor to George Washington in a formal meeting of the organization at which, in the words of Senhor Julio Lopes Guedes P., secretary, "there was unveiled with enthusiastic applause in the Main Hall of our meeting place, a picture of that great patriarch of North American independence, George Washington." This portrait was one that had been sent to the "Centro Carioca" by the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission in appreciation of its wholehearted participation in the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington.

Throughout the bicentennial year, the newspapers and magazines of Rio de Janeiro devoted many columns to comments on the great anniversary being observed by the United States. Numerous articles on the life of George Washington were printed, and every local celebration was recorded in detail.

The monthly magazine, VIDA DOMESTICA, dedicated its February, 1932, issue to the George Washington Bicentennial, reproducing on its cover in colors the Gilbert Stuart Athenaeum portrait of George Washington. Its editorial page contained a portrait of the American Ambassador, Mr. Morgan, and an article on George Washington by the American Commercial Attaché, Mr. Jackson, was featured.

The daily newspapers, O JORNAL, JORNAL DO COMMERCIO, CORREIO DA MANHA and JORNAL DO BRASIL, all commented favorably on the Bicentennial. The following translations from editorials in the JORNAL DO COMMERCIO and the JORNAL DO BRASIL of February 21, 1932, are examples of the profound esteem for George Washington voiced by the city's press as Rio de Janeiro joined in the world-wide tribute to this great patriot:

GEORGE WASHINGTON BICENTENNIAL CEREMONY AT THE AMERICAN FRIENDSHIP MONUMENT IN RIO DE JANEIRO.

(From JORNAL DO COMMERCIO)

Not only in the United States of America but also in all the Western Hemisphere and all the world there will be celebrated tomorrow the bicentenary of the birth of one of the greatest men of all times, George Washington.

Washington was great through his actions, his character, his patriotism, his self-abnegation. He was great in peace and in war. General and statesman, his services to his country and the cause of liberty were inestimable.

The war of independence to which he devoted body and soul was kept from being a selfish battle for the few and was, instead, a fight for the ideals of all.

The influence exerted by the American war of independence on the rest of the world made a great figure of the national liberator.

He made a nation out of a colony, giving liberty to its people. He founded a state out of his country. He organized this state for war and for peace. He provided it with wise laws and with a constitution which was used as a model by many other peoples seeking their liberty.

Disinterested, he refused honors and remunerations, exposing himself to every danger purely for love of his country. First President of the United States, elected for two terms, he refused the third election, retiring to the private life of a farmer. However, death cut him down.

Not only the United States but the whole world was saddened when George Washington died. The army of Napoleon and the British squadrons in the English Channel carried black crêpe on their flags.

Because of his rectitude, and common sense, Washington is the idol of the United States and tomorrow the whole world will remember the man who was "first in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his country-men."

(From JORNAL DO BRASIL)

Without a doubt, George Washington is to be found in the gallery of the great figures of humanity. Warrior and statesman, as the years pass, his memory is more and more exalted not only by the people of North America, but also by all the other nations of the "continent of Columbus."

Pioneer of Liberty in America, the United States, that great republic that is now one of the most powerful nations in the world, owes its organization in great part to the wisdom with which Washington developed, after the victories that freed his country from English domination, a federation from component parts which differed widely.

The life of this great man was really a model of civic virtue. Modest and essentially democratic, Washington, after the war of independence, sheathed his sword, cast aside all honors, and retired to Mount Vernon, where he devoted himself to cultivating the land.

But this was not to last long, for the American people could not dispense with the services of Washington. They sought him out and gave him the honor of being the first President of the new republic.

If during the war, he demonstrated his great qualities as a leader, defeating with a small number of patriots the seasoned British troops—during peace time, as the first chief of his nation, he was able to develop on a democratic basis the great North American nation.

It is for this that the American people tomorrow, date of the bicentenary of his birth, will begin a series of special celebrations to glorify the memory of this, their greatest citizen. The Brazilian people, essentially democratic, are happy to associate themselves in this homage to George Washington, founder of the first and largest republic of our continent.

São Paulo (which boasts a population of 900,000 and is the capital of the state of the same name that produces 60 per cent of the world's coffee), was going through an unsettled political period during 1932, and observance of the bicentennial of Washington's birth was therefore limited.

However, on February 22, the American Consul General at São Paulo, Mr. C. R. Cameron, observed "open house" in honor of the day, and gave an interview to the daily paper, DIARIO DA NOITE which reported:

As a good Yankee, Mr. Cameron did not hide his enthusiasm for that great American figure so indissolubly linked with democracy and the foundation of his country. "George Washington," said Mr. Cameron, "is the greatest figure of North America. In every school, as part of the primary education, the children are told of his deeds and his fine example. No one but George Washington could merit such homage or serve as a guide to the youth of the United States. He has two outstanding characteristics: rectitude and altruism. He was a great general in war and a great leader in peace, but perhaps he is greatest 'in the hearts of his countrymen' as shown by the nine months celebration in his honor."

The American School in São Paulo also observed the birthday of the founder of the nation for which it was named. There were special programs in every class in honor of George Washington and to emphasize his achievements in the cause of American liberty.

The Rotary Club of São Paulo dedicated its regular February meeting on February 19 to honoring George Washington, and the "Instituto Historico e Geographico de São Paulo" held a special meeting on February 22 in tribute to the "North American liberator."

The São Paulo newspapers were enthusiastic in their acclaim of George Washington and all through the bicentennial year printed articles about his life and accomplishments. DIARIO POPULAR, DIARIO DA NOITE, A GAZETA, DIARIO NACIONAL, DIARIO DE SAO PAULO and O ESTADO DE SAO PAULO all published pictures of Washington and articles about him. The last-named paper, O ESTADO DE SAO PAULO, reproduced as the full page front cover of its weekly rotogravure supplement for February 29, 1932, a wood-cut of George Washington in medallion form owned by the American consulate general. There were 100,000 copies printed of this special issue—a splendid tribute.

Summing up the observance of the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington in São Paulo, in a letter to the Commission, Consul General Cameron wrote:

Conditions in São Paulo during the entire period designated were quite unsettled, being characterized by acute unrest and a revolution which completely isolated São Paulo from the rest of the world for three months. These conditions made any formal celebrations impracticable. The Thanksgiving Day dinner, which the American colony regularly holds, and which it was planned this year to turn into a Washington celebration of the colony and Brazilian friends, had to be abandoned on account of local conditions. However, the literature so kindly forwarded by you was distributed to the newspapers and formed the basis of numerous laudatory newspaper articles on George Washington.

Santos, bustling ocean port for São Paulo, eight miles inland, was handicapped by the same conditions as that city, in observing the bicentennial. However, Vice Consul Arthur G. Parsloe held an official reception at the consulate on July 4 in honor of American Independence Day and of the Bicentennial of George Washington's birth. "Some 90 guests were present," he reported, "including members of the American and Brazilian colonies and others, local civil and military authorities, and foreign consular representatives stationed here." He added that Santos had long ago expressed its admiration for the First President of the United States by naming a park for him, the "Praça George Washington."

In Bahia, a city of 300,000 and picturesquely built on two levels, the American Consul, Mr. Lawrence P. Briggs, presented one of the local public schools with a framed picture of George Washington which the school officials placed in a special room that was then given the name "Sala George Washington." On Pan American Day, April 14, the school reciprocated by sending a delegation of its pupils to call on Consul Briggs and express the admiration of Brazilian school children for George Washington and their friendship for the nation he founded. Consul Briggs also presented a framed picture of Washington to the Government Building of the State of Bahia, where it was hung with appropriate ceremonies.

Recife, or Pernambuco as it was formerly called, is the fourth largest city in Brazil and was seized from the Portuguese and occupied by the Dutch in the 17th century. Three hundred years later it was the scene of celebrations in honor of the founder of a nation then undreamed of by the conquerors of these two Old World powers.

These celebrations, in honor of the bicentennial of George Washington's birth, occurred on February 22 and July 4, 1932, and carried out the plan to commemorate his memory by Americans all over the world. As reported by Mr. F. van den Arend, American Consul, "Celebrations in Recife (Pernambuco) in honor of the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington included a dinner on February 22 and a reception on the Fourth of July at which the small but enthusiastic American colony and foreign friends were present. The July 4 reception was the outstanding American celebration of the year. Among those who attended at the Consul's residence on that day, in addition to the members of the American colony and visiting Americans, were Brazilian officials, the consular corps and prominent members of the Brazilian and British communities."

Washington's birthday in Porto Alegre, capital of the southernmost state of Brazil and lying almost at the farthest point of the southeastern coast of that vast republic, was the scene of one of the largest celebrations of the day in Brazil—a commemorative banquet and dance attended by the entire American colony under the auspices of the American Luncheon Club of Porto Alegre.

An interesting account of the event, as reported on February 24 in the local daily paper, JORNAL DA MANHA, follows:

The two hundredth anniversary of the birth of that great American to whom our noble sister nation owes its independence was commemorated most brilliantly in the capitals of Europe and America as was shown by the telegraphic despatches published yesterday.

The glorious date did not pass uncelebrated in this city, the American and British residents here having organized a splendid festival at which persons of importance in Porto Alegre society were present.

The American Luncheon Club of Porto Alegre, an organization recently founded in this city, composed of American citizens resident here and employes of the American industrial and commercial enterprises operating in the city, held a banquet on the twenty-second at the Club do Commercio, followed by a dance in the salon of the British Club which lasted until early hours.

Both festivities were attended by members of the American and British colonies in Porto Alegre and by a great number of Brazilians who had been courteously invited.

In the name of the organizers, Mr. O. H. Barnett welcomed the guests, the official toast being proposed by the toastmaster, Mr. C. G. Metzleur.

Mr. R. Castleman, the new American Consul, Mr. A. W. Magnitzky, American Vice Consul, Messrs. F. Long, J. E. Moreland and G. C. Macrae, British Consul at Porto Alegre, also spoke.

Amplifying the above newspaper article, The American Consul at Porto Alegre, Mr. Reginald S. Castleman, in a report to the Department of State said:

The two hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington was celebrated at Porto Alegre by a commemorative banquet capably organized by the American Luncheon Club and attended by the entire American colony as well as a number of British friends closely associated with local American life through business or personal relationships. One hundred twenty-six persons were present.

The gala hall in the Club do Commercio where the banquet took place was appropriately decorated, with the American and Brazilian flags properly displayed. "The Star Spangled Banner" was played at the end. The banquet was a successful commemorative function, particularly as it enabled members of our colony to participate who could not have attended a celebration of appropriate ceremonial length held earlier in the day.

The speeches were delivered throughout the meal, as a measure to minimize the influence of the heat upon their effectiveness, it being noted that February is a summer month south of the Equator and the night was warm.

The British Consul, Mr. G. C. Macrae, held the particular interest of the guests with his address which had for its title "That great Englishman who founded his country anew." Mrs. Frank H. Long, prominent religious and social worker in Porto UNVEILING OF PORTRAIT OF GEORGE WASHINGTON AT THE "UNITED STATES SCHOOL" IN RIO DE JANEIRO, BRAZIL.

Alegre, spoke on "The idealization of Washington and the necessity of its continuance." Mr. J. E. Moreland, principal of Porto Alegre College, spoke on "Washington as a Teacher," and during the course of his speech, remarked that its subject had been inspired by a brief but charming and succinct essay by an American school child, which he read as follows:

George Washington was the father of our country. He was a strong man, physically and morally, and he was a great statesman.

He was a powerfully built man, standing more than six feet two inches in height and weighing nearly 200 pounds. He was the best boxer and wrestler in Virginia and no one was ever able to outjump him. Most of his soldiers obeyed him out of respect for him, but there were others who obeyed him because they were afraid of him. He was never known to be afraid of any man or anything.

He was a good man, always loyal to his friends, honest and just to a remarkable degree. He lost his temper at times and was even known to swear on occasions, but he succeeded in conquering his temper by means of an iron will.

He was a great statesman. He fought for a united country and then taught us the principles of liberty. He taught these principles by precept, but, what was far better, by practice. He was a master teacher, a great statesman, and the father of our country.

Mr. Castleman, just arrived at his new post in charge of the American Consulate, was an honor guest and the principal speaker. Following is his tribute to "the great man whom we reverently regard as the Father of Our Country":

Fellow countrymen and kind friends of ours:

Meeting tonight in carefree congeniality, our feeling is naturally one of ease and good cheer. It is pleasant to sit at table with friends one esteems, to forget in good company the exasperations of the day, to relax and enjoy the warmth that these moments bring to the heart. At the same time, our gathering has its serious aspect, perhaps we may say its ceremonial purpose, for we have met to commemorate the anniversary of the great man whom we Americans reverently regard as the Father of Our Country.

As a nation we have had our great leaders. We may rightfully consider that we have been fortunate in the men of capacity, talent and earnest purpose who gave of their best for our welfare. Washington's own epoch was the age of Jefferson, Franklin, Hamilton, Adams, and Marshall. Two later heroes have left names perhaps worthy to be spoken with his. I refer, my friends, to Abraham Lincoln and General Robert E. Lee. But above even these two, as above the giants of his own day, the figure of Washington stands forth in pre-eminence which is unquestioned.

What was it that gave him this highest place in our esteem? Of course, his accomplishments in our independence and establishment as a nation. In these accomplishments his military talent, civic capacity, diligence in labor and sound common sense were factors of recognized importance. But without one more characteristic they would have been merely fortuitous aids in our difficulties, beautiful decorations of the memory of a man who did well for his country, but not in the measure of Washington. The atmosphere of reverence which now surrounds his name is due in its essence to a greater attribute, to his unshaken courage in adversity, to the strength and serenity of his spirit, the steadfast grandeur of his soul.

Washington's life as he lived it was not rich in the instant reward of glory, nor glorified by a sense of the reverence which we now attach to his memory. It was a life of personal struggle against odds, of failure after failure with disaster ever imminent, and borne off only by steady and purposeful courage, a courage which no circumstance could break, whether the hardships of winter on the frontier, an untrained army ill equipped and ill supplied, defeats which were all but irreparable, dissidence in council, lack of comprehension by large sections of opinion. It is not within my province or capacity to teach history. Rather I would appeal to you to regard our great figure not always as encircled by a halo of semi-divine glory but also in the light of his true and real greatness, as a very human man who lived with a courage which never faltered. Such men are the noblest works of God. To this that was in him, we owe our life as a nation, and for his example, our never dying reverence and esteem.

The banquet was brought to a close by Vice Consul A. Whidden Magnitzky, who spoke as follows:

Mr. Chairman, Ladies and Gentlemen:

It will be recalled that at the last meeting in January of the American Business Men's Luncheon Club, when it was decided to hold this commemorative celebration in honor of the two hundredth anniversary of the birthday of our First President, that my distinguished colleague, Mr. Castleman, had not as yet arrived in this city to take over from my humble hands the encumbency of the American Consulate.

At that time, our very able chairman, Mr. Barnett, kindly asked me to make the principal address of the evening, and so accordingly, during the small hours of the morning, I prepared quite a lengthy paper, which I had intended to read to you tonight.

In the meantime, however, just a few days ago, Mr. Castleman has arrived in our midst, and so I suggested to our chairman that I thought it befitting that he, rather than I should deliver the principal address of the evening.

Day before yesterday, when Mr. Castleman told me of his assignment, and how he was caught a little unawares and a little unprepared, I kindly offered to give him the paper which I had prepared during the past few weeks. So the very delightful and refreshing oration which you have just heard from him is really in fact my speech, and it is I now, not he, who is caught unawares.

So much has been said and so much has been written about the life, character, integrity, and deeds of Washington that I am not sufficiently vain to deceive myself into believing that I could add anything more to that which has already been said, to that which has already been written.

I have decided to say a few words on "The Real Greatness of Washington," and I must confess that the assignment has proven to be a large one. I must also lament the fact that the short time in which I have to speak does not permit full justice to be done to such a large subject.

Washington has so many claims to greatness that it is indeed difficult to single out any one particular characteristic of his life as the greatest. During the course of human events there have appeared on the stage of history few characters whose lives were so full of history-making deeds as that of Washington. Yet if I should be compelled to make a choice as to which of his traits was the greatest I should unhesitatingly answer "the trueness of his patriotism." This, on the surface, may not appear to be the preeminent feature of his career when compared to his abilities as a soldier, or his wisdom as a statesman, but when we consider the word "patriot" in its full and larger sense and force, we can appreciate the fact that it was his patriotism which spurred him on to the attainment of great and worthy achievements.

The story of mankind is the story of man's struggle for freedom, and as we read the pages of the past we learn that at various times during the world's history certain nations and certain people rose up to defend the principle that all men are, by the grace of God, born free and equal. They had their champions, and they had their leaders, but none can compare with our Washington.

The French Revolution produced its Napoleon, who, once having gained power, endeavored to become the most sagacious tyrant Europe has ever known. The Puritan upheaval in England produced its Cromwell, who, once having ascended to a place of dominance, proceeded to press upon the brow of the people the same tyrannic rule against which he, himself, had fought.

And there are many other similar cases in the world drama which we could cite to demonstrate that champions of movements of reformation finally fell victim to human lust for power because they lacked the quality of "patriotism," that divine love of country which stifles the forces of selfish designs.

Therein lies Washington's real greatness, the quality which most endears him to our hearts today, the fact that he gave all that he had, all that he was, without thought of reward or ambition for power, but in unselfish service of his countrymen, so that the principle of government of the people, by the people, and for the people might be realized upon the earth.

As was the case with the newspapers of Brazil everywhere, the papers of Porto Alegre did their share in paying tribute to George Washington. O JORNAL DA MANHA has already been quoted above, while A FEDERACAO, DIARIO DE NOTICIAS and O ESTADO DO RIO GRANDE DO SUL gave a great deal of space to the local celebration, to articles on the life of Washington, and to the reports of bicentennial celebrations from all over the world.

Among the articles that appeared in the papers of Porto Alegre is the following, taken from O CORREIO DO POVO of February 21, which, translated, reads:

Of the men whose names remain alive in the hearts of Americans, that of the statesman George Washington, the two-hundredth anniversary of whose birth occurs tomorrow, occupies a place of well-defined pre-eminence.

It is natural that his name should be remembered with affection, as the bearer was always considered the first in war, the first in peace, and the first in the hearts of his countrymen.

The well known Brazilian historian Affonso Celso, writing a short time ago about Washington, said among other things the following:

He concerned himself little with international politics. He admired Europe, where he had good friends whose kindly relations he cultivated, but only America inspired in him a deep and uncompromising devotion.

Without permitting his collaborators in government to detract from his pre-eminent dignity he surrounded them with prestige and encouraged their initiative, moderating or modifying their projects when his good sense so determined.

He gave zealous care to official decorum and dignity, reprehending the least lack of respect.

A curious note: Lafayette sent him as a precious gift one of the keys of the Bastille, which was razed on July 14, 1789, an event of great importance to the coming revolution.

When Washington received the historic key he regarded it with interest, turned it over in his hand for a moment, then put it into his pocket without saying a word.

Several days later he acknowledged the gift, with the following note:

"Not for the value of the thing, my dear Marquis, but as a memorial and because they are the manufacture of this city, I send you herewith a pair of shoe buckles."

His administration was tempestuous, but thanks to the soundness of his judgment, industry and commerce prospered and the wealth and influence of his country increased until it was well on the way which has led it to flourishing greatness.

Tired out, conscious of having done his duty, he refused to accept a third bestowal of his mandate. He had established a strong central government, consolidated the nation's unity. When he retired he left to his fellow citizens counsels of supreme wisdom: no sterile party struggles, courtesy to all nations but to remain first and always Americans, firmly attached to their country and its traditions.

Two years of peace, during which he spent whole days alone, and then a quick and easy death. A good man, generous, unselfseeking, brave and prudent, he suffered severe attacks. But when he died, his country acclaimed him without dissenting voice the noblest of its sons and adopted him as its father.

And all America will continue to glorify him.

The celebrations in honor of George Washington throughout Brazil, especially those arranged by Americans residing there, gave tangible evidence of how "all America will continue to glorify him." This was further borne out by the February, 1932, issue of the magazine of the American Chamber of Commerce for Brazil, BRAZILIAN BUSINESS. An American magazine in a foreign land, its editorial exemplifies the inspiration given by George Washington to Americans everywhere, no matter how far from home.

The editorial from BRAZILIAN BUSINESS follows in full:

February 22, 1932, marks in the midst of a world crisis the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington. Appropriate plans have been made for the celebration of this day throughout the United States. Homage will be paid his memory and the fruitful objectivity of his life will be recalled through remembrance of his services as Commander-in-Chief of the Continental army and as First President of the United States.

There is one phase, however, of Washington's life which should be of particular significance to us at this time, namely, his demonstration of what the American people under wise leadership were capable of accomplishing. We as the Nation of today are facing the test of what we are now able to achieve and whether or not the two hundred years which intervened between Washington's birth and the present day have weakened or strengthened the value of the institutions which he founded. We today may feel that the present situation of our country together with that of other nations is the worst it has ever been in its history and that emergence from the present depression is a matter of serious doubt.

Perhaps it might be well to look back for a moment and attempt to appreciate how our first citizens felt about their national affairs during, for example, the many depressing years of the Revolutionary War. Are we really in as difficult position now as when a ragged and starved army was our only hope for independence from a powerful, well-equipped and well fed force holding the keys to the Atlantic seaboard. Have our people no longer those qualities of idealism, vision, and faith in their country which underlay all that Washington and his contemporaries accomplished.

Deflation of values within the last several years have been carried to an extreme point. Leadership in many spheres of action has broken down, discredited not only by its own unsoundness, but also through its inability to continue the violation of fundamental political and economic laws. Immature philosophies, false bases of conduct and optimistic disregard of past experience have all had their turn in the arena of public and private business. They have all failed, however, to provide elements of constructive progress and as a result the common people of all countries are now being called upon to supply these vital factors for themselves. All nations are faced with the grim necessity of reorganizing their social and economic structures and at the same time to pay for their past mistakes. Perhaps in greater measure than any other must the nation which Washington guided, put its house in order and accept again as its criteria of national life the principles of true Americanism to which he gave such practical expression.

In Washington and in the history of his time we have for our guidance today a most inspiring and germane precedent of a nation successful in the struggle against destructive and disintegrating elements. His life, which in the days of our prosperity has been mainly a source of pride, should in these dark hours be a source of comfort and an encouraging assurance of the inherent strength of our nation.

It is especially fitting, therefore, that at this time we pay marked respect to the memory of Washington and as individuals renew our determination to preserve the heritage he left.

On Pan American Day, April 14, 1932, the President of Brazil sent the following message which was read at the tomb of George Washington:

WHEN THE UNITED STATES, AS ALL AMERICA, IS COMMEMORATING THE BICENTENNIAL OF WASHINGTON'S BIRTHDAY AND THINKING OF HIS VENERATED AND BELOVED FIGURE AS AN APOSTLE OF DEMOCRACY, I HAVE THE HONOR TO CONVEY TO THE AMERICAN GOVERNMENT AND TO THE AMERICAN PEOPLE THE SINCERE ADMIRATION AND THE FRIENDSHIP OF THE BRAZILIAN GOVERNMENT AND THE BRAZILIAN PEOPLE.

GETULIO VARGAS,
PRESIDENT OF THE REPUBLIC.

SPAIN

PAIN, newest of the republics of the world, was the scene of many celebrations of the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of the founder of the first American republic.

Barcelona, largest city of Spain and her principal port, historic and romantic Madrid, Alicante of wine-growing fame, Seville with its famous Alcazar, Malaga whence come the grapes of that name, all witnessed events commemorating the George Washington Bicentennial.

Spain has many ties with the early history of the North American colonies that were to become the first independent American nation. She maintained an agent there, Sr. Don Juan de Miralles, who was a true friend of the American cause and personally esteemed by its great leader, George Washington. Almost one hundred years later, that mutual respect of Spain and the United States, typified by these two men, was echoed in Barcelona when a portrait of George Washington was hung on the façade of the City Hall to symbolize the republican ideals of the first Spanish Republic of 1873. More than half a century later, that episode was retold in connection with the Bicentennial of the birth of George Washington and the birth of the new Spanish Republic.

WASHINGTON HONORED IN ALICANTE

In Alicante, as a remembrance of the Bicentennial Celebration there, a portrait of George Washington now has an honored place in the City Hall and the City Government is planning to name a street for George Washington.

Manuel J. Codoner, American Vice Consul, in a letter to the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission, wrote:

With the exception of the Vice Consul and his family, the only permanent American residents of the district are two Catholic nuns and an equal number of elderly Porto Rican ladies.

Nevertheless, the Consulate observed "open house" on February 22, and a portrait of George Washington and the flag chart distributed by the Commission were framed and prominently displayed for the visitors.

By Thanksgiving Day, American Consul W. M. Parker Mitchell and his family had arrived in Barcelona, and to mark the closing of the Bicentennial, he presented a framed portrait of George Washington to the Mayor of Alicante, who received it on behalf of the city and had it placed in the City Hall. The inscription on the frame reads as follows:

THE CONSUL OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA TO THE CITY GOVERNMENT OF ALICANTE, IN COMMEMORATION OF THE BICENTENNIAL CELEBRATION OF THE BIRTH, ON FEBRUARY 22, 1732, OF GEORGE WASHINGTON, THE FIRST PRESIDENT OF THE AMERICAN REPUBLIC.

NOVEMBER 24, 1932.

In expressing to Consul Mitchell his appreciation of the gift, the Mayor stated that the City Government has under consideration a plan to honor the memory of George Washington by naming a prominent street in Alicante for him. Commenting on the event, the daily newspaper, EL LUCHADOR, said:

The Consul of the United States in Alicante presented yesterday to the Mayor of Alicante a splendid portrait of George Washington, the founder of the American Republic, whose Bicentennial commemorative celebration of the birth of its great citizen on February 22, 1732, was officially concluded today.

Mayor Carbónell accepted the present very appreciatively, signifying the satisfaction with which Spain participates in this commemoration, considering that our nation contributed efficaciously to the liberation of those lands which, by Spain's exertions also, emerged from the unknown reaches of the sea to become incorporated in civilization.

The gift is a manifestation that the Spanish Republic belongs in the international fellowship from which it has been absent until now.

CEREMONIES IN MADRID

In Madrid, capital of Spain, the opening of the Bicentennial period was observed by an afternoon reception at the American Embassy where Ambassador Irwin B. Laughlin and Mrs. Laughlin received the members of the American colony. The beautiful rooms of the Embassy were appropriately decorated, and patriotic music and music from the days of Washington was played by the orchestra.

On Thanksgiving Day the Bicentennial anniversary of Washington's birth was again commemorated. In the morning there was a special church service in the British Chapel, which was attended by the American Ambassador, the American Military Attaché, Lieut. Col. Robert H. Fletcher, Jr., Consul Curtis C. Jordan, Vice Consul R. O. Richards and a large number of resident Americans.

In the afternoon of Thanksgiving Day Ambassador and Mrs. Laughlin gave a tea-dance at the Embassy, attended by the members of the American colony and Americans visiting in Madrid at the time.

OFFICIAL OBSERVANCES AT MALAGA

Malaga, ancient colonial port of the Phenicians, Carthaginians and Romans, has only a few American residents and is "off the beaten track of American tourists." Nevertheless, the Bicentennial was observed on February 22 and July 4, largely through the initiative of the American Consul, Augustin W. Ferrin.

Writing to this Commission, Consul Ferrin said:

On February 22 I gave a tea at my residence, "Las Zagalas," in honor of the two hundredth anniversary of the Birth of George Washington, at which were present thirty-four Americans, the largest number ever assembled in Malaga. Of these, fourteen were permanent residents and twenty were visitors.

Other guests included the Chinese Chargé d'Affaires at Madrid, the British Consul in Malaga and his wife, the Brazilian, French and Italian Consuls and their wives and ten British residents of Malaga. The Chinese minister to Great Britain, Dr. Saoke Alfred Sze, former Chinese Minister in Washington, had intended to be present also, but by his doctor's orders was compelled to send his regrets.

The Consul's house on this occasion was adorned with portraits of George Washington sent by the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission with pictures of Mount Vernon and Washington's birthplace and various decorations inspired by Washington legends. The refreshments bore out the spirit of the occasion, the cakes served being covered with candy cherry trees.

On July 4, combining the celebration of American Independence Day and the George Washington Bicentennial, Consul Ferrin held an official reception, which was attended by the Governor of the Province of Malaga.

To this celebration, according to local customs, only the Spanish authorities and prominent Spanish residents were invited. The provincial civil governor, Don Miguel Coloma Rubio attended, as did the commanding officers of the troops in the district, General Juan Urbano Parra, the naval Commander of the port of Malaga, Don José Viguera, the Mayor of Malaga, Don Federico Alva Valera, and other Spanish dignitaries; the consuls of Great Britain, France, Argentina, Brazil, Cuba, Chile and Portugal and their wives; the Marquesa de Valdecañas, Sra. Blanca Pries Benjumea, the Señoritas de Mata and other leaders of the local Spanish society.

An orchestra provided music for this fiesta, which the local press recorded with great enthusiasm. "At both the February 22 and July 4 celebrations," wrote Consul Ferrin in conclusion, "toasts and informal speeches honoring George Washington were conspicuous features."

TREE PLANTED IN SEVILLE

Seville, where rest the ashes of Columbus, now bears in its ancient soil a tree from that New World he discovered, where George Washington was to create a new nation.

On February 22, 1932, Consul Richard Ford planted in the American Consulate garden, in the presence of members of the American colony and Spanish friends, three black walnut seeds from Mount Vernon, sent by the National Nut Tree Planting Project in cooperation with the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission. One of the seeds germinated, but in the words of Consul Ford, "the tiny green shoot . . . appears to have been destined to a short and hard life." Continuing, in a letter to the Commission, he wrote of its unfortunate fate:

Between March 18 and 21, the Fourth National Congress of the Communist Party was held in the former United States cinema building, immediately next door to the Consulate. And while the aid of the Chief of Police and of the Mayor of Seville was repeatedly sought, the consular grounds were literally over-run by admiring delegates for several days. Ruthless feet played havoc with much of the Consulate garden, including the small but sturdy walnut shoot. It was broken off, trampled down, and while it tried gallantly to reassert itself in the days that followed, it appears to have been a losing fight.

It languished through the spring months, bravely maintaining, however, a show of greenness. A tiny wire fence was built around it to guard against dogs and men.

And then the hot sun of Andalusia's summer came. The small tree withered. A little sun-shade of straw was built over it, but that availed nothing. Expert gardeners were consulted, and under their guidance richer soil was sprinkled at the base and the shoot was carefully watered. Still it drooped. With the unfortunate result that today it is but a spindly dry stem to which still cling four curled brown leaves.

Anxious that the interest of the American colony in Seville in their "George Washington Tree" be repaid, the Commission in Washington arranged with the National Nut Tree Planting Project that a small seedling, or Mount Vernon walnut tree descendant, be sent to Consul Ford to replace the tree that had perished.

The young tree arrived two days before Thanksgiving and on that day the small American colony again gathered at the Consulate for a tree planting in honor of the First President of the United States.

The ceremony was held at 12 o'clock noon on Thanksgiving Day in the Consulate garden. All of the members of the American colony in Seville, consisting of twenty-six persons, were present. President Hoover's Thanksgiving Day Proclamation, which included George Washington's proclamation of 1789, was read, after which the tree was planted.

These two tree-planting ceremonies, and a reception on July 4 in honor of George Washington, made up the Bicentennial program in Seville. Concluding his report, Consul Ford wrote:

It is our fervent hope, naturally, that the tree will enjoy a happier infancy than befell the seed planted on February 22, 1932. However, with regard to this latter plant it may interest you to know that indications this past autumn point to the possibility that there is still life in the small shoot and we have some faint hopes that it will thrive after all.

THANKSGIVING DAY IN BARCELONA

It was not until Thanksgiving Day that the outstanding observance of the George Washington Bicentennial occurred in Barcelona. The American colony had planned celebrations for earlier in the year, but various conditions made it necessary to postpone them until November 24, when it was possible to carry out plans for a banquet and dance.

In the words of the American Consul General in Barcelona, Mr. Claude I. Dawson:

The banquet was international and as such has been called the outstanding social event in Barcelona of the current year. . . . The affair was distinctive from the fact that it marked the first appearance of the President of the Generalidad at any public function of the kind since the establishment of autonomous Cataluña and, from the American standpoint, the first time in the memory of the oldest American residents that Americans of Barcelona have officially entertained local authorities.

The American Chamber of Commerce in Barcelona and the American Club there sponsored the event. Consul General and Mrs. Dawson acted as hosts on behalf of the two organizations. Honor guests were the President of the Generalidad, Sr. Francisco Maciá, representing autonomous Cataluña and the Central Government; the Civil Governor of Barcelona Province and the Alcalde of Barcelona. The entire adult American colony of fifty men and women were present. The remainder of the 220 guests were the outstanding representatives of Spanish business and social circles and of the British and Italian colonies.

The function was held in the ballroom of the Ritz Hotel which had been beautifully decorated for the occasion. A picture of George Washington dominated the room from its place of honor on the wall over the speakers' table, facing the assembly, and around it were arranged the American, Spanish and Catalan flags, banked with palms and ferns.

The President of the Generalidad, Sr. Francisco Maciá, and Consul General Dawson were the principal speakers. Others at the speakers' table were the wife and daughter of President Maciá, the Civil Governor of Barcelona Province, the Alcalde of Barcelona and Mrs. Aguade, Mrs. Dawson, the Italian Consul General and Signora Romanelli, the President of the American Chamber of Commerce, Mr. M. L. Glidewell, and his sister, the President of the American Club, Mr. Jordain, Mrs. Jordain, and the Director of the International Banking Corporation, Mr. Gwynn.

Consul General Dawson opened the program with a few words of greeting in Spanish. He thanked the authorities for their presence and spoke of the cordial political and commercial relations between the United States and Spain. His remarks follow:

Excellencies, the Honorable President of the Generalidad, Civil Governor, Mayor of Barcelona and Distinguished Ladies:

In representation of my fellow citizens of Barcelona, in whose name I have the honor to address you, I wish to express our appreciation for your attendance at this celebration, sponsored by the American Chamber of Commerce for Spain and the American Club of Barcelona, respectively the commercial, and the social cultural links between the American Colony and the people of this hospitable country and city.

We sincerely hope that this festive occasion will not only be personally satisfying, but that when you leave us this evening the cordiality of our welcome will have repaid you for the special effort you have made in coming.

The purpose of this celebration is two-fold. Today marks the termination of the official celebration decreed by the government which I have the honor to represent, of the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of our Chief of State of most grateful memory, George Washington. Since February 22nd of the current year until today, the people of the United States have given frequent pause to their daily occupations to render homage to him whom we fondly remember as "First in the Hearts of his Countrymen"; and it is a great satisfaction to us as American citizens, to note that the world at large joins with us in eulogy of his outstanding greatness amidst the galaxy of apostles of government for the benefit of the governed.

Today, also, we celebrate our peculiarly American "Thanksgiving Day," a celebration which we believe is unique among the nations of the world, in which our Nation sets apart one day each year as a day of national thanksgiving to the Almighty, rendering tribute of thankfulness to the Giver of all Good for the peace, unity, and abundance our Nation has enjoyed through the course of its history, and to manifest our trust in Divine Providence for signal favors in the years to come.

An important feature of our Thanksgiving celebration is the proclamation issued annually by the President of the United States, and no celebration of the day is complete without reading this proclamation. The proclamation of this year is of special significance because it coincides with the Bicentenary of George Washington's birth, for which reason it incorporates as an integral part the first Thanksgiving Day proclamation of our First President.

Another characteristic feature of festivities of this day is the traditional Thanksgiving dinner, and we have endeavored to make the repast a close replica of that to which our countrymen are accustomed on these occasions.

Following these brief remarks we will proceed to the reading of Thanksgiving Proclamation of His Excellency the President of the United States, after which the dinner will be served. We then hope that His Excellency the President of the Generalidad, for himself and our other distinguished guests, will honor us with a few words before proceeding with the rest of the evening's entertainment.

Mr. Dawson next read the Thanksgiving Proclamation of President Hoover which incorporated the first Thanksgiving Proclamation of President Washington. This was received with great applause by the guests and the orchestra then played the "Star Spangled Banner," "Himno de Riego," the national anthem of Spain, and "Els Segadors," the Catalanian national anthem, while the audience stood at attention. Dinner followed, with a menu that was typically American, even to the cranberry sauce that had been especially imported for the event.

After the banquet President Maciá delivered a speech in Spanish, expressing on behalf of the authorities the pleasure they were deriving from the occasion. He remarked that Thanksgiving Day signified both thanks for the past and hope for the future, and that the commemoration of the second centenary of the birth of George Washington exalted justly a man whose character merits "the eternal marble with which his fellow-citizens have endeavored to commemorate him." A translation of President Maciá's speech follows in full:

Mr. Consul General of the United States, Ladies, Gentlemen:

It is a great pleasure for me to be present tonight in the intimacy of a genuinely American feast, which celebrates coincidentally two great sentimental movements of your national life.

One of them: Thanksgiving Day, saturated with a profound sentiment of spirituality. This celebration means, to the American people, a pause in their daily labor, a pause which is intended to signify thankfulness for the happy termination of labor realized, and confidence in the success of the enterprises upon which they are about to embark. Satisfaction for the past and confidence in the future; this is the beautiful meaning of this Thanksgiving Day in which the national spirit feels a mingled pride of accomplishment and a vehement desire for a happy future. I wish that your country may see all its hopes fulfilled.

Another purpose, of real emotion to me, causes us to be assembled around this table. The celebration of the Bicentenary of the birth of the moulder of the American union, of that great one who consolidated the liberty of North America: George Washington. A country honors itself to a great extent when it praises and venerates its famous historical figures. The homage of those men who have worked for their native country, who have suffered for it and served it, is the most enlightening example that may be offered to the youth of all epochs and of all countries. A country is the more powerful, by so much as it endeavors to show its racial fortitude, presenting for the admiration of the generations the acts of its heroes.

George Washington was, at all times, a perfect gentleman; he set up the political form of the American Country; he proved his liberal and just mind in rejecting a dictatorship; he succeeded in germinating around him sympathy and heroism. The life of George Washington, leader by temperament and by command of his personality, deserves the eternal marble with which his fellow-citizens have endeavored to commemorate him. It has been an honor for me to have been able to be present tonight at the commemoration of his Bicentenary.

And I must not let pass the opportunity offered by this feast organized by the American Chamber of Commerce and the American Club, to express, Mr. Consul General of the United States, the sincere sympathy and affection we feel towards your country, and our desire for the continuance, between our two countries, of the confraternity which exemplifies so well the aims of those who fought for the most generous ideal of humankind: The liberty of nations.

President Maciá's speech was warmly applauded and was followed by a second rendition of the orchestra of "Els Segadors," "Himno de Riego," and the "Star Spangled Banner." After the banquet sound pictures were shown and the evening terminated in general dancing.

The whole event, besides affording an opportunity to Americans in Barcelona to honor the memory of their First President, was regarded by everyone as a decided factor in furthering the understanding and good will of the people of Barcelona and America. All of the newspapers commented most favorably on the celebration, publishing full texts of the speeches, and photographs.

The Consulate General cooperated closely with the American Chamber of Commerce and the American Club to make the event a success. Consul General Dawson was a member of the committee, of which Mr. W. E. Powell was chairman. Vice Consul Daniel M. Braddock was secretary of the organizing committee.

The Chamber of Commerce was in communication all through the Bicentennial Year with the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission, through its secretary, Sr. Francisco

Font, and President Glidewell. Even before the opening of the celebration the September-October issue of the chamber's official publication, SPANISH-AMERICAN TRADE, carried an article in English and Spanish on the approaching anniversary, a portion of which is quoted here:

The 22nd of February, 1932, will be a memorable day in the United States. On this day the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington, the Father of his Country, will be celebrated. The name of the first President of the now great American Republic has ever been bound up with its history, and the 120 million inhabitants of the United States remember with greatest sympathy and veneration the name of this notable patriot.

Washington has come to personify the American Republic. He presided over the convention that framed the Constitution, and the weight of his great name was the deciding factor in securing its adoption by the States. These results could never have been obtained, had it not been recognized that he would be the first President. When we realize what it meant to take thirteen distracted colonies, impoverished, envious and hostile, and weld them into an orderly federation under the authority of a central government, we can form some estimate of the influence of this great man. But when we go further, and remember that the Government which he did so much to bring into being, not only did not falter when he retired from its administration, but withstanding every assault, has constantly grown stronger with the passage of time, and has been found adequate to meet the needs of the great nation occupying half a continent, and constituting the greatest power the world has ever known, we can judge something of the breadth and soundness of his statesmanship.

The January-February-March issue of SPANISH-AMERICAN TRADE was a Bicentennial number. On its cover was a picture of Mount Vernon, while a portrait of the Houdon bust of George Washington illustrated a feature article written by Mr. Basil A. Wise, of the Board of Directors of the Chamber, and here reprinted:

To take current events and to mould them into history and into enduring monuments which survive the passing years and centuries, has been the effort of many, but at the best, few ever really accomplished other than passing ripples in world history which fail to leave their imprint and soon are forgotten in the march of time. George Washington stands as an example of one of those few who by their thought and actions were able to guide events to the ends that he sought, and to do so with such foresight and wisdom, that what he built endured and grew into a great and powerful and influential nation. But even far more reaching—the idea that he propagated was to extend its influence over all of the rapidly forming countries of a new hemisphere, and to even have its repercussion in events which led to the French revolution.

Washington, although such was far from his purpose in beginning his career, soon was led to the conviction that the only solution of his purpose would be the establishment of the idea and the fact that the thirteen English colonies, settled on the outskirts of the vast North American wilderness, would undertake the complete responsibility and ensuing obligations, to decide without restraint and with uttermost liberty, what form of government best suited their purpose, and that they, this new-formed nation, would undertake to direct the affairs of the government without outside interference.

The controversy over the feasibility of this design can hardly be appreciated at the present day, but, at the time, this idea was startling in its newness and its untriedness, the weight of world opinion condemning it as impossible. The issue was for long in doubt, but time and the proven success of the undertaking have caused the majority of the modern world to agree that the principles for which Washington fought are those best suited to the needs of today.

True greatness in history is measured only by success. Brilliancy is not a requisite of success. Success in shaping history demands foresight, a fixity of purpose that failure cannot weaken, the power to lead, correct judgment of the ability of associates, and an infinite amount of patience. On these qualities Washington built his career, and it was on these qualities, plus a sincerity of purpose that none could question, that gave to the United States of America its government, a government which has endured and grown with the passing years.

To understand the accomplishment of this man, it is necessary to contemplate the material from which he had to build, and the condition of the thirteen colonies, which in some cases were little more than settlements along the Atlantic coast, and in all cases, at best, crude local governments ruled over by the Crown of England through their appointed governors, men who in most cases had little conception of the needs of the case and little sympathy with the work which they undertook. Among the colonists themselves there was little in common other than the needs of self-preservation. Class distinctions among the people and distinctions among the different colonies were problems that tended to defeat actions in common. Personal ties bound in varying degrees individuals to the mother country. The jealousy between the different colonies was most pronounced, the northern colonies having their major interest connected with the sea, the southern colonies with the land. Some colonies were rich, others poor. The reasons for which the various colonies had been settled differed. Religion and religious ideas differed. Communication between the different colonies was a tedious affair. Even language differences were not unknown. This was not encouraging material with which to build a nation.

When events began to take the serious turn that they did in the trouble with the mother country, it was far from the purpose of Washington to assist in a fight for separation. Indeed, the idea which pervaded the colonies as a whole had simply for its object the compelling, by force if necessary, the correction of existing wrongs. However, Washington soon felt that the course of events had changed the complexion of matters, and that once armed resistance had been resorted to, nothing less than complete independence and separation would accomplish that result. And as events moved, it was largely the counsel, the wisdom, and the foresight of Washington that was responsible for the building of the government that ensued. His counsels, in their basic wisdom, are as applicable today, even with changing world conditions, as they were the day they were given.

The fixity of purpose of Washington is almost a maxim. Events could not turn him from the path that duty indicated. The act of taking command of the Continental Army was the act of a man who realized the trials that lay ahead. The discouragements that he encountered proved even more than he foresaw. It is hard to conceive how any purpose could be beset with the difficulties that lay in the path of Washington, and yet have success its ultimate result. This army was little more than hastily gathered together countrymen whose purpose it was to serve for a few days, until the crisis had passed their part of the country. They received little, if any, pay. Their terms of enlistment were of indefinite duration, and they were not disposed to permit themselves to be ordered away from their respective localities. Each interpreted his obligations according to his own idea, and acted accordingly. There was almost a total lack of supplies, uniforms were almost unknown, and at no time were arms and ammunition in sufficient quantities. Food was never plentiful and often wanting. Such was his army. Over them were officers who owed their appointments to political power, and who were jealous and fighting among themselves from the very day of their appointment. This jealousy even went so far as to be organized movements to remove Washington. The men whom Washington most trusted were attacked, some being forced out of the service. Through it all, the character and the strength of Washington emerged greater and greater, until the whole cause was personified in the man himself. . . .

Other great personalities there were who assisted in his life's work. These were men that he needed, and without whom he could not have built as he did. Washington needed the brilliancy of Alexander Hamilton; he needed the governmental ideas, and the European experiences of Thomas Jefferson, the political sagacity of the two Adams, the sweep of personality and the military genius of that old European warrior Charles Lee, the steadiness of trusted Green, and above all he needed the influence, loyalty, and friendship that Lafayette brought him; and it was to Madison that he always turned when clarity of expression or legal signification was desired. The friendship that developed between Washington and Lafayette was a beautiful thing, the one, an older, more experienced man; the other a hot, impulsive, chivalrous youth who spent his life following an idea. It was Lafayette who happened nearly always to be with Washington through his most trying times, and it was to this youth that his spirit seemed to turn at its darkest moments. To draw these men to him was the work of a leader of men, and such he proved to be. He had to understand their abilities and their weaknesses and through the force of his character and his sincerity of purpose, draw that which he needed from each. A lesser man might have through jealousy desired only satellites around him. Washington showed his desire and his ability to draw the best that the country had to offer in men around him. His tact in keeping such conflicting points of view and sworn enemies as Hamilton and Jefferson in the same Cabinet, proved to be a trying task, which did not prevent him, however, from drawing what he could use of the genius of each. That he was able to obtain so much of value from the services of such unfaithful servants as Charles Lee and Gates, was the work of no small man, and that he was able to overlook personal slights and animosities in his judgment of men is to his credit. That he was able to keep from open rupture the vast differences of opinion between the French forces sent to his assistance, and his own people and lieutenants, was due entirely to their admiration of Washington the man, and the pleading of his faithful Lafayette.

Such were the trying times through which Washington moved, and it was ever his guiding hand which moulded the destiny of affairs. None can ever be really truly judged until time has softened the keenness of opinions, and has matured judgments. But today, the character of this man seems to stand out as impressively as does that towering monument erected on the banks of the Potomac to his memory, and it seems that the shadow of his personality is even today hovering over the destiny of the people, and attempting to guide and counsel the nation of which he has rightly been called "Father," and which it was his life's work to establish.

The name of George Washington long has had a special significance for the people of Barcelona. Almost sixty years before, a portrait of the First President of the United States was publicly used to interpret the popular conception and significance of the establishment of the first Spanish Republic in 1873, and the remembrance of that eventful time when the memory of the "American Liberator" had been a symbol of the ideals for which the Spaniards then struggled, gave added interest to the Bicentennial Celebration of his birth in Barcelona.

The story of that long-ago prologue to the founding of the present Spanish Republic was retold by EL SOL, a newspaper of Madrid, in the following article published several months before the Bicentennial Celebration opened:

On Tuesday, February 11, 1873, there began to circulate in Barcelona the report that Don Amadeo de Saboya was about to relinquish the Spanish crown and that the Cortes had proclaimed the Republic.

There was great excitement in the whole city but the day passed nevertheless in absolute tranquillity. . . .

At dawn on the 12th, rumors increased that the Republic had been proclaimed at Madrid.

The rumor was confirmed early in the morning and all the inhabitants of the city paraded the streets in their enthusiasm.

In the Plaza de la Constitution a large crowd gathered, which cheered the Republic unceasingly. Several groups with music and flags entered the City Hall while others did the same in the Provincial Palace of Deputies.

The City Council met in session at once. Sr. Ruiz y Taulet, mayor of the city, resigned his office and all his cabinet did likewise. At that moment the official report of the proclamation of the new government arrived.

Sr. Ruiz y Taulet then went out on the balcony and shouted: "Long live the Republic!" His cry was answered immediately by the crowd which had gathered in the large plaza, the avenues leading into it having been crowded with country people armed with guns furnished by the towns.

On the balconies of the City Hall and Palace of Deputies were raised flags bearing the words, "Democratic Federal Republic."

At nightfall a portrait of Washington was hung on the facade of the City Hall.

From the daily press of Spain is taken this final tribute of the Bicentennial Year to George Washington, published November 25, 1932, by EL LUCHADOR, of Alicante:

The Bicentenary is being celebrated of the birth of George Washington, the first President of the great American republic; a man who by virtue of his native genius, his austerity and his self-denial left a memory which should be of universal appeal. We, from childhood, from our first knowledge of universal history, have revered that name.

Even when in 1898 we had an armed conflict with the United States, that could not detract from the feeling of admiration toward the liberator of a people. . . .

Those transitory grudges which once impassioned us have completely disappeared, as they should be obliterated; otherwise, with many countries, including our nearest neighbors, we would have to be on hostile terms.

With all reverence we render homage to the memory of Washington, one of the towering figures of the human race.

CANARY ISLANDS

MORE than seventy-five thousand Spaniards and citizens of the Island Community received the message of the George Washington Bicentennial at the American Consulate in Las Palmas, a province capital of the Canary archipelago, when the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of the great American was celebrated on February 22, 1932.

The American Consul, Hon. Clifton R. Wharton, in his report of the unusual event, stated: "The Governor of the Province of Las Palmas, Senor Perez Molina, and Senora de Perez Molina, the Mayor of the city of Las Palmas, Senor Diaz Saavedra, and Senora Diaz Saavedra, the Secretary to the Civil Governor upon the advent of the Spanish Republic, Dr. Aurelio Lison, and Madam Lison, and other foremost citizens of the island community were present."

At the conclusion of the dinner party, Mr. Wharton took occasion to sketch for the guests the great and noble character of George Washington, and to outline the nature of the Bicentennial tribute being paid to him throughout the world. The Consul declared that it was entirely appropriate that the name of George Washington be commemorated even in so remote a place as Las Palmas, for the influence of his character and work had been felt there as elsewhere in the civilized world.

The Civil Governor spoke briefly with regard to the lasting influence of George Washington and expressed his great pleasure in knowing that the citizens of the United States were paying homage to their First President. He added that as a Spaniard he was proud to refer to the part played by Spain in the discovery of America, which opened the way to the building of such a great and friendly nation as the United States.

ARGENTINA

THREE years after the Spaniard, Ponce de Leon, landed in Florida, in 1516, Spanish explorers in South America reached what is now the Republic of Argentina.

In the fifty years that followed, St. Augustine was settled on the Northern Continent and the first settlement of Buenos Aires was made on the Southern Continent of the New World. By the end of the eighteenth century the United States had been established in the North, and by the end of the first quarter of the nineteenth century, the Republic of Argentina had been created.

This early link in the history of the two countries was renewed on the occasion of the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington in a message from the President of Argentina to the President of the United States on February 22, 1932. The message, cabled to President Hoover by His Excellency, Agustín P. Justo, President of Argentina, commemorated the "First American liberator" in the following words:

BUENOS AIRES, FEBRUARY 22, 1932.

HIS EXCELLENCY,
MR. HERBERT HOOVER,
PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES,
WASHINGTON, D. C.

THE ARGENTINE PEOPLE AND GOVERNMENT JOIN THE PEOPLE AND GOVERNMENT OF THE UNITED STATES ON THE OCCASION OF THE COMMEMORATION OF THE BICENTENNIAL OF GEORGE WASHINGTON, WHOSE GLORIOUS NAME NOW COMES TO THE MIND OF AMERICA AND OF THE WHOLE WORLD.

(SIGNED) AGUSTIN P. JUSTO,
PRESIDENT OF THE ARGENTINE NATION.

The influence of George Washington in the struggle for independence by the nations of Central and South America has always been acknowledged and appreciated by the peoples of those countries. The outstanding Latin American heroes have all been linked with George Washington, and Washington's Farewell Address is almost as much quoted in Latin America as in the United States. The first known translation into Spanish of this address was made by an Argentine patriot, General Belgrano, who obtained a copy as early as 1805, but, engaged as he was in the struggle to free his country, did not succeed in publishing it until twelve years later.

It is not to be wondered at, then, that there were many tributes paid in Argentina to the memory of George Washington. The message of President Justo on the opening day, was followed by another on July 4th delivered by the President to the American people over an international radio hook-up. A wreath was laid on February 22 by the American colony in Buenos Aires on the beautiful statue to their First President erected there twenty years ago. The Argentine Institute of North American Culture held a special meeting to honor the founder of the North American Republic, the United States School in Buenos Aires unveiled a portrait of Washington with impressive ceremonies, and American children of the American Grammar and High School produced a George Washington Pageant that was one of the outstanding events of the year—to mention some of the celebrations of the Bicentennial in this land “below the Equator.”

COMMEMORATION IN BUENOS AIRES

It was in the beautiful cosmopolitan capital of Argentina, Buenos Aires, that observances of the Bicentennial Celebration were principally held. The seasons are reversed there, from those in the United States, so that it was summer when the Bicentennial Celebration began.

On the opening day, February 22, there were five different events in Buenos Aires to commemorate this great anniversary, beginning in the morning with the laying of a wreath on the statue of Washington in Palermo Park, and ending with a dinner dance at the American Club in the evening.

The Washington Monument in Buenos Aires is a gift to the Republic of Argentina from the American colony. It was, therefore, especially appropriate to begin the commemoration of the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the birth of Washington at the statue which not only honors the founder of the first American Republic, but is an expression of the friendship that exists between the two sister republics, Argentina and the United States.

The bonds that were first forged by history and the patriot-founders of these two nations, George Washington and San Martín, had been voiced twenty years before, at the unveiling of the Washington statue on July 4, 1913, by Dr. Ernesto Bosch, then Minister of Foreign Affairs of Argentina, in the following words:

It is entirely fitting that Washington's monument be here in this country of San Martín. His thought and his work have found a resounding echo in the minds of our statesmen and in the souls of our people since the very beginning of Argentine national life. It became a stimulus and an example for our forefathers. His statue is the highest symbol of that which constitutes the greatness of the North American nation, an inspiration to our own because of the wisdom of its laws and the truth of its democracy.

The statue, for the opening celebration of the George Washington Bicentennial, had been beautifully decorated with flowers, and flags of the United States and Argentina draped each side. In the absence of the Ambassador, the American Chargé d'Affaires, Mr. John Campbell White, placed a wreath of natural flowers at the foot of the monument in the name of the American Society of the River Plate, the American Legion, and the Patriotic Society of American Women. A large number of Americans and their Argentine friends had gathered at the statute to witness the ceremony, and after placing the wreath Mr. White spoke to them briefly, as follows:

FELLOW COUNTRYMEN:

This handsome wreath has been presented by The American Society of the River Plate, The Spencer Ely Post of the American Legion, and The Patriotic Society of American Women, and we are here to lay it on the statue of him of whom we still like to think as "First in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen."

Celebrations in honor of Washington's birth are this day being conducted in every town and village in the United States, so that, despite the distance which separates us, we bring ourselves by this act in closer communion with our home land. For us residents of Latin America this date has a wider significance.

As Washington led in freeing the soil of the United States, and giving it the institutions and government appropriate thereto, so other great leaders have extended this work throughout the Continent. We are here witnesses to their success.

It is therefore in the fullness of the National and Continental significance of this Great Day that we dedicate this token.

The ceremony closed with the singing of the American national anthem by the entire assembly.

Besides the American Chargé d'Affaires, other prominent members of the American colony in attendance were: Mr. George C. Robertson, President of the American Society of River Plate, Mr. Thurston Ely, Commander of the local American Legion Post; Mrs. Browning, president of the Patriotic Society of American Women, the Naval Attaché of the American Embassy, Commander Leland Jordan, Jr., Dr. Alfredo Colmo, president of the Argentine Institute of North American Culture, and the staffs of the American Embassy and Consulate.

BICENTENNIAL LUNCHEON AT AMERICAN CLUB

The ceremony at the statue was followed by a luncheon at the American Club given by the American Chargé d'Affaires for the Latin American diplomats in Buenos Aires and government and city officials, headed by the Minister for Foreign Affairs for Argentina, Dr. Saavedra Lamas.

In welcoming his guests and in emphasizing the significance of the day, Mr. White said:

I take great pleasure in greeting you here on this day of such tremendous significance for my country; and I wish to express my especial appreciation of the effort made by Doctor Saavedra Lamas to be present, as he has had to tear himself away from the regular vortex of work in which, as a newly appointed Minister for Foreign Affairs, he must find himself two days after inauguration day. That recent event has, by the way, a certain connection with today's anniversary, since Washington, besides being a great soldier and statesman, also performed notable work as an engineer. In the United States it has been observed and commented that President Hoover is of the same profession as was Washington, so that upon seeing another engineer ascend to the Presidency of this Nation I cannot refrain from commenting upon such a happy and interesting coincidence.

In celebrating the birth of the most revered of our Revolutionary Fathers, it should be remembered that his great work of giving independence and form to the United States may also be considered as the first step in a wider movement, as a result of which the American continent ceased to be a mere geographical expression subordinate to Europe, and was converted into a constellation of nations, each one of which, while maintaining its own existence and individuality, at the same time makes its contribution to civilization and mankind. If by reason of the enormous national resources of this continent, the contribution has been primarily of a material character, this does not signify an absence of ideals. Of this we have an example when, but a few days ago, Doctor Bosch, at Geneva, called for two school teachers for each soldier. There spoke the true voice of America!

I raise my glass to our great and glorious continent, as well as to all of you who so worthily represent it in this splendid metropolis.

SPECIAL MEETINGS TO HONOR WASHINGTON

Later in the day both the Argentine Institute of North American Culture and the Rotary Club had special meetings in honor of the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington.

At the meeting of the Institute, to which had been invited, besides the membership, representative Americans in the city, the principal address was delivered by Dr. Webster E. Browning, an American member. The chairman of the society, Dr. Alfredo Colmo, first welcomed the audience and called attention to the importance of the subject of the speech about to be given. He remarked upon the parallel that might be drawn between the great North American liberator and statesman George Washington, and the Argentine hero, General San Martín, pointing out the many similar qualities possessed by both men.

The chairman then introduced Dr. Browning, a resumé of whose lecture, taken from the BUENOS AIRES HERALD of February 23, 1932, follows:

Dr. Browning started his lecture with a brief reference to Washington's youth and adolescence, in which, he said, the qualities of earnestness and honesty were already paramount in his character. He pointed out, quoting from many biographies, the early influences which had formed Washington's character, which prepared him for the difficult tasks he would be required to perform in later life. Both as chief of the Revolution and President of the country, he had always shown a great respect for law and order, and it was principally these that had enabled him to overcome the difficulties of a first government in so vast a country, with so many customs, interests, and even climates.

Referring to Washington's first Presidency, Dr. Browning put in evidence the statesman's modesty, and his many calls for solidarity, unity, and mutual tolerance among his countrymen. In this connection he spoke of a circular sent by Washington to the high authorities of the country in which reference is made to the conditions he considered essential to the independent life of the United States, the text of which was practically repeated before Congress in 1790.

Washington's sagacity then came in for consideration, and reference was made to the frequent tours he made through the country, in order to ensure the authority of the central Government on all the states alike; the same sagacity was displayed in choosing the seat of his Government, in his intervention in favour of religion and also in the discussions regarding the judicial system, the reduction of the public debt, the question of the evacuation by England of the last ports she occupied, and especially in the question of neutrality in the Anglo-French war, in spite of the decided sympathies of the people towards France. Dr. Browning then studied the famous proclamation of neutrality, which was the initial step in the foreign policy of the United States, later continued by Monroe, and which, in the orator's opinion, was the basis of the non-participation of the United States in the League of Nations.

Finally, the lecturer spoke of the last period of Washington's life, when he retired to Mount Vernon after his famous Farewell to the American nation, in which he not only gave the reasons for his public acts, which he left to the judgment of posterity, but also outlined the policy to be followed by the country he had twice governed. He had respected at all times the Constitution, and this led him to say that the basis of the country's political system should be the right of the people to make and alter their own form of government and Constitution, but that the existing Constitution, as long as it was not changed by the will of the nation, should be religiously respected by all.

CHILDREN AT THE GEORGE WASHINGTON BICENTENNIAL CELEBRATION AT THE AMERICAN CLUB, BUENOS AIRES.

ROTARY CLUB CELEBRATION

The next celebration of the day was the Washington's Birthday Meeting of the Rotary Club. Dr. Alfredo Colmo was, for the second time that day, a principal figure in a celebration honoring the First President of the United States. As speaker, he told the assembled Rotarians that the day held a double significance for their Club, inasmuch as it was the twenty-seventh anniversary of the founding of Rotary as well as the Two Hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington.

The juxtaposition of the two dates, Dr. Colmo continued, was an especially happy one because George Washington was the founder of the United States, and it was that country that gave birth to Rotary. He went on to say that Washington was really the Father of the American Continent, for his life, ideals and achievements were a decisive factor in the moulding of the American Continent into independent republican States. The influence of Washington was especially marked in connection with the achievement of independence for Argentina, he concluded.

The final event of February 22 was the dinner dance at the American Club. The American colony turned out en masse for this social and patriotic event, and the day was brought to a close with an enthusiastic rendition of the "Star Spangled Banner" at midnight by all the guests.

SPLENDID NEWSPAPER TRIBUTES

A day that was memorable in the hearts of the 3,400 Americans in Buenos Aires because of the honors paid to the memory of their First President, was permanently and widely recorded in the newspapers of that city. LA PRENSA, LA NACION, and the BUENOS AIRES HERALD recognized Washington's birthday editorially, the latter two giving whole pages to the Bicentennial Anniversary, with illustrations of events in the life of George Washington. THE STANDARD the next day featured news of the Bicentennial celebrations all over the world, while the Sunday Rotogravure section of LA PRENSA had two whole pages of pictures and articles on George Washington in its issue of February 21, 1932.

Typical of the splendid newspaper tributes to "the North American liberator" is the following, taken from THE BUENOS AIRES HERALD of February 22, 1932:

George Washington occupies a peculiar and unique place in the history of the world. His name will forever be associated with the cause of freedom: freedom of the written word, freedom of speech, and freedom of conscience. To him more than to any other was due the great movement of liberation at the end of the eighteenth century—the movement that changed the face of the world, whose effects were felt from the ancient cities of France and Germany to the heights of the Andes and the plains of Argentina.

It is not too much to say that, had George Washington never lived, the Argentine Republic would never have come into being. Nay, we may go even further and say that, had it not been for his resistance to oppression, England herself would not be the free country she is today. Let us all, then, take part in honouring the anniversary of one who has been given the finest epitaph that mortal man could desire: First in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen.

PAN AMERICAN DAY

The interval between February 22 and the next Bicentennial celebrations in Buenos Aires, on July 4, was marked by the observance throughout the American Continent of "Pan American Day."

The message of the President of Argentina, read at the tomb of Washington at Mount Vernon on that day, reaffirmed the debt which the "American Nations of the South" owe to "his example when on the threshold of their great destinies."

President Justo's message on April 14, 1932, translated in full, reads as follows:

THE GOVERNMENT AND THE PEOPLE OF THE ARGENTINE REPUBLIC JOIN THE GOVERNMENT AND THE PEOPLE OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA IN THIS ACT IN WHICH HOMAGE IS PAID TO THE MEMORY OF THEIR MOST ILLUSTRIOUS CITIZEN, GEN. GEORGE WASHINGTON, ON THE OCCASION OF THE BICENTENNIAL CELEBRATION OF HIS BIRTH. IT BEHOOVES THE NATIONS OF THE NEW WORLD TO RENDER THIS JUST TRIBUTE TO HIM WHO THROUGH HIS HEROIC EFFORTS AND HIS EXEMPLARY LIFE GAVE A MODEL OF REPUBLICAN VIRTUE TO SERVE AS A COMMON IDEAL WHICH ALL THE NATIONS OF AMERICA STRIVE TO REALIZE IN THEIR DEMOCRATIC LIFE, ADAPTING TO THIS IDEAL THEIR POLITICAL AND JURIDICAL INSTITUTIONS.

BY GIVING AN IMPETUS TO THE STRUGGLE FOR THE INDEPENDENCE OF HIS COUNTRY, GEORGE WASHINGTON LED THE WAY TO LASTING EMANCIPATION.

THE ARGENTINE REPUBLIC, ACCLAIMING ONCE MORE THE TRIUMPH OF REPUBLICAN IDEAS, CHERISHES THE MEMORY OF THE HERO OF THE GREAT NATION OF THE NORTH, BECAUSE OF THE ENCOURAGEMENT WHICH THE AMERICAN NATIONS OF THE SOUTH RECEIVED THROUGH HIS EXAMPLE WHEN ON THE THRESHOLD OF THEIR GREAT DESTINIES.

AGUSTIN P. JUSTO,
PRESIDENT OF THE ARGENTINE NATION.

INDEPENDENCE DAY IN BUENOS AIRES

The celebration in Buenos Aires of American Independence Day and of the George Washington Bicentennial was spread over four days, with six different events. These began on July 1st with a pageant at the American Grammar and High School. On July 2nd, there was a children's patriotic party at the American Embassy. On July 4th, a portrait of George Washington was unveiled at the Escuela Estados Unidos (United States School); there was a reception at the Embassy, a radio broadcast by the President of the Argentine Republic and the American Ambassador in the afternoon, and a banquet in the evening.

PAGEANT, ENTITLED "SKETCHES FROM THE LIFE OF GEORGE WASHINGTON," AT BUENOS AIRES.

THIS PERFORMANCE WAS GIVEN BY THE AMERICAN GRAMMAR AND HIGH SCHOOL.

The pageant at the American Grammar and High School was an outstanding patriotic and social event of the year in Buenos Aires. Under the joint patronage of the American Embassy and the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission, the program was attended by the Ambassador, the American Consul General, government and military officials, and almost the entire American colony in Buenos Aires.

The American Grammar and High School is affiliated with the Colegio Ward, an institution administered by the Methodist Episcopal Church. Mr. Sayre P. Maddock, Supervising Principal of the Colegio Ward, in commenting on the pageant, wrote to the Commission: "Every year it has been the custom of the American Grammar and High School to put on a special 4th of July program.

This year we centered that program around events in the life of George Washington."

The pageant, "Sketches From the Life of George Washington," was presented on the evening of July 1st in the American Church Hall, which was appropriately decorated with the national colors and with large wall silhouettes, colonial and patriotic in motif. The stage represented a beautiful colonial garden with more than one hundred potted trees contributed by a local Italian florist to this two-fold American celebration.

The attractive programs were printed in red, white and blue, and carried the inscription, "In homage to the memory of George Washington, the founder of our country, honoring the Bicentennial of his birth, 1732-1932." The book of the pageant bore a dedication, signed by the author, Miss Bel Ribble, teacher in the American Grammar and High School, to the Director of the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission, "with the highest appreciation for his work on the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission and for his kind assistance to patriots in the foreign field."

The program opened with the singing of the Argentine and American National Anthems. Principal Maddock then addressed the audience briefly, welcoming the guests in the name of the faculty and students of the American Grammar and High School. He said that this celebration was a link with fellow American citizens in the United States and everywhere throughout the world who were paying special honor to George Washington during the Bicentennial year of his birth. He spoke of the work of the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission which was helping those far from home to participate in this great anniversary, and expressed his appreciation for the interest of that organization in the program that was being given that evening three thousand miles from "home." In testimony of that interest, he read from a letter of the Commission, in part, as follows:

It is a pleasure to join with the young people of the American School, their teachers, parents and friends, in honoring the memory of George Washington.

The Father of Our Country, two hundred years after his birth, is still a living and inspiring figure to Americans everywhere. You who are taking part in this program today are far away in reality, but in spirit you are a part of the great number of your fellow-countrymen who are also honoring George Washington during this Bicentennial Year.

COLORFUL PAGEANT PRESENTED

The curtain then went up on the opening scene of a ten-act pageant, each episode of which was introduced by a small "Chronicler" in colonial costume, who told briefly, in the manner of the Chroniclers of olden days, the story of the scene about to be presented.

The first scene, "The Cherry Tree" recalled that popular George Washington legend, and was enacted by pupils of the first and second grades. A real cherry tree made the scene more vivid.

The second episode, "George Washington at Play," showed George Washington as a young boy exhibiting his prowess in sports and his interest in "playing soldier." The actors were third and fourth grade pupils.

"The Young Surveyor" was the subject of the third episode, played by seventh grade pupils. During this scene George Washington's efficiency as a surveyor and his commendation by Governor Dinwiddie was portrayed.

The fourth scene, "The Young Soldier," was one of the most artistic and effective of the pageant. The subject of the episode was the tradition that Washington was marked for a great work. It showed the Indians attempting to shoot him and finally deciding that he led a charmed life. Washington and his soldiers in their uniforms, and the Indians in their paint and feathers gave realism and color to the scene.

The terrible winter encampment at Valley Forge was depicted in the fifth scene, the stage showing a battlefield covered with snow. The famous episode of Washington praying for Divine help was played by pupils of the fifth and sixth grades and was enthusiastically received by the audience.

The sixth episode revealed the bell tower of famous Independence Hall and an old bell ringer being urged by his small grandson to ring the bell as loud as he can because Cornwallis had surrendered.

The story of Betsy Ross and the making of the first flag was depicted in the seventh scene, acted by children of the fifth and sixth grades. The making of a five-pointed star was demonstrated to "George Washington," with "Robert Morris" as an interested spectator.

Washington's farewell to his soldiers was the theme of the eighth episode, played by students of the junior class of the high school.

The ninth scene of the pageant, "An Incident of the Inaugural Trip," was played by members of the High School Sophomore Class and brought out the kindness and democracy of George Washington even on his way to assume the highest office of the new nation.

The tenth and final scene was a re-enactment of the enthusiastic welcome given Washington on his journey to New York, by the people of Trenton at Trenton Bridge. This was the final scene of the pageant and was made colorful and musical by dances and choral songs for "Washington's" pleasure. It made a splendid stage setting for the close of the pageant, when the American Flag was raised on the flag-pole in the center of the stage to the recital of the "American's Creed" and the singing by actors and audience of "America" and the "Star Spangled Banner."

BICENTENNIAL THEME IN SCHOOLS

The success of the pageant well repaid the faculty and students of the American Grammar and High School for their study and work. The whole school term of the Bicentennial year had been made an opportunity to render history, reading and English more vital and real to the pupils than ever before. In the regular program of studies there were many subjects that directly linked up with the celebration and these were given even greater emphasis because of the Bicentennial.

The publicity given to the celebration, in the words of Principal Maddock, "could not have been better—nine newspapers wrote up the event and sent photographers." The following extract from THE STANDARD of July 2, 1932, is typical of the enthusiasm of the daily press for this splendid American Celebration of the Bicentennial of the Birth of George Washington:

The producers are to be warmly congratulated on the triumph of the play and for the beautiful elocution and fine acting that marked the production as a whole.

The large cast of performers showed that they were not only well versed in their respective parts, but that they had entered into the spirit of an historical episode that has made the United States of America the great nation that it is today.

For a costume play to have been presented with such accuracy and precision and with such uniform acting by the youthful scholars, is something for the American College to be proud of, and the applause was very heartening to all concerned.

Singing and specialty dancing finished an excellent programme and one that should be reproduced for those of the community which were unable to gain admittance, as the seating accommodation of the hall was taxed to its utmost capacity.

One of the interesting side-lights of the pageant was the fact that there were a number of British children taking part in it and their participation was worked out so that they played the British characters. The costumes of the principals were hired, but for the most part costumes and scenery were the work of the children and faculty of the school.

JULY FOURTH CHILDREN'S PARTY

The day following the pageant, the American Ambassador to Argentina, Hon. Robert Woods Bliss, gave a 4th of July party at the American Club for the children of the American colony in Buenos Aires. Many of these children had never been "home," but the party was just as American as though it had been held there. Decorations, refreshments and the games played, all reminded these little Americans of the Father of their Country and of the stirring days that gained its independence. Ambassador Bliss spoke to the children during the course of the party, as did also Mrs. John Campbell White, wife of the counselor of the Embassy.

WASHINGTON PORTRAIT UNVEILED

Independence Day itself was crowded with celebrations. These began early in the afternoon with a ceremony at the United States School (Escuela de los Estados Unidos de América) in which a portrait of George Washington was unveiled. This portrait had been sent to the school by school children of the United States. The program opened with the singing of the Argentine and American National Anthems and featured recitations and typical American songs, in English. Dr. Colmo, President of the Instituto Cultural Argentino Norte-Americano, delivered the principal address of the day to the pupils and the many guests who had assembled, bringing out in his speech the similar achievements of the two American and Argentine heroes, George Washington and General San Martín.

Later in the afternoon, the annual official reception at the American Embassy was held. This reception was primarily for the American colony, although many Argentine friends came also to honor the anniversary of American independence, which this year had double significance because of its coincidence with the Bicentennial of George Washington.

The reception was made unusually interesting and impressive by the presentation to the Ambassador, for permanent hanging in the Embassy, of a portrait of George Washington. This portrait is a splendid reproduction of the Gilbert Stuart Athenaeum Portrait of Washington, in a duplicate of the frame in which the original hangs. Mr. George C. Robertson, President of the American Society of the River Plate made the presentation on behalf of the American residents in Argentina. The American Society of the River Plate sponsored the collection of the fund for the picture, which was contributed by the Patriotic Society of American Women, the Spencer Ely Post of the American Legion, the American Club, the Chamber of Commerce of the United States in the Argentine Republic and the Society of the River Plate.

Ambassador Bliss in receiving the portrait, voiced the following expression of appreciation:

MR. PRESIDENT:

This portrait of George Washington, which you have presented on behalf of the American citizens residing in Argentina, is a most acceptable gift. I have particular pleasure in receiving it from your hands as evidence of my compatriots' approval of the Government's action in acquiring this building as a permanent residence for its Ambassadors to Argentina. For the first time in the history of the unbroken diplomatic relations between the two nations of nearly one hundred and ten years, the American representative is housed in a building belonging to the United States Government, in a dignified manner. I know it will be gratifying to it, as it is to me, that its citizens have stamped in such a gracious and fitting manner their complete accord with a purchase which indicates clearly the importance which the Government attaches to this post.

To those of you who do not know the history of the original of this portrait, it may be of interest to learn that it was painted by Gilbert Stuart in the fall of 1796—that is, three years before Washington's death—the last and third one that artist painted of George Washington from life. As you will see, it was, for some reason, never finished, though it was used by Stuart as a model for a number of subsequent portraits he executed, which leads us to believe that it was considered by him as his most faithful likeness of our first President. It is evidently a companion piece to the portrait Stuart painted of Mrs. Washington. The two portraits were purchased from Stuart's widow in 1831 by a group of gentlemen and the Washington Association and were presented by them to the Boston Athenaeum, their present owner. Hence the name "Athenaeum Portrait" by which it is generally known. In 1876 these two portraits were deposited with the Boston Museum of Fine Arts where they now hang.

Mr. President, I ask you to accept, and kindly to convey to the donors of this gift, my sincere and profound appreciation. I accept it on behalf of my Government, with grateful thanks to them all.

RADIO ADDRESS OF PRESIDENT JUSTO

The most outstanding and significant feature of the joint celebration of American independence and of the George Washington Bicentennial was the radio address of the President of Argentina, General Agustín P. Justo, to the American people. This was broadcast over an international hook-up early in the evening of July 4th, and evoked the sincere appreciation of the people of the United States for this personal participation by the President of the Republic of Argentina in the doubly significant anniversary of their independence.

President Justo's message of felicitations to the American people follows, in translation:

On behalf of the people and the Government of Argentina to the people and President of the United States of America: Greetings!

The solemn Declaration of Independence issued to the world by the founders of the North American nationality, whose one hundred and fifty-sixth anniversary is celebrated, is a Charter of the fundamental rights of mankind and of nations and it is, therefore, a benefit of incalculable value incorporated to the patrimony of all the free and civilized nations.

The immortal document determines for the American Union the inauguration of its political emancipation, but it also announces the apparition of a new order originated by the approval of the people. The men who furthered our emancipation and those who formed later our nationality, sought in that, and in other similar sources, their high inspiration and vigorous spirit.

The principle proclaimed by the eminent patricians of 1776, by which they established that governments have been instituted to preserve the rights to live and to be free, and to secure happiness for all the inhabitants, is also ours. Accordingly, I can affirm without boasting and with real satisfaction that in this noble task our peoples should pursue similar destinies, cooperate and assist each other, and strengthen their good intelligence and their constant relations of friendship.

I indulge, therefore, in the hope that throughout the course of time, and as long as civilization exists, the Argentine people will rejoice in this glorious date, cordially embracing the people of the great friendly nation.

President Justo's message of felicitation to the people of the United States on the occasion of the anniversary of their independence, was followed by a brief greeting to his fellow-citizens at home by their Ambassador to the "land of the pampas." Ambassador Bliss spoke as follows:

It is a great pleasure to greet my fellow countrymen on the Fourth of July from the Government House in this distant Capital spreading its great area along the bank of the Rio de la Plata. You would be impressed by the activity of this great port and, farther up the river, of the port of Rosario. You would then have some idea of the vast production of this Republic.

If you would take the trouble to look at statistics you would find that Argentina supplies to Europe a greater quantity of staple foodstuffs than do the United States,—and the hundreds of thousands of tons of meat she exports annually are unsurpassed in quality. Moreover, it is the most important market in this hemisphere for American goods, surpassing many of the European countries in its purchases from us. And Argentina confidently looks to the United States to offer an increasingly important outlet for its products.

Why do so comparatively few Americans visit this part of the Western Hemisphere which offers so much of scenic beauty and of varied interest? In the United States we ought to know far more about this country, in many ways similar to our own but offering much that is new to stimulate our liking.

It has been said that the people of the United States cannot help feeling sympathetic towards those of Argentina because both are attempting to perfect themselves in the application of the same principles of liberty and justice. True though this be, it stops far short of the ideal which makes for intimate mutual knowledge that develops from acquaintanceship into the close accord of friendship.

You have just listened to the words of friendly greeting from President Justo, whom I am glad to have been able to call my friend since I came to Argentina when he was Minister of War under President Alvear. When he visits the United States, as I hope he may when his term of President has ended, I am sure you will all give him a most cordial welcome and make him feel as much at home among you as his countrymen make your Ambassador feel in Argentina. I know I respond to your wish in thanking President Justo for his friendly gesture in taking time from his over-busy day to express personally to you his good wishes on our national anniversary.

AMBASSADOR BLISS ADDRESSES BANQUET

The day was brought to a close with the annual Independence Day banquet of the American colony in Buenos Aires. This year the banquet was a joint commemoration of the Fourth of July and the George Washington Bicentennial and was sponsored by The American Society of the River Plate. More than three hundred guests attended the affair, which was held in the American Club. Every effort was made to have the occasion a truly American and "homey" celebration. Many Argentine friends attended, but no government officials were invited, and the only speaker was Ambassador Bliss. His brief address follows:

MR. PRESIDENT, LADIES AND GENTLEMEN:

I am deeply touched by the cordiality of the reception you have given me; words fail to express adequately my deep appreciation.

After the introduction of your President, I feel as if I were being initiated into an Indian tribe. You have undoubtedly often heard of the famous Indian chief "Lone Eagle"; there was another one who bore the name of "Lone Wolf," and there may even have been a "Lone Bear." Tonight, in being received into the tribe, I stand forth with the name of "Lone Speaker"!

In this year of the 200th anniversary of the birth of George Washington and especially on this anniversary of our independence to which he contributed in such decisive manner, the thoughts of Americans gratefully dwell on the life of the man who made our nation possible. But it is not necessary for me to tell you of the profound influence Washington had on the moral, political, and social life of his contemporaneous fellow citizens and on the generations which have followed. To you his life, from the mythical cherry tree to the dying words uttered to Doctor Craik, is thoroughly familiar.

Yet this gathering of my fellow countrymen and our good Argentine friends presents a tempting occasion for the delivery of a stirring oration on the incipience of our Republic and its inspiring leader; however, it has been intimated to me, in press notices as well as elsewhere, that this year all that was expected of me at the Fourth of July celebration was "a few brief remarks." But if you do not want to hear from me, I want to hear from you! And so, I am going to ask you five questions.

Despite changing conditions, we still turn to the Father of our country as a man of wisdom and honor whose advice we might profit by today, and with this thought in mind, I request that you kindly send to the President of the Society before the evening is over, your answers to these questions.

What do you suppose Washington would say to the problem of Disarmament?

To which side would he tip the scales regarding Federal and States Rights?

Would he be a free trader or a protectionist in 1932?

Would he advocate our entry into the League of Nations and the World Court, or would he be an isolationist?

Would his liberalism meet the new currents in a truly democratic spirit or would he become inelastic, a Tory in a stretching world?

The July 4th banquet in Buenos Aires concluded the active observance of the Bicentennial in Argentina. By Thanksgiving, the American colony had scattered for the summer—the warm weather making it unseasonable to observe this American holiday in Buenos Aires.

DR. ALFREDO COLMO, PRESIDENT OF THE INSTITUTO CULTURAL ARGENTINO-NORTEAMERICANO, SPEAKING AT THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA SCHOOL, BUENOS AIRES, ON THE LIFE OF GEORGE WASHINGTON.

However, as it had done all during the Bicentennial year, the daily press of Argentina gave prominence to the great anniversary just closed, printing President Hoover's Thanksgiving Proclamation and pointing out that it had been most appropriate to incorporate in it the first Thanksgiving Proclamation of George Washington.

EDITORIAL TRIBUTES

Representative of how simpático were the newspapers of the Argentine Republic to the honors paid to the memory of George Washington during the two hundredth anniversary of his birth, is the following editorial that appeared in LA PRENSA of Buenos Aires on February 22, 1932:

Great men in history generally owe their fame to achievements that have influenced the whole world, such as works of philosophy, science and art, or to their participation as statesmen or soldiers in enterprises that have effected the most important nations of their epoch, or even whole continents. Rare indeed are the instances of men whose political and military activities were confined to their own country, but who, like George Washington, have been exalted by all nations to the realms of immortality.

If philosophy, science, and art have a universal value, so also have the virtues of man when applied to the service of his fellow-citizens—uprightness, honesty, unselfishness, generosity, perseverance, equanimity, and an unfailing spirit of sacrifice for the public welfare—virtues which reached their highest expression in the Virginia patriot, the first citizen of the United States.

Although Washington commanded the armies that were raised by the English colonies of North America first, to defend their rights, and secondly, to achieve their independence, the world admires not so much his military feats as the purity of his ideals and the extraordinary patriotism with which he served them. Moral force, present to an exceptional degree in the American leader and naturally present also in the mass of his fellow-citizens, is what defeated armies and broke the chains of tyranny. The world today understands this, and that is why it unites with the people of the United States of North America in commemorating the second centennial of George Washington's birth.

The whole life of this illustrious son of America exemplifies a consecration to the service of the community, first within the narrow limits of the colony where he was born, and later, on the vast stage of a new nation. His deeds and the qualities he displayed in the defense of the colonies against Indian attacks and foreign invaders marked him as the man to lead in the great war about to be undertaken by the English colonies east of the Alleghenies which were demanding their independence since they had reached that stage of progress that was incompatible with a state of dependence and vassalage.

The qualities of leadership and statesmanship revealed by Washington during the arduous struggle and the additional proofs he gave of his political talents and civic virtues, made him the logical candidate for the presidency of the new Republic. After one term in the presidency, having no false modesty and believing that his services could still be of use to his country, he accepted reelection, considering himself to be in a more favorable position to face the international complications of the moment than a new president would have been. But he refused reelection to a third term, feeling that he could by that time yield to his desire to return to private life without injury to his country after forty-five years of public life.

His farewell address to the people of the United States is a monument of political philosophy and civic and patriotic doctrine, a valuable legacy bequeathed by Washington to his country, on a level with his eminent deeds and the incomparable lessons of his exemplary life. Only a nation can inherit such a precious legacy. The lessons drawn from his life and from this document have inspired other American patriots, among them our own Belgrano, who translated the "address" and published it while he was preparing his decisive military campaigns. And in this address democracies will ever find salutary counsels.

Listen to what he says:

(Here follow excerpts from Washington's Farewell Address adjuring against too strong a party spirit and against permanent foreign alliances.)

. . . These are the teachings of the apostle of democracy who was born two centuries ago in America because America was destined to be the continent where this system of government—the best yet conceived by man—was to be perfected. . . . As democracy consolidates its conquests, the figures of Washington and his followers will grow to gigantic size.

CHILE

CHILE, stretching 2,600 miles along the Pacific shore of South America and encompassing the most southerly point of the Western Hemisphere, joined the other Latin American Republics in acknowledging the incalculable influence of George Washington on the free destinies of the nations of America during the two hundredth anniversary of his birth.

In the Pan American Day message of the President of Chile may be found the heartfelt tribute of the Chilean people to George Washington—"a model of inspiring genius for the great liberators of the peoples of the American continent."

Observances of the Bicentennial in Chile were marked by unusually large gatherings of Americans resident in that country, especially in Santiago, Valparaiso, and Antofagasta; by a George Washington Birthday program over the Valparaiso radio station; by two special issues of a Chilean English-language magazine, and by splendid editorial tributes to "the Father of the North American democracy" by the newspapers of the republic.

NOTABLE CELEBRATION IN SANTIAGO

Santiago, capital and largest city of Chile, began the celebration of the Bicentennial of the birth of George Washington with a gathering of American residents and visitors that marked "a milestone in the history of Americans in Chile."

Long before the opening of the Bicentennial period, the American Society of Chile had been in touch with the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission, looking forward to having the American colony in Santiago pay homage to the Father of their Country.

One of the most successful events ever held by the Americans in Santiago was the George Washington Bicentennial luncheon in the Hotel Savoy in that city on Thursday, February 18, under the joint auspices of the American Society of Chile and the Association of American Women of Chile.

More than two hundred American residents and visitors attended the function, at which the American Ambassador, Hon. William S. Culbertson, was the principal speaker.

Mr. Ora J. Hubbard, president of the American Society, presided and introduced Ambassador Culbertson. Besides the Ambassador and Mr. Hubbard, others at the speakers' table were: Mrs. Culbertson, Mrs. Hubbard, Mr. Edward J. Craig, retiring president of the American Society, and Mrs. Craig, president of the American Women of Chile.

A summary of Ambassador Culbertson's speech, taken from an account of the event in the February 25 edition of the magazine, SOUTH PACIFIC MAIL, follows:

Many Americans, said the ambassador in his address, have fallen in with the idea of using "Norte Americano" and "Los Estados Unidos de Norte America," instead of the proper, correct designation. The use of the word "American" and "America," he said, is correct because Chileans are the people of Chile, a resident of Peru is a Peruvian, and a citizen of Mexico is a Mexican.

Washington, too, the ambassador stated, gave the term American a spiritual content under the Constitution of the United States which says specifically "of America." Use of the term "Norte Americano" in Latin America discriminates, Mr. Culbertson said, against the Mexicans and Canadians, who live in North America, and have as much right to the word. "Norte Americano, therefore, is improper to apply to a citizen of the United States," he declared.

Tracing the process of nation-making in the United States, Mr. Culbertson told a moving and dramatic story, a story of development, of pioneering, of crossing frontiers that a republic might develop to its great, present extent. He stressed the pioneering in science and industry that has characterized the American nation, a nation "dominated always by the spirit of youth."

The ambassador referred to those who call Americans "dollar chasers." He said there was no doubt of the ability of the American in business, and that unjust terms were apt to be applied to him by less industrious or able competitors, but he said no one, not even the worst enemies of the United States, could deny the vast liberality of Americans toward social causes, and the advancement of health.

In all the American history, the ambassador declared, there has been an underlying idealism, a confidence in the destiny of the nation, courage, independence, inventiveness, faith. Mr. Culbertson asked his audience to remember those things as gifts, directly or indirectly, from the father of the country, Washington, who, he said, was much more than just a rich, country gentleman who became President.

Washington, he said, was a pioneer as a young man in the surveying work of the early great forests, now great States. He was a lover of social life. He was not dominated by the military spirit, and became a great moral force at the back of the nation he fathered.

Washington, said the ambassador, is the symbol of the American national character, and is the vital force of American aspirations. Mount Vernon is the national shrine, and the hero who is revered there is Washington. The meaning which Washington and others put into the word "America" is "our guarantee for the future."

PARTICIPATION OF THE PRESS

The luncheon was a memorable patriotic event for the American colony in Santiago, and the historic day it commemorated was made even more outstanding by the enthusiastic participation of the Chilean press in the Bicentennial anniversary of the birth of the First President of the United States.

All the newspapers of Santiago devoted a great deal of space to articles and illustrations dealing with the "North American liberator," as he is known throughout Central and South America. MERCURIO devoted columns to recording the news of Bicentennial events from all over the world, adding the most favorable comments on the worthiness of the recipient of these honors.

Commending the spirit of the celebration and the nation that could stop its material affairs to pay such unusual tribute to its patriot-founder, EL DIARIO ILUSTRADO, of Santiago, said in an editorial on February 22, 1932:

Today the United States will restrain the giant stride of its activity for an instant to celebrate the birthday of a man whose origin is closely identified with the birth of the nation.

The man whom that great republic remembers on his bicentennial was one of the greatest spiritual values of his race, whose life was pervaded by intermingling sentiments of virtue and liberty.

The extraordinary brilliance of George Washington's public life is a reflection of his private life. He was great in the eyes of his country because he had been true to himself. He achieved fame by the safe and harmonious path of inner conquest, anonymous sacrifice, and, lastly, conscious and quiet heroism.

The United States realizes that remembering the birthday of a man like Washington is not only a satisfaction to patriotic pride; it is also, and more especially, an effective contribution to its moral growth.

Therefore the United States has exerted all its energies, those energies whose power we know so well, to render to this leader a tribute that not only concords with the greatness of the nation, but also with the outstanding personality of the hero.

Paying splendid tribute to the character and achievements of George Washington, and making acknowledgment of the assistance given by his example, in seeking freedom for his compatriots in the colonies of North America, EL MERCURIO, of Santiago, in an editorial on the same day, said, in part, as follows:

During the two centuries that have passed since his birth, the figure of George Washington, "first in peace, first in war, first in the hearts of his countrymen," has grown to heroic proportions, and his head is encircled by a halo of the purest virtue. The first President of the Union is a paragon of the ruler and the civil and military leader. He was also a paragon in his family life. He took part in the Convention that drafted the national Constitution, and when he rose to the supreme power he knew each and every one of the provisions he was called upon to comply with and to carry out. Scrupulous, even-tempered, upright, he never vacillated when it was a question of complying with his duty, much less when the welfare of the nation was at stake.

In spite of the multiplicity of sides to his personality, he must be judged first of all as the ruler in a difficult period of his country's life—the period when its fundamental institutions were being founded. It is on that side that he has the honor of serving as an example to all the later rulers of the Union. Washington's example guides the rulers of the Northern Republic in the same way that certain stars mark the route of navigators. That his wisdom was not only pragmatic but also based solidly on theoretical knowledge of vast proportions, is proved by the ideas expressed in the address in which he said farewell to public life in 1796. . . .

George Washington, the incorruptible, the just man, the father of his country, has also bequeathed his lessons to us South Americans, who present such a sharp contrast with the northern civilization.

Admirable example, guiding star of policy, two centuries after his birth, George Washington continues to illumine with his subdued and steady light the uncertain destiny of the countries of America.

MOUNT VERNON TREE PLANTED

The next occasion of a Bicentennial ceremony in Santiago occurred on July 4, when the American colony, at the invitation of the Ambassador, participated in a celebration of the two-fold American anniversary.

This celebration took the form of a commemorative tree planting in the garden of the Embassy, when the Americans and their foreign friends planted a young walnut tree, grown from a walnut supplied from the trees at Mount Vernon by the National Nut Tree Planting Project in cooperation with the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission.

The Ambassador's daughter, Miss Jane Culbertson, turned the first earth around the young tree. The next spadefuls of earth were placed by representative members of the American colony, including the president of the American Society of Chile, the president of the American Chamber of Commerce, the president of the Association of American Women of Chile, and the head of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions. Several members of the local British colony also participated, as did a number of prominent Chileans.

Ambassador Culbertson addressed the gathering on the double significance of the day, and the more than one hundred guests then went indoors for tea and an informal reception in the Embassy.

The Ambassador's remarks on the occasion of the tree planting were recorded in the special "Independence Day Number" of the SOUTH PACIFIC MAIL, as follows:

The planting of a tree is an act of faith, the Ambassador stated. It should become a symbol in the embassy garden of faith in humanity and in its ability to regulate its own affairs.

Referring to Washington, he outlined the trying and difficult times through which he had lived—the pre-revolution period, the revolution, the days of the articles of federation, and the two terms of his presidency.

"Some men in the history of the world," he said, "have passed beyond eulogy. Of these Washington is one. We need not speak about him. It is more fitting that we allow his life and words to speak to us."

The Ambassador cited Washington's farewell address to his countrymen which, he reminded those present, is always read in full by a senator in the United States Senate on February 22. The great patriot said: "The name of American, which belongs to you, in your national capacity, must always exalt the just pride of Patriotism, more than any appellation derived from local discriminations." Such was the emphasis which Washington placed on unity and cooperation among the States.

Washington also described his government as "uniting security with energy." In Ambassador Culbertson's opinion this emphasized the peculiar value of American institutions which have on one side the independence and democracy of Congress and on the other the authority and power of the Executive.

Washington stated in his farewell address: "The great rule of conduct for us, in regard to foreign nations, is, in extending our commercial relations, to have with them as little political connection as possible." This observation of Washington's, the ambassador pointed out, which was made at a time when the country was weak and little interested in international affairs, has been over-emphasized in recent times. It still retained, a sound warning, however, he added, against narrow political and military alliances of the old type, but obviously did not apply to the greater principles of cooperation with other nations in the interests of world peace and sound economic prosperity.

The Ambassador's final quotation from Washington's speech was the following:

"Harmony, liberal intercourse with all nations, are recommended by policy, humanity, and interest. But even our commercial policy should hold an equal and impartial hand: neither seeking nor granting exclusive favours or preferences. . . . There can be no greater error than to expect or calculate upon real favours from Nation to Nation. 'Tis an illusion, which experience must cure, which a just pride ought to discard."

Ambassador Culbertson concluded with the comment that it was an illusive task to find the balance between liberty and equality on one side, and justice, security, and authority on the other.

Evidence of the Ambassador's active interest and participation in the Bicentennial Anniversary of George Washington's birth is found further in his contribution of an article on America's First President to the special number of the SOUTH PACIFIC MAIL issued in commemoration of the Bicentennial. He likened the character of George Washington to the great monument that commemorates him in the capital city that bears his name, but added that the achievements of Washington "are in themselves a monument." His article follows, in full:

THE WASHINGTON HERITAGE
IDEALS FOR AMERICANS—THE TEST OF PROGRESS

The Washington monument, rising with dignity 555 feet above the banks of the Potomac, symbolizes both the greatness of Washington and the affection in which he is held by his fellow-citizens. Changeful in the various lights of the day and assuming different aspects under the searchlights of night, the monument by its simplicity and stability symbolizes those characteristics which we like to believe are the very foundation of American character.

We celebrate this week the two hundredth anniversary of Washington's birth. Not only in the United States, but throughout the world, we are witnessing a spontaneous expression of admiration and gratitude for the man whose life, character, and achievements have impressed themselves indelibly upon a great people, and are in themselves a monument more enduring than the obelisk of white marble which stands today in the city of Washington. The characteristics of simplicity and stability of character which we hold out as the ideal to American youth find their model in the statesman who lies buried in the simple tomb at Mount Vernon.

Monuments like the Washington monument, however, are erected, not primarily for our national great who rest today in their eternal tombs, but rather for us, the living.

The dead do not need our praise, certainly not a world figure such as George Washington. We honor Washington today for his patience during the bitter days of the American Revolution and for his unselfish and constructive statesmanship during the laying of the foundations of our country. In the presence of his memory we are lifted above the selfishness and sorrows of our routine life into a higher realm of resolve and confidence, into an atmosphere of determination to carry on to perfection the principles which characterize the life and services of the father of his country.

If we, the living, were to render in our lives services and sacrifices commensurate with the services and sacrifices of Washington, Lincoln, and other of our great national heroes, how quickly our Nation would achieve the ideal of domestic tranquillity and the world the ideal of international peace! Our age does not—nor does any age—live up to its ideals. The test of progress is, however, whether we aspire to a better organization of our common life. Against us operate always the forces of narrowness, injustice, prejudice, intolerance, hatred, and indifference, and it is only by conscientious effort that we can overcome them. It is not what we say in discourses on our national holidays that matters; the supremely important thing is that we find in the services and sacrifices of those who laid the foundations of our Nation a new resolve to strive for a better civilization. We cannot rest content with the heritage, however important it may be, which we have received from the generations which have gone. It is the progressive, constructive spirit of Washington which should guide and determine our actions today. We must regard our social life as a moving, growing process. Every age—and ours certainly—must rediscover the principles of social justice and international cooperation and apply them to its own particular need.

At the end of the sixth book of Virgil's "Aeneid" it is told how the founder of ancient Rome, guided by old Anchises, visited the underworld. He saw there the shades of those who some day were to mould the destinies of imperial Rome. He came finally to the twin gates of sleep from which issue the dreams of mankind. From the one, made of polished ivory, issue the deluding lies and false dreams that lead men's feet astray; from the other, made of simple, transparent horn, issue the true visions that guide men's feet aright. Today, as we recall the life and work of the Father of our country, there are floating over us dreams both false and true, and it is for us who live and who have benefited by the service and sacrifice of our national heroes to say whether the true dreams shall prevail over the false; it is for us to say whether that intangible, spiritual something which forms the basis of our America shall be transformed into the realities of our every-day life.

ACTIVITIES IN VALPARAISO

Valparaiso, largest Pacific seaport of the American continent south of San Francisco, has only a small American colony, but the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington was enthusiastically observed.

The men of the colony, under the leadership of a committee consisting of American Consul Frank A. Henry, Mr. Rea Hanna, and Mr. E. J. Lejeune, organized a George Washington Birthday luncheon on February 22. Consul Henry, reporting this event, wrote:

The attendance included twenty-four resident or visiting Americans, a large number considering the fact that the total colony counting men, women, and children does not greatly exceed one hundred persons, and that the day not being a local holiday, a number of those who would like to have attended were unable to do so.

Consul Henry was called upon to address the gathering, and delivered the following address upon the significance of the anniversary:

Fellow Americans:

It is most gratifying to the Committee which has organized this informal Washington's birthday luncheon to see such a large proportion of our small colony here today, as well as to welcome several of our friends from Santiago and elsewhere.

No occasion more appropriate than this could be found for a meeting of Americans so far from their native land. However delightful we may find life in this hospitable country, our thoughts must at times turn to other days and scenes, and today of all days each of us recalls to his memory Washington's birthday at home in the recent or the dimming past.

But today presents a unique opportunity. We have never yet seen, nor will we see again a celebration of the day so significant as marking an epoch in time elapsed—two hundred years. Long enough ago for history to have thrown its light with a true perspective on the character of George Washington and the enduring nature of his works, yet recent enough to permit us to some extent at least to envisage the man and his time. Some of us here today can remember in our childhood very old people who first saw the light of day in the America of the living George Washington.

In closing I wish to quote the famous tribute paid to him by another great American—Abraham Lincoln:

"Washington is the mightiest name of earth—long since the mightiest in the cause of civil liberty; still mightiest in moral reformation. On that name no eulogy is expected. It can not be. To add brightness to the sun, or glory to the name of Washington, is alike impossible. Let none attempt it. In solemn awe we pronounce the name, and in its naked, deathless splendor leave it shining on."

VALPARAISO RADIO PROGRAM

A George Washington program over the Valparaiso radio station featured the evening observance of this historic day. It opened with the "Star Spangled Banner," and was followed with readings in Spanish concerning the life and achievements of George Washington. The material for the readings was furnished by the Consulate from publications sent by the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission. The program included old-time American music and brought keen delight to Americans all over Chile. From comments of their Chilean friends, it appeared that this norte-americano program was equally appreciated by the people of Chile.

As was the case with the press of the capital city, the newspapers of Valparaiso gave much space to the George Washington Bicentennial and its observance all over the world. The SOUTH PACIFIC MAIL, prominent weekly news magazine published in Valparaiso, made its issue for the week of the opening of the Bicentennial a "George Washington Bicentenary Special Number." A picture of George Washington, surrounded by the folds of the American flag and inscribed "Homage of American Residents in Chile," formed the cover of the magazine, which is generally accepted as the "official organ of the British and American colonies" in Chile.

The editorial was an estimate of George Washington written from the British viewpoint. Several pages were devoted to the plans of the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission for the celebration of the Bicentennial and to news items of ceremonies on February 22 all over the world. The pictorial section contained a number of photographs of celebration events in Santiago and Valparaiso. The feature articles were written by American Ambassador Culbertson and Mr. Leo Shaw, Secretary of the American Chamber of Commerce of Chile.

The Ambassador's article has been given. A portion of the editorial follows:

Two men born and bred in America have stirred the imagination of the whole world and imposed their personalities on events with which they could have no direct connection—Washington and Lincoln. Both were men so great that it is possible to contemplate them apart from questions of nationality or period; "they were not for an age, but for all time."

There is more than one statue of Abraham Lincoln in England, and if, as yet, the memory of George Washington is not perpetuated there in eternal bronze, his face and figure and the outstanding events of his life are familiar to all. His greatness was recognized by the men who fought against him, and the best evidence of the manner in which he was regarded in England within fifteen years of the American War of Independence is afforded by a brief notice in the LONDON TIMES of November 9, 1796, announcing that President Washington had declined a third term of office.

The news item of a hundred and thirty-six years ago reads as follows: "We are sorry to announce the resignation of George Washington, Esq., of his situation as President of the United States of America. . . . He has . . . concluded a life of honor and glory. . . ."

A good argument could be made out that were George Washington alive today, he would be the most prominent figure in the League of Nations. Throughout his political life he was opposed to parties, forever attempting to neutralize their effect by selecting his ministers regardless of their political coloring. This catholicity, incomprehensible at the time, might well have been exercised on a wider stage. Like John Wesley, whom in some ways he resembled, Washington might have said "the whole world is my parish."

These reflections may be wide of the mark; in any case they are animated by sincere admiration of a man alike admirable as patriot, soldier, statesman, and private gentleman.

The SOUTH PACIFIC MAIL commemorated American Independence Day and the Bicentennial Celebration of Washington's birth for its thousands of American readers in Chile by another "American Number" on July 4, 1932, from which the following editorial is taken:

With unabated enthusiasm, in spite of hard times, American citizens the world over have celebrated the anniversary of the date which has long been associated with the outstanding fact in the early history of the United States, the signing of the Declaration of Independence, or rather, in strict historical fact, the adoption by Congress of Jefferson's Declaration. . . .

In the present year America has celebrated the bicentenary of the birth of Washington, and the occasion has led to renewed study of personalities of the Father of his Country and also of the men who surrounded him, through whom he developed his great ideal of independent nationhood secured by force of arms and safeguarded by a free people building up their own institutions. The obstacles placed in his way; the difficulties he had to thrust aside by force or circumvent by statesmanship are now better understood than in the days when Washington was the object of blind hero-worship; but the hero has stood the test of closer scrutiny and emerges, not as a demigod, but a very great and noble man, representative of the ideal of America whilst in no way departing from that of England. G. K. Chesterton, on the occasion of the Washington Centenary, published a character study of the hero from a very British viewpoint, and neatly summed him up for English people in the words—"we can agree with him in everything except in opinion." . . .

The United States, in the late eighteenth and early nineteenth century, passed through a phase of development the like of which has to be sought centuries earlier in "our rough island story." In both countries "the path of duty" proved "the road to glory," and if cultured Americans claim their shares in Shakespeare and Milton, it is just that Englishmen should recognize in the founders of the United States the qualities in many cases inherited from the sturdy opponents of barons, kings, and even of parliaments.

The times are out of joint; the present is full of difficulties; the future is obscure. Strength can only be found in union, and that union need not be political. It will more than suffice if it is based on goodwill, on an honest attempt at mutual understanding, and on an inflexible determination to allow nothing to hinder the English-speaking peoples from being of one voice and mind in upholding the civilization for which their fathers lived and died.

WASHINGTON HONORED IN ANTOFAGASTA

In Antofagasta February 22 comes during the height of the summer season, when the members of the small American colony have left this coastal nitrate port that straddles the Tropic of Capricorn for the cooler regions of the Andes.

Consul Odin G. Loren had supplied the newspapers with material concerning the George Washington anniversary and the world-wide celebration beginning that day, and the daily press devoted considerable space to news of it. Consul and Mrs. Loren observed the anniversary with an informal dinner in their home.

The American Consul and Mrs. Loren on July 4 gave a reception and supper for the members of the local American colony and visitors in the city. The drawing rooms of their home were attractively decorated in patriotic colors and the many guests greatly admired a beautiful portrait of George Washington garlanded with flowers. The occasion was made as "unofficial" as possible and every effort was put forth to have these Americans in a far-off land feel "at home."

El Día de los Estados Unidos, as American Independence Day is known in the Latin American Republics, was marked with friendly felicitation in an editorial on July 4 in EL MERCURIO DE ANTOFAGASTA, a part of which, translated, follows:

There are dates in the history of the world that have such importance to humanity that they cannot be allowed to go unnoted. One of these dates is July 4, 1776, the day that saw the proclamation of the independence of the United States of America. . . .

El Día de los Estados Unidos should be remembered especially in every American country with true respect and admiration, for on July 4, 1776, began the independent life of that nation which thus pointed the way to all the other nations of the Americas. . . .

On this historic day we are happy to greet and to felicitate the American Consul and the members of the American colony resident in Antofagasta.

EVENTS IN CONCEPCION

The few Americans resident in Concepción, Chile, observed the George Washington Bicentennial with social events on February 22 and July 4, and the daily newspaper, LA PATRIA, commemorated the great anniversary with the following editorial on Washington's Birthday:

EXAMPLE OF HUMAN GREATNESS

The most powerful nation on earth, which has achieved all the splendors of wealth, culture, and democratic organization, today celebrates and commemorates the bicentennial of the birth of him who was the father of its independence and its liberty.

George Washington, a man of blameless life, a distinguished soldier, a model ruler, laid the foundations of the nation, and his spirit still guides and directs all the activities of the national soul of North America.

In the reverence done him there is much of worship. . . . Washington deserves this veneration and gratitude. All his actions are characterized by an absolutely sincere modesty, a devotion to his country, a conception of human duty which made him ever true to his obligations toward justice and truth.

Now that the North American nation exerts such a powerful influence on all human problems, humanity has a right to demand that the spirit of Washington guide and determine all the actions of his country. . . .

Never was praise more apt than that given Washington by his compatriots: "First in peace, first in war, first in the hearts of his countrymen."

It is entirely just to bow before the memory of this great example of the human race.

But before all and above all we should hope that his spirit and his example may continue to rule in the soul of his people.

And thus he whom his nation venerates will ever be venerated by the whole world.

The account of the Bicentennial Celebration of the Birth of George Washington in the Republic of Chile is brought to a close with the splendid tribute to the "North American Liberator" from the President of Chile on Pan American Day, April 14, 1932. On that day, the chiefs of mission of the Latin American republics in Washington made a pilgrimage in a body to the tomb of Washington at Mount Vernon. There, in a dignified and impressive ceremony, each diplomatic representative read a message from the head of his Government in tribute to the First President of the North American Republic and in commemoration of the friendly union existing between all the republics of the New World.

Following is the message of His Excellency, Sr. Don Juan Esteban Montero, President of the Republic of Chile:

ON THIS DAY, SET APART BY THE AMERICAN REPUBLICS TO JOIN IN A REAFFIRMATION OF THEIR COMMON ASPIRATIONS FOR PEACE AND FRIENDLY COOPERATION, THE GOVERNING BOARD OF THE PAN AMERICAN UNION HAS CHOSEN TO PAY REVERENT AND ADMIRING HOMAGE TO THE MEMORY OF GEORGE WASHINGTON.

TO GEORGE WASHINGTON LATIN AMERICA IS INDEBTED FOR THE IDEALS HE DEFENDED WITH INCOMPARABLE BRILLIANCE AND TENACITY. WHEN THE TIME CAME FOR ITS DETERMINATION TO BE FREE, THE EXAMPLE OF THE UNITED STATES WAS ITS INSPIRATION, WHEREIN IT FOUND THE STRENGTH FOR ITS BATTLES FOR LIBERTY.

GEORGE WASHINGTON WAS NOT ONLY THE FATHER OF THE DEMOCRACY OF THIS GREAT NATION BUT ALSO A MODEL OF INSPIRING GENIUS FOR THE GREAT LIBERATORS OF THE PEOPLES OF THE AMERICAN CONTINENT.

JUAN ESTEBAN MONTERO,
PRESIDENT OF THE REPUBLIC.

MEXICO

MEXICO'S attitude toward the George Washington Bicentennial is aptly summed up in this phrase of the Mexican writer, Antenor Sala: "The American eagle and the condor of the Andes, guardians of the summits, are humbled before the greatness of George Washington."

Mexican history dating back to the seventh century, age of the Toltecs—emblazoned by such names as Montezuma, Aztec Emperor; Hernando Cortés, Spanish conquistador; Don Miguel Hidalgo y Costilla and Simón Bolívar, leaders of the Mexican and Latin-American independence movements, and a long list of national heroes extending to the present time—reserved a place in its colorful annals for the name and deeds of the great North American patriot, George Washington, who was the inspiration of the heroes of the Mexican people in their struggles for national identity and independence.

Expression of this great regard for Washington was given throughout Mexico during the Bicentennial year. Washington's name was honored in Northern Mexico in the cities of Chihuahua, Nuevo Laredo and Ciudad Juárez; in the Southwest in Durango; in the South Central in Mexico City, Tampico and Monterrey; and on the Gulf in Vera Cruz. The celebrations were of many kinds, varying from religious services to bull fights and rodeos.

His Excellency Sr. Pascual Ortiz Rubio, President of the Republic of Mexico, sent the following message, which was read at Washington's tomb, Mount Vernon, on Pan American Day, April 14, 1932:

MY GOVERNMENT AND THE MEXICAN PEOPLE ASSOCIATE THEMSELVES WITH THE GOVERNMENT AND PEOPLE OF THE UNITED STATES OF NORTH AMERICA ON THE OCCASION OF THE BICENTENNIAL OF THE BIRTH OF GEORGE WASHINGTON, THAT EXEMPLARY PATRIOT IN WHOM AMERICA RECOGNIZES THE ORIGINATOR OF THE INDEPENDENCE OF OUR CONTINENT.

PASCUAL ORTIZ RUBIA,
PRESIDENT OF THE REPUBLIC OF MEXICO.

The Director of the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission received the following message from Honorable Manuel C. Téllez, Secretary of Foreign Affairs, on the opening day of the Bicentennial Celebration:

MEXICO CITY, FEBRUARY 22, 1932.

REPRESENTATIVE SOL BLOOM,
WASHINGTON, D. C.

PRAY ACCEPT MY MOST SINCERE CONGRATULATIONS ON THIS UNFORGETTABLE BICENTENNIAL DAY.

MANUEL C. TELLEZ,
SECRETARY OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

OPENING EVENTS IN MEXICO CITY

Among the events marking the opening day of the Bicentennial Celebration in Mexico City, capital of the republic, were a George Washington tree planting, a program under the auspices of an organization of Mexican students, a reception at the United States Embassy, a Washington luncheon of the Pan American Round Table and the laying of wreaths at the foot of the Washington Monument.

February 22 is also observed in Mexico as the anniversary of the deaths of former President Francisco I. Madero and Vice President José María Pino Suárez, who died at the hands of assassins in 1913. A celebration honoring these national heroes was held during the morning of the opening day of the Bicentennial. A paragraph from EL NACIONAL, a Mexican newspaper, on February 21, under the title, "A Double Homage," described the significance of the day in these words:

Both Mexico and the United States will render homage to the patriots Francisco I. Madero and George Washington, according to a resolution taken by the Ministry for Foreign Affairs.

In this connection, Señor Don Manuel C. Téllez, Minister for Foreign Affairs, made the following official statement to us yesterday afternoon:

"Since on Monday the 22nd next there should be commemorated both the anniversary of the death of ex-President Don Francisco I. Madero and the bicentennial of the birth of George Washington, the Ministry for Foreign Affairs, after consulting with the Embassy of the United States in this capital, has issued the following orders to its Embassy in Washington: 'On Monday, the 22nd, please raise the flag full mast from dawn until noon in commemoration of the bicentennial of the birth of George Washington. From noon until sunset, at half mast, in commemoration of the anniversary of the death of Señor Francisco I. Madero. For its part, the American Embassy in Mexico will reverse that procedure here.' "

The planting in honor of George Washington, of walnut trees grown from seeds sent to Mexico from Mount Vernon, preceded the Embassy reception. Hon. J. Reuben Clark, Jr., American Ambassador to Mexico, officiated and addressed the large gathering of Americans and Mexicans as follows:

Two hundred years ago today Washington was born. As one foreordained, he led his people to freedom and founded the first independent nation in the West.

His was the first, and, in his own time, the great example to the Western world, of pure, lofty, disinterested patriotism; after his time great heroes sprang up in other nations, emulating his spirit, treading after his example.

At his birth there was not a free people upon this hemisphere; a quarter of a century after his death, Western peoples had become free, new liberty-loving nations had been born, and two continents had been filled with independent republics.

Taught in the school of experience, he became one of the world's greatest warriors. Inspired by a holy devotion to civic virtue, he baptized his people with the same spirit. Service, not ambition, not selfishness, directed every act of his long and distinguished public career—a career without one blot or stain.

MR. J. REUBEN CLARK, UNITED STATES AMBASSADOR, SPEAKING AT GEORGE WASHINGTON BICENTENNIAL CELEBRATION IN MEXICO CITY.

No other man in the British colonies could have done his work; and without his work, America, as we know it, would not be. Rightfully he is revered as "Father of his Country"; justly is he decreed "First in war; first in peace; and first in the hearts of his countrymen."

We are met today to plant, in commemoration of his birth and service, a tiny seedling, sprouted from a walnut grown at Mount Vernon. As the years go, we shall see this seedling become a mighty tree. As this seedling will grow, so grew the virtues of the great Washington. From the breast of one man, they have spread, in the centuries, to fill the hearts of the hemisphere. May the seedling we shall now plant grow to maturity and typify in the majesty of its proportions, in the beauty of its symmetry, and in the benevolence of its presence, the strength of Washington's character, the graces of his public and private life, and the presiding genius and his unselfish devoted service.

May all who behold this tree in its maturity, see in it a symbol of the strength and the glory of the free institutions which our forefathers of this hemisphere, driven by a common purpose and inspired by a common spirit, set up in the New World. May all who behold this tree, whatever their race or allegiance, sense a challenge to high service for their country and for its ideals.

PLACE WREATH ON STATUE

As another event on the day's program a wreath was placed by the Alan Seegar Post of the American Legion at the foot of the Washington Statue in the Plaza Dinamarca—a statue presented to Mexico by the United States in 1910.

During the afternoon a Washington luncheon was held by the Pan American Round Table Club. The program was called "United States Day" and was in charge of Mrs. D. G. Dwyre, wife of Consul Dwyre. The following description of the event is taken from EXCELSIOR of February 23, 1932:

There were three tables placed on three sides of a square and one in the center. The decorations were carried out in red, white and blue flowers with a large American flag just above and behind the head table, where a very clever center-piece representing Mount Vernon in miniature was conspicuous. The programs were in the American colors with a head of the Father of his Country done in silver at the top. At each place was a small hatchet to remind one of the immortal cherry tree.

After an address by the director, Mrs. George C. Glasscock, the guests of honor were introduced: The American Ambassador, Hon. J. Reuben Clark, Jr., Mrs. Clark, Mrs. V. Courtenay, Mrs. W. Forbes, wife of the British Chargé d'Affaires, the United States Consul, Dudley G. Dwyre, C. G. Cunningham, Commercial Attaché to the American Embassy, and Mrs. Zelia Nuttall. The program was then turned over to Mrs. Dwyre.

After a song, "Father of the Land We Love," by Mrs. Walter Christie, Miss Luacine Clark played "Minuet and Gavotte," by Alexander Reinagle, 1756-1809; "Two Minuets," by Pierre Landrin Dupont, 1792, and "Rondo," by Wm. Brown, 1787, substituting for Mrs. S. Bolling Wright, who was unable to be present. Mrs. Conrad gave a sketch of the "Music of the Period," followed by two old songs by Mrs. Christie, "Beneath a Weeping Willow's Shade," and "The Lass with the Delicate Air," accompanied by Mrs. Elizabeth Lamont Rodríguez. For an encore she sang "O Dear, What can the Matter Be?" Both Mrs. Christie and Mrs. Rodríguez were in handsome Colonial costumes. The next number was "Air from Alceste," Gluck-St. Saens, played with great taste by Mrs. Rodríguez.

The principal speaker was Ambassador Clark. He declared that we owe our spiritual and political freedom to Washington and that one of the results of the World War will be economic freedom and a breaking down of barriers between social classes, making all men brothers.

Several pupils of Miss Easton, in Colonial costume, danced a minuet.

CEREMONY IN BOLIVAR HOME

The culminating event of the day was a concert recital in the former home of Simón Bolívar, under the auspices of one of Mexico's leading scientific and art societies, of which His Excellency, Sr. Ortiz Rubio, is honorary president—"El Ateneo de Ciencias y Artes de México." According to EXCELSIOR, English language newspaper of Mexico City, "some of Mexico's best and most noted artists participated in the concert," and to the group of gathered scientists and others, the United States Ambassador spoke as follows:

You do my government and my people great honor by your ceremonies tonight in memory of George Washington, and by your invitation that I be present and speak to you. This honor has particular significance because we meet in the house which has been honored and hallowed by the presence of that great hero and patriot, the inspiration of myriads of his compatriots, the emancipator of weary, burdened peoples—Simon Bolívar.

This thoughtful compliment which you pay to my Government and to my people, and to me as the representative of both, is not lost, nor will it be forgotten. I do not wish, in the few words I shall say tonight, to speak of Washington as a national hero. He was one of the few of all history—one of the few, of whom the peoples of this hemisphere have furnished their full share—to whom is vouchsafed the distinction and honor of serving great masses of their fellowmen.

Washington's life was a prophecy of the genius of the Americas. Through Washington were manifested civic and political virtues that have become the anchors of modern world democracies. He was born with self-reliance, courage, decision, industry, a love of rugged honesty and truth, and a deep, intense devotion to country. Out of these was built his great character and his high achievement.

From early boyhood until the end of his life, he displayed an industry and painstaking thoroughness, without which no man, who must make his own way in the world, can rise. In his early frontier campaigns he showed qualities of self-reliance, decision, and courage that have been the invariable companions of all those who have successfully fought for liberty in the Western World.

When, upon his nomination for the supreme command of the colonial forces, he retired from the council hall, that the discussions of his unsought candidacy might be unembarrassed by his presence, he evidenced that fine modesty, without which there is no true greatness.

At Valley Forge, with discontented, unpaid, unclothed, starving, disease stricken, death ridden troops, he brought into play that stubborn tenacity of purpose and high resolve, that genius for leadership, without which the most righteous cause must fail, and without which the Americas would still be the playthings of Kings.

When a victorious, but almost mutinous, army, smarting under the grievances of an ungrateful Congress, sought to make him king, he thrust aside the crown, with a decision that was final, and that warned the selfishly ambitious men of all succeeding generations that monarchy was not for the Western world.

When, taking command of the colonial forces, he declined all compensation except actual expenses, and when, surrendering that command, he maintained his refusal and rendered a meticulous account of his expenditures, he set a standard of civic virtue, unselfish service, and honesty that has been an example for all true patriots since his time.

His surrender of the command of a victorious army, ready to follow him in any enterprise he might choose, and his immediate retirement to private life, displayed a high patriotism that was a beacon to all peoples of the Western world. His refusal of a second reelection as President of the United States was a manifestation of the splendid civic concept which in our day has ripened into the democratic principle, announced as a bulwark of the revolution in your own country—"No reelection."

I might go on, almost indefinitely, pointing out his virtues and his achievements. But I have named enough for my purpose.

These that I have enumerated were not his sole property; they have been the common heritage of every true lover of his country in all time; they have been the particular characteristics of those who have fought and died that we who now live on this hemisphere might have peace, contentment, liberty, free governments, and free institutions. And these blessings we shall enjoy so long, and so long only, as those whom we choose to govern us shall possess the same rugged virtues.

May the Giver of All Good instill into the hearts of the children of all our western peoples these same virtues, that always there may wave over us flags representing and dedicated to free peoples!

ADDRESS OF SENOR SALA

The address of welcome at the celebration in the Bolívar house was delivered by Honorable Antenor Sala, who said:

My cordial welcome. On entering, ladies and gentlemen, this ancestral mansion, where the Liberator Simon Bolívar resided in his youth, as a guest of honor, I recall from the deepest part of my soul the words that synthesized the greetings among the Greeks of ancient times: "Be thou happy!" Your presence makes me happy, rejuvenates me and fills me with inspiration, and that same cause which makes me happy has its influence upon our minds and the greetings of the Greeks penetrate in them with radiant and beneficent optimism.

Unlimited happiness springs from this place and on this occasion. The patriotic idea of liberty unites fondly together the admirers of Washington, who as a marvelous coincidence come to celebrate the second centennial of this hero in the same place in which the centennial of another hero was recently celebrated; yours was an American and mine an Ibero-American; both alike in their liberality, nobility, and patriotism; both masters of insurmountable liberty.

So things go on the impulse of destiny, and in this way they join themselves together as a proof of confraternity and progress, of ideas and people, and because the prevailing tendency of the world is union, peace, and liberty; a fraternal union which makes one for all and all for one. Be welcome

THE MARRIAGE OF GEORGE WASHINGTON AND MRS. CUSTIS

The marriage of George Washington and Martha Dandridge Custis, by Junius B. Stearns. The wedding took place on January 6, 1759. Whether in a church or at the bride's house is not of authentic record, and there are no known reliable details concerning it.

here! The house of the Liberator of the people is your house; you have a right to it. George Washington, with a seat in immortality, gave independence to the United States of America, and on account of this he is entitled also to the seat of honor which he gloriously conquered in the country where the word liberty is profusely spoken of and where the people's rights are invoked.

This is your house! If yesterday warm praises were heard in honor of the Liberator, we shall hear today praises spoken in tribute to Washington; and the just praises of yesterday and those of today are inspired by the most pure sentiment of patriotism; both immortal heroes will be united in this place by a fervent and eternal embrace as if they were only one being. The Creators of Peoples are always alike in their worth, thoughts, and actions.

What is not now worth while mentioning in these solemn moments is my person, as I am only the caretaker of this House in which the unconquered Bolívar at one time lived. But I am always faithful and watchful, being sincere in my faith. My most vehement desire carried to the greatest height of egoism, and which I would never change, is my love for my country and for the human liberties.

Be welcome!

LIC. HERRASTI SPEAKS

Señor Sala's speech was followed by that of Lic. Francisco de P. Herrasti, who spoke in the name of the Athenaeum of Sciences and Arts of Mexico. The address of Lic. Herrasti follows, in translation:

Mr. Ambassador of the United States of America, Gentlemen:

In this old colonial house, made famous by the fact that here once lived Simón Bolívar, hero of liberty in South America, companion of Sucre, San Martín, and Morelos, we are gathered this evening to commemorate the splendid glory of the hero of the North—paragon of citizenship, pure and sublime example of patriotism—George Washington.

Gentlemen: More than a hundred years earlier the pilgrims of the Mayflower had fled from England, seeking across tempestuous seas a land of liberty, and, having endured great hardships on land and water, with their Captain, Miles Standish, they finally landed at Plymouth, on the shores of America, which was to become for them a land of freedom. Today, a hundred and two of us, the same number that came over in the Mayflower, are gathered in this old dwelling, another band of pilgrims, seeking not liberty, which has already been won for us by our forefathers, but a door to understanding and good will between the Americans of Washington and those of Bolívar.

The old legend of Rome tells that back in heroic times, when the city was threatened by enemies, the Roman Senate appointed Quintius Cincinnatus dictator. The messengers of the senate who were sent to notify Cincinnatus found him tilling his fields, his oxen yoked to the plow. When Cincinnatus saw the representatives of Roman authority approach, he cleansed himself of the grime and sweat of toil and clothed himself in the civil toga, the better to listen to the voice of his country.

Without delay Cincinnatus accepted. He put himself at the head of the Roman legions, defeated the enemy in sixteen days, then promptly abdicated the power that had been conferred upon him for six months and returned alone to his yoke and plow. Who in history, gentlemen, incarnates the soul of Cincinnatus better than George Washington? Who is more deserving than Washington, who not only for sixteen days but for forty-five years served his fatherland with unswerving devotion, patience, unselfishness, courage, intrepidity, patriotism, piety, magnanimity, and gentleness to the greatest degree known in history?

He fought against the French and Indians, represented Virginia in the House of Burgesses, became Commander-in-Chief of the Revolutionary army, President of the Constitutional convention, and President of the United States for two terms, giving final proof of his disinterestedness by refusing a third term. Of Washington it might be said that he was not a king because he did not wish to be; but he was greater than if he had been king, an enduring example for patriots and leaders. He lived a blameless life, this great public man, exemplifying for future generations the most perfect type of patriot. If we Latins year after year celebrate the French Revolution with all its horrors and crimes, should we not with more reason commemorate the great leader who, guilty of no misdeed, was the example and the forerunner of French liberty and, more than that, of the liberty of all America?

Fomenters of discord seek to show that there is antagonism and enmity between the Anglo-Saxon and Latin civilizations here in America and try to foster mistrust and suspicion among us. But this is not so, gentlemen. Anglo-Saxon and Latin civilizations are merely two different views of the classic civilization which was the great forerunner and common mother of Latin and Anglo-Saxon. The only difference is that we Latins are the direct heirs of classic civilization; we have followed this civilization in all its vicissitudes, in all its glory and splendor, but also in all its decadence and abuse of Austrian and Bourbon, wasting and squandering, as direct heirs frequently do the opulence and grandeur of their fathers and forefathers. The Anglo-Saxons, on the other hand, acquainted with our civilization from the times of Cassivelaunus and Agricola, following it from the days of Vacarius, professor of civil law, have chosen from classic civilization the most valuable precepts and gifts, like the adoptive son who often puts his patrimony to better use than the real son.

Our common origin and history should inspire us with brotherly love, opening our eyes and turning our hearts to those Americans who seek to realize the sublime ideal of the greatest Cincinnatus in history, George Washington. And if this can be done the future holds for American an abundance of felicity and glory such as the world has never yet known.

These are my most earnest desires, my most sincere sentiments on this historic evening which symbolizes the Mayflower of mutual understanding—that in the name of our common mother, venerated source of our civilization, Anglo-Saxons and Latins in America may work out their mutual felicity together, following the interpretation of our glorious classic civilization given us by the father of American civilization, the great Virginian, "first in war, first in peace," first in the hearts of all who love liberty, right, and piety.

PORTRAITS DISTRIBUTED

Seven reproductions of the Athenaeum portrait of George Washington by Gilbert Stuart were sent to the United States Embassy in Mexico by the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission. A report from the Ambassador states that "the Embassy sent one of these reproductions each to the American Consulate General, the American Club, the American Chamber of Commerce and the American School and retained the remainder in the Chancery."

EURINDIA, bi-monthly publication of political, social and economic affairs in Mexico and an organ of the Institute of Political Science of Mexico, made of its issue of February, 1932, a special Bicentennial number. The foreword in this issue of the magazine was written by His Excellency Dr. José M. Puig Casauranc, then Mexican Ambassador to the United States, as follows:

The reverence for George Washington in the United States will this month light the bicentennial lamp of the devotion owed to one who in his blameless private life and his historical public life, as man and as liberator, laid down the doctrine that has supplied the individual and the nation with nearly two centuries of American idealism and still presents strong prospect for the future.

The magazine, which was published entirely in Spanish, contained a reprint of George Washington's Farewell Address, an article entitled "The Bicentennial of George Washington," by Francisco de P. Herrasti, and a tribute, "The Great George Washington," by Antenor Sala. These two articles have been translated and are herewith reprinted:

THE GEORGE WASHINGTON BICENTENNIAL

BY FRANCISCO DE P. HERRASTI

Fortunate indeed in the annals of civic splendor is the great patriot who today, one hundred and thirty-three years after his death, is extolled and acclaimed with the same unanimity he merited from the new nation and from his fellow citizens during his lifetime. Honored indeed is he whose tomb on his old estate at Mount Vernon has become a national sanctuary of the Anglo-Saxon race in America and who is also honored by the universal verdict of history—praised and eulogized by the pen of British, German, and French historians who have written of him in such high terms as we find on the famous pages of Lord Brougham and the Earl of Stanhope, John Richard Green and Sir Archibald Alison, Henry Martin, Carl von Rotteck, and Frederick von Raumer. These famous pages of unstinted praise, coming from the most critical and erudite centers of the world, are like that civic crown which the Romans believed was the only worthy guerdon and reward for patriotism such as his, untarnished by any breath of suspicion or dissension: Washington, the incarnation of the exemplary patrician, who in an atmosphere and an epoch of uncertainty and corruption embodied the great qualities of men like Cincinnatus, Fabricius, and Fabius, who lived in the most heroic times of civic grandeur. And, to cite a writer of his own nationality, let Henry Smith Williams speak for this nation of more than a hundred million souls: "What better fortune could a patriot have than that it should be said of him that his people worship him with an adoration akin to deification and feel for him a veneration that may be summarized in the phrase 'the father of his country'?"

Washington has served as the yardstick by which patriots and statesmen are measured, and beside him all others leave something to be desired. And finally let us quote the words of the eminent writer, Sir James Bryce, for whose clear and impartial judgments and pure and clear language we instinctively feel great admiration. In his great work, "The American Commonwealth," in speaking of Alexander Hamilton, he incidentally says of the founder of the United States of America: "One cannot discourse on the disappearance of this brilliant figure [Hamilton], to Europeans the most interesting in the early history of the United States, without observing that neither during his lifetime nor afterwards did his fellow citizens seem to recognize his excellent merits. Certainly Washington is a much more perfect character. Washington stands alone, unapproachable, like a snow peak rising above its fellows into the clear air of the morning, with a dignity, constancy, and purity which have made him the ideal type of civic virtue to succeeding generations. No greater benefit could have befallen the republic than to have such a type from the first, before the eye and mind of the people."

In a new country such as the territory that stretched from the St. Johns River to Hudson Bay and from the Chesapeake to the banks of the Ohio River, where colonization dated only from the early seventeenth century—Jamestown in Virginia, the first permanent English settlement, being founded in 1607 in the reign of James I, thirteen years before the landing of the Pilgrims in New England—it is indeed wonderful that before the middle of the eighteenth century men should have been born who exemplified in such a high degree the most difficult and mature attainments of the human spirit; and more than this, it is wonderful that a man should possess these attainments who had not received a careful education, one who never even mastered the French language; who was but meagerly trained in mathematics; and was never an assiduous reader in spite of his extensive library; this we learn from his popular biographer, the Episcopal minister, Mason Weems, whose works are today half discredited by historical critics but whose writings appear in a definitive edition prepared by Worthington C. Ford. The secret of this miracle no doubt can be found in the traditional type of domestic civilization which families like that of Washington brought with them from the mother country. John Washington, the great-grandfather of the hero, left Northamptonshire in 1658, the year of Cromwell's death, and proceeded to America, taking with him the memory of a king executed in front of Whitehall; and of a protector of the republic who did what he could to exercise authority without tyranny, firm in his purpose to substitute for an outworn traditional authority the only method of restoring authority, which is by the clear and definite expression of the national will, and taking with him also the odious memory of a standing army ever threatening war; and of the horrors evoked by even the mere name of unbridled religious exaltation.

The later lessons of the colonists were also fruitful. The feeling of aversion to widespread corruption under the Stuart restoration and the vogue for such books as "Hudibrás," in reaction against the puritanism of the seventeenth century; the triumph of the principle that sovereignty is rooted in the representatives of the people and that the authority of the king himself proceeds from the will of his people, proclaimed in the Declaration of Rights, and repeated in the Bill of Rights of December 16, 1689, which transferred in England the sovereignty from the king to the people under William, Prince of Orange, and his wife Mary, the daughter of James, the new sovereigns of the mother country; the great expansion of England in the New World and Asia in the reign of Queen Anne, sister of Mary and wife of Prince George of Denmark; the Spanish wars of the Succession; the defeat of Spain and the rivalry of France which by the peace of Utrecht transferred Nova Scotia, Newfoundland, and the Hudson Bay region to England; the shameful history of the slave trade where England replaced France and was granted the right to sell the Spanish colonies in America up to 4,800 Negroes from Africa a year; and, finally, the acceptance by the British nation in 1714 as Anne's successor on the throne of George of Hanover, a foreigner but a Protestant, son of the Electress Sophia, granddaughter of James the First. All this educated the leading British colonial classes in the school of attachment to Puritan severity and hatred of all corruption; faith in the policy of the people and their representatives, and aversion to despots; admiration for the prowess of the Anglo-Saxon race, scorn for Spain, and envy and jealousy of France; antipathy to the traffic in human beings; and repudiation of Catholicism and the Papacy. And something of all this is found in Washington.

The North American hero was born in the fiftieth year of the reign of George II of England; in the eleventh year of the ministry of the celebrated statesman, Sir Robert Walpole, who was to continue as Prime Minister until the future hero was ten years of age. Hatred of corruption and adherence to strict morality increased in the British colonies of America where corruption, long rife, continued under the first Hanoverian kings; and the vigorous and lively propaganda for reform instituted by the "Methodists" of Oxford not long before the birth of Washington, a movement in which the names of the orator, George Whitefield, and the poet, Charles Wesley, and the organizer, John Wesley, are famous. These nonconformists with the Established Church met opposition in England; but in America the future held a wider field for them.

[Here follows a full account of Washington's life, much space being devoted to the campaigns of the War for Independence in America, of which the author, continuing, says:]

The North American Revolution lasted from 1775 to 1783, ending ten years before the death of Louis XVI and six years before the celebrated 5th of May, 1789, the first day of the French Revolution, when, after 175 years of recess, the States General of France found themselves meeting again. The French and Indian War had been in a way a prologue to the North American Revolution, for once the French power in America had been destroyed, the English colonists had less need of England. France, in vengeance, assisted the rebel colonists; and Spain, also, and with her, Holland; and Thomas Jefferson, the American Ambassador in France, suggested to the Third Estate in Paris that it should constitute what was to be the famous National Assembly of the French Revolution.

Only after his unanimous election as Commander-in-Chief of the army was Washington's full moral stature appreciated by the world to which he gave an example of sublime modesty and disinterestedness, when he said: "Tho' I am truly sensible of the high Honour done me in this Appointment, yet I feel great distress from a consciousness that my abilities and Military experience may not be equal to the extensive and important Trust. . . . But lest some unlucky event should happen unfavourable to my reputation, I beg it may be remembered by every Gentl. in the room, that I this day declare with the utmost sincerity, I do not think my self equal to the Command I am honoured with." He accepted his expenses but in the Roman manner refused any stipend or remuneration. . . .

Also by a unanimous vote Washington was elected the first President of the United States of America in 1789, and by a unanimous vote he was reelected in 1792. The third term he refused, but nevertheless he received two of the electors' votes. During his presidential term Washington was cruelly attacked, and this greatly embittered him. He was attacked on the score of neutrality in the war between England and France; on his support of the Jay Treaty with the mother country; on the vigor he displayed in the case of the French Minister Genet; in his repression of the "Whiskey Rebellion." History has approved the deeds of the hero and appreciates the fact that the success of the Government during its early years was principally owing to him; that he was the one who stamped the Government with a deeply national character; that he saved the credit of his country and provided a constitutional foundation for the Federation, compelling the opposite political parties to live together in harmony—the Federalists and the Democratic Republicans. His wisdom in supporting Hamilton, the man we have seen eulogized by Lord Bryce, has been eloquently defended. And if it were possible or necessary to add anything to his fame, this was done in the solemn and effusive Farewell Address that Washington gave to the nation September 17, 1796.

He retired from the Presidency in 1797 at the age of sixty-four and returned to the land, to the Mount Vernon of his youth. In the following year the country again sought to make use of the hero's services and appointed him Commander-in-Chief of the army that had been recruited in view of possible war with France; but the life of the famous Virginia colonist was approaching its end, and he died at Mount Vernon on December 14, 1799. His last wishes anticipated the work of Lincoln, his most anxious desire being that Virginia abolish slavery, a step which he believed would prevent many evils in the future. In England the slave trade was viewed with growing indignation, a far echo of the so-called Oxford movement. Thomas Clarkson and William Wilberforce were at the head of the movement, which lasted for 20 years, until the British Parliament abolished the trade in 1807, five years after Denmark and a year before the United States of America prohibited the importation of slaves into its territory.

Washington died as he had lived, giving an extraordinary example of his simplicity of soul. His high idealism and his well-proved love of liberty were manifest once more when, in his will, he granted freedom to his slaves. A tall man with enormous hands, serious, worthy, imposing, he died childless; that all the sons of earth who respect, love, and guard the classic principle of human liberty may claim him as their father and guardian. The words of Henry Lee and John Marshall are still the best epitaph of the liberator: "First in war, first in peace, first in the hearts of his countrymen."

What more did Washington need to fill to the brim the most complete ideal of our Latin civilization, of which we have drunk deep through all the ages since the founding of Rome two thousand six hundred and eighty-five years ago? To seek an answer to this question is worth while, for it takes into consideration the division of America into two civilizations: our original Latin civilization and the Anglo-Saxon civilization derived therefrom. It is of course not the materialism of the "spinning jenny" of Hargreaves, the "power loom" of Cartwright, the "steam engine" of James Watt, those great revolutionaries of industry, contemporaneous with the life and greatness of the revolutionary of liberty, George Washington.

THE GREATNESS OF GEORGE WASHINGTON

BY ANTENOR SALA

Humanity can never liquidate the debt of gratitude that it owes its benefactors in all latitudes, whether they be statesmen, soldiers, men of science or art. What has been accepted and utilized should not be forgotten, much less the name of those who have sacrificed themselves on the altars of progress. The memory of greatness, whether of persons or things, should be refreshed from time to time so that gratitude may be revived and all who will listen told how great is the debt owed by humanity.

George Washington is one of the greatest creditors of the world; his beneficent deeds are remembered with immense satisfaction; his name is venerated, and present and future generations are besought to imitate whenever possible the example of the American "paladin" of whom historical criticism, purified by the passage of two hundred years, says: "he excels in history like the true personification of dignity, bravery, purity, and individual excellence." (Opinion of Motley.)

And it would be easy, following the line taken by some biographers, to commemorate the deeds of the patriot by looking at the dates and comparing them with the opinions expressed. Such a procedure would serve the double purpose of expressing gratitude and teaching a lesson that will endure; but I will take the liberty of following another road, and complying with the dictates of my admiration. I will review the determining causes of the legitimate greatness of Washington, and without going into an analysis of his military and civic feats, I shall inquire into the insignificant details of his daily life before he rose to fame and thus gather into a single sheath gratitude and the practical lesson of how the greatness of George Washington was formed. . . . (Here follow several pages of intimate George Washington biography). . . .

AMERICANS ORGANIZE

MEXICAN COMMERCE AND INDUSTRY, published by the American Chamber of Commerce in Mexico City, also dedicated its February, 1932, edition to the Bicentennial. The foreword in this magazine, calling on Americans in Mexico to celebrate, was as follows:

Observance of the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington is an activity of the American Government. It is hoped that every American citizen, at home or abroad, will participate in this event. Hundreds of thousands of American citizens, such as ourselves, are resident in foreign lands. But we, too, will have an opportunity of joining our countrymen at home in honoring the memory of the greatest American in this general commemoration in 1932.

American groups in Mexico have organized and there will be a number of celebrations in observance of the Two Hundredth Anniversary of his Birth—and it is to the Memory of George Washington that this number of MEXICAN COMMERCE AND INDUSTRY is dedicated.

Washington does not belong to any state or to any group of people. He is a national heritage! He belongs to the north as well as to the south, to the west as well as to the east. He belongs to every group of people in America, to every man, woman, and child. For he is truly the "Father of His Country."

In a letter received by the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission from William B. Richardson, president of the American Chamber of Commerce in Mexico City, Mr. Richardson, among other things, said: "I take pleasure in reporting that the American colony in Mexico City worthily celebrated and observed the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington. . . . The Americans in Mexico City enthusiastically paid honor to our first President and I take this occasion of congratulating you for the worthy and patriotic work you have performed."

WOMEN LEAD IN CHIHUAHUA

In Chihuahua, capital and chief city of the Mexican State of the same name, the Bicentennial was celebrated with the aid of the Chihuahua Women's Club, which presented programs at the opening and closing of the celebration period. The first observance, on February 20, 1932, according to Hon. Francis H. Styles, American Consul in Chihuahua, "was very successful and enthusiastically enjoyed. The American colony in Chihuahua and vicinity and their friends attended this gathering in large numbers."

The program consisted of patriotic songs, a sketch of Washington's life by Miss Lillie F. Fox, president of the club, piano and vocal selections from Colonial music collections, presentation of portraits of George Washington to the following American schools: Centro Cristiano, Colegio Palmore, and Colegio Anahuac, and an address, "America's Greatest Son," by Consul Styles, following which the guests enjoyed a typical "Washington Tea Party." Consul Styles began his address as follows:

We Americans in Chihuahua and our friends have met together tonight to pay our respects and homage to George Washington in remembrance of the two hundredth anniversary of his birth. I consider it a pleasure and an honor to have been asked to deliver an address on this occasion. We have all, at different times in our lives listened to a number of speeches on George Washington, and we have all heard his praises sung far and wide ever since we have been old enough to understand. But on this occasion it seems fitting that we go into the activities of the man's life; to examine his exploits in war and his deeds of statesmanship in peace, that we may have a better understanding of what the name of George Washington really means to our country and all its inhabitants. The honor of being called "The Father of His Country," did not come to him because of legendary deeds, but rather because of concrete acts of wisdom and heroism which he performed in establishing our nation and shaping its destiny.

After an account of Washington's life and achievements the Consul continued:

Love for George Washington grew by leaps and bounds. Famous visitors thronged to his home. Mount Vernon was already becoming a shrine.

But this peace and happiness was not to be his for long. During the following year after a few days illness he died, on December 14, 1799. Thus passed from the stage of life, America's greatest son.

George Washington does not belong to any one state or to any one group of people. He is a national heritage. He belongs to the north as well as to the south, to the west as well as to the east. He belongs to every group of people in America, to every man, woman, and child. For he is truly the Father of His Country.

THANKSGIVING IN CHIHUAHUA

The Thanksgiving Day Bicentennial Celebration under the auspices of the Women's Club of Chihuahua was attended, as reported by the club president, Miss Lillie Fox, by "a group of friends, Americans and Mexicans . . . and was a pleasant celebration." President Washington's Thanksgiving Proclamation was read to the assembled guests by Consul Styles and vocal numbers from the days of Washington were featured. A sketch of Thanksgiving, with particular emphasis on Colonial observances of the day, was read and a tableau, "Our Flag," recreated the legendary Betsy Ross incident. The principal feature of the event was the reading of a paper by Miss Fox entitled, "Lest We Forget"—a summary of the characteristics of George Washington, from which the following quotations have been taken:

During the celebration of the Bicentennial of George Washington, we have read about him, talked about him, heard about him, sung about him, seen his pictures in every conceivable age and manner, from postage stamps to paintings, and we feel that our intellectual and social atmospheres have been saturated with him and his times. As the saturation has been so complete, we trust there will be some crystallization that will make finer and richer individual and national characters. This is the first and only Bicentennial of Washington, and ours has truly been a privileged generation. There will be other "Centennials"—2032, 2132—and so on, but our participation will have to be in some other form than physical. Many things we have heard will be forgotten, but some things should always be cherished and emulated.

The simple virtues of honesty, courage, love of the right, love for work, faith in God and his fellow-man, respect for the rights of others, and courtesy are predominant in his character and of the character of every good and honorable citizen.

[Here follows a detailed account of Washington's many virtues as illustrated by his eventful life and words from his own pen.]

We have considered here some of the great qualities of George Washington. He was not a perfect man and perhaps we have idealized him too highly on some points. He made errors and he recognized them as such. He was thoroughly human. He had a great heart and mind filled with a great desire—a great America.

TWO LAREDOS CELEBRATE

Nuevo Laredo, Mexico, and Laredo, Texas, for thirty-four years prior to the Bicentennial year had celebrated in honor of George Washington at colorful annual fiestas. The Bicentennial Year was made the occasion for the thirty-fifth celebration and was termed "the greatest of all." For four days, February 19, 20, 21 and 22, citizens of the United States and their Mexican friends mingled along the border line and in the sister cities in a series of events that made history for the respective communities.

With more than fifteen thousand visitors, undaunted by the cloudy weather, swarming into the twin cities, the celebration was inaugurated by a cantata-tableaux and Washington tree planting under the auspices of the Laredo, Texas, public schools on February 19. February 20 found the two cities in gala holiday attire with the national emblems of the United States and Mexico floating side by side. The day was marked by such events as the massing of flags by the American Legion, the Military Band, the Drum and Bugle Corps from Fort McIntosh, Texas, the Mexican Army and Holding Institute, and a military parade through the principal streets, with a review of the colors at the city hall. Band concerts, rodeos, and "Red Men" ceremonies enlivened the day.

Special Bicentennial religious services were held in all churches on Sunday, February 21, on both sides of the border and feature events including rodeos, horse racing, band concerts, and fireworks were enjoyed in both cities. The most picturesque event of the day was a bull fight in Nuevo Laredo, Mexico, where "fine bred fighting bulls and famed matadors" performed in true Mexican fashion.

SALUTE OF TWENTY-ONE GUNS

The banner day of the celebration, February 22, was ushered in by a salute of twenty-one guns at Fort McIntosh, which echoed in the sister city across the Rio Grande. At 9:30 a. m. the military, federal, county, city, and civic officials assembled at the city hall in Laredo, Texas, formed a procession, and marched to the new International Bridge across the Rio Grande headed by the Fifth United States Cavalry Band and a mounted escort of officers and cavalymen. The procession of the American officials and bands halted within ten feet of the boundary monument. A similar procession of officials from the Mexican side started toward the bridge when the Fifth Cavalry Band finished the playing of "El Himno Nacional," the National Anthem of Mexico. The Mexican delegation advanced toward the monument to the tune of the "Star Spangled Banner," and upon reaching the center of the bridge halted likewise within ten feet of the boundary monument, facing the American delegation.

Each band moved to one side and Mayor Albert Martin, of Laredo, stepped forward and welcomed the Mexican representatives to the Washington Birthday celebration in the following address:

Gentlemen: The people of Laredo whom I have the honor to represent, feel highly honored to have you visit us today, on this occasion of Washington's anniversary, and in their name I give you now the most cordial welcome.

We hope, therefore, that your stay in our city be an agreeable one and that the program of the feasts prepared by the Celebration Committee be satisfying.

In the name of the city of Laredo I give you an affectionate greeting, assuring you that your visit is for us a just reason of satisfaction and honor.

Mayor Amada González Palacios, of Nuevo Laredo, responded to this address with eloquence. Then officers of corresponding rank on the American and Mexican sides of the boundary line stepped forward and shook hands, and General Miguel Orozco Camacho, commander of the Mexican garrison in Nuevo Laredo, representing the President of Mexico, delivered a verbal message in part as follows:

In the name of the President of the Republic, Engineer Pascual Ortiz Rubio, who has conferred upon me the honor of representing him on this occasion when your country celebrates the Bicentenary of the birth of the immortal George Washington, I come to bring a cordial and effusive greeting to the North American nation congratulating you most cordially, for your just and great glories.

To mention Washington is to mention liberty and emancipation, because Washington more than any other man, more than any other hero is a principle of faith, is the doctrine of liberation of the people of America, is the foundation stone of civic rights, to whose force the oppressed nations have appealed in their holy struggles for independence.

Mexico, geographically united to your great nation—Mexico, which is just stanching the bloody wounds of a struggle for liberty, of a struggle for democratic principles—revolutionary Mexico, extends the hand to the United States of North America, in a sincere greeting, and unites with you in the glorification of her heroes. Gentlemen: The Mexican People and Army greet you.

On the part of the American Government, Consul Romeyn Wormuth expressed his satisfaction for the attendance of the Mexican officials, speaking as follows:

Representing our American President, Mr. Hoover, in Nuevo Laredo, and addressing my kind Mexican friends, to whom I have been accredited by him with the approval of President Rubio, and specially authorized to represent him on this important occasion, I feel certain I am voicing the sentiments of President Hoover when I say, welcome, to this great Bicentennial Celebration in honor of the First President of the United States, George Washington.

Long live the two mighty Republics of North America and those who guide their destinies in peace and harmony. May the hands clasped today across this International Bridge be forever clasped in friendship and understanding as warm and enduring as the greeting I have the pleasure to extend to my friend and colleague Alejandro Martínez, Consul of the Republic of Mexico, in Laredo, and his fellow-citizens whom he so worthily represents, and also to General Camacho personal representative of President Rubio, head of a Nation rich in the same traditions of patriotism, heroism and democracy, which have been bequeathed to Mexico and the United States by those noble patriots Hidalgo and Washington.

HANDS ACROSS THE BORDER

After the mutual introduction of all officers of both sides of the border—a ceremony which was a literal expression of the saying, “friendly hands across the border”—the two delegations, with American and Mexican officers of corresponding ranks walking side by side, marched to the city hall in Laredo, Texas.

In the American city the Mexican guests witnessed a ceremony that has been perpetuated since 1898, “the delivering of the key of the city to Pocahontas” by the Mayor of the city.

A great parade, participated in by organizations from both cities, took place at 11:00 a. m. and at noon a national salute of twenty-one guns was fired. Prior to the starting of the parade all of the railroad whistles in both cities were tied down for ten minutes to mark the occasion when, two hundred years before at about that time, George Washington was born.

Rodeos, horse racing, boxing contests, colonial teas, band concerts, basket ball games and other events of similar nature filled out the day. At 8:00 p. m. a Washington Inaugural Pageant, with visiting “ambassadors” from many cities of Texas and northern Mexico in attendance, and a spectacular parade of the nations, with hundreds of brilliantly costumed participants, was staged on an out-door pavilion. Later in the evening a colonial street ball was held, in which hundreds of citizens from both countries and thousands of visitors participated, garbed in picturesque colonial and Spanish costumes.

The newspapers of Laredo, Texas, stated that “all attendance records were smashed” in this great four-day celebration. Consul Wormuth reported that “the celebration was regarded as successful and that it tended to promote good feeling between the two cities.” LA PRENSA, leading Spanish language publication in the vicinity, in an article indicative of the importance attached by the Mexican people to the ceremony at the International Bridge and of the value of this particular event in promoting good will between the two nations, said:

The Washington celebration tightened the ties of friendship between the two cities of Laredo and Neuvo Laredo.

ORIGIN OF AN INTERNATIONAL CUSTOM

George Washington’s Birthday has been celebrated in the “two Laredos” for thirty-five years in a manner that was inaugurated in 1898 by the charter members of the Improved Order of the Yaqui Tribe No. 4, of Texas. With reference to this particular celebration in 1932, and its origin many years ago, Consul Wormuth wrote:

I am enclosing as of possible interest to you a description of one of the celebrations, containing some very interesting recollections, by Mr. Joseph Netzer, who has been chairman of the international committee during practically all of the thirty-five years during which Washington’s Birthday has been celebrated by the two Laredos.

The description, to which the Consul referred, sets forth vividly the origin of this custom and describes the recent happenings. Mr. Netzer’s “recollections” follow:

Early on the morning of February 22, 1898, smeared with the gaudy paint of war and bedecked in full battle regalia a small detachment of savage spies crept stealthily through the narrow side streets of the township of Laredo. Soon there resounded the war-whoop, the blood-curdling yells of the warriors of the tribe as they raced to the attack. Defended by the police, a small company of U. S. troops, and local officials, the Laredo City Hall fairly bristled with adequate resistance and it seemed as if the Red Men were rushing headlong into the valley of Death.

Shots rang out upon the air as the invaders came within range of the rifles. The whiz and sting of arrows convinced the white men that their opposition was earnest and persistent. So the battle raged.

Such valor among the Indian braves of that memorable day is yet unmatched in the annals of America, for not only did they capture the City Hall after a siege of about half an hour, but they were so skillful in the art of open attack that very few of their number were even seriously wounded. On the other hand, they had taken numerous prisoners. Among these were several local policemen, which the Red Men proceeded to hang.

Thus were the beginnings of the first Laredo celebration of George Washington's Birthday which has been perpetuated each year since in the same form and fashion as inaugurated by the Charter Members of the Improved Order of Yaqui Tribe No. 4 of Texas, back in the old days.

With the clearing away of the smoke from the guns fired in the last few seconds of the sham battle, Pocahontas galloped in upon the scene, followed by her escort of Indian maids and young braves mounted on ponies. She raised her hand in protest, all hostilities ceased and the Mayor of the city, with local and State Officials grouped about him, greeted her and presented to her the key to Laredo. After patriotic speeches befitting the occasion of the symbolism of February 22 in the history of America and of the place it holds in the hearts of Americans, the entire company, led by the United States Troops from Ft. McIntosh, formed in parade. The Red Men and Pocahontas with her escort were followed up by attractive floats. On one of them were seated characters dressed in the colonial costume to represent George and Martha Washington, with a typical Uncle Sam standing in the background. Various entertainments including a bull-fight, and athletic games at the U. S. Army Post occupied the afternoon and several days to the conclusion of the festivities.

In those days the population of Laredo was composed of about eighty per cent Mexican and twenty per cent American. All the Mexican holidays were celebrated regularly, and it was our idea that we should inculcate in the minds of the Laredo people the importance of observing American holidays and arouse a patriotic feeling toward America and American institutions.

Having organized a Laredo chapter of the improved Order of Red Men in 1897 and obtained a charter granted to them by the Great Council of Texas. The Great Council of the United States having received their Charter from the United States Congress, it seemed very fitting to this group of charter members that an American holiday should be observed with the proper festivities, and Washington's Birthday was selected by them because of the fact that the Father of Our Country was the first "Great Sachem" or chieftain.

Thus the plans for the occasion were mapped out by a committee composed of Joseph Netzer, I. A. Alexander, Eugene Christen, John Gilligan, A. C. Hamilton, S. N. Johnson, Chas. Mosser, L. R. Ortiz, J. S. Penn, and Chas. Ross.

Pocahontas and her escorts were selected in a meeting of the local tribe of Red Men.

The attack on the City Hall was worked out to perfection, and the committee sent a letter to Congress requesting permission to use the U. S. troops stationed at Fort McIntosh in the parade that was to be held. Although this last procedure is not necessary in the present days, it was at that time—and needless to add—the letter produced the desired result.

It was a great day. We staged a reproduction of the Boston Tea Party on Independent plaza. A Colonial ship was built there and manned with a crew of English sailors. Garbed as Indians like the old Revolutionary fathers were, we battled the seamen, took possession of their craft and threw overboard one big box after another labeled in giant letters "TEA."

In the midst of our riotous attack on the City Hall one of our Indians armed with bow and arrow rushed into the hand-to-hand fighting feverishly, and was met with a discharge from one of the guns that grazed his ear and caused him to fall wounded in the thickest of the battle.

The military ambulance was rushed to the scene, the lad was virtually thrown into it and hurried to the hospital, where he immediately recovered, more frightened than injured from the blank cartridge that was merely fired too close to his head.

One of the men dressed as a policeman was captured by the savages. They, in planning to hang him after the battle, had arranged for him to wear a sort of harness affair across his back under his coat to which a rope was to be tied for suspending him; then the noose was placed around his neck and hooked behind him to his harness rope, so that the horrible joke would be on the crowd of onlookers who would see a hanging, without the terrific after-effects. Well, you can guess the rest—the harness broke. The man dangled from a telephone pole in front of the City Hall with that noose really tightening around his throat, until we finally rescued him in a painfully choked condition. He recovered, but we came very near having a funeral on our hands that day. Comical as it is now in looking back upon the incident, it was quite serious at that time.

From the first Washington's Birthday fiesta to the present day, invitations have been sent out to the President of the United States as well as to Congress; to the Governor of Texas and to the State Legislature. Many prominent Senators and Representatives of the United States, as well as government officials of Texas, have attended the celebration from time to time and have been present in the assemblage of officials, when the Mayor of Laredo performs the ceremony of turning over the same key, that Joseph Netzer ordered made for the first occasion in 1898, to the Pocahontas as she entered and was greeted in the name of the city. S. G. Moore, who was Great Sachem of the Order of Red Men in Texas, was among the speakers at the first commemoration.

The first observation of February 22 initiated the Mexicans of Laredo into the manner of proper celebration and although they did not participate in that primary ceremony, they have formed a part of each one held since then.

On the morning of that appointed day the military and civic officials on this side of the Rio Grande marched in a body to the middle of the International Bridge where is located a monument which marks the boundary line between the two nations. They are met there by the military and civic officers of Nuevo Laredo, the city across the river. Speeches of felicitation are made, after which the friends from Mexico are escorted to their seats of honor as guests on that occasion. It is indeed a holiday that is looked forward to with as much enthusiasm by the native Mexicans of the Laredo vicinity as by the native born Americans.

IN CHIHUAHUA AND JUAREZ

Ten minutes' journey from El Paso, Texas, is Ciudad Juarez in Mexico. Reports from Hon. William P. Blocker, American Consul there, indicate that for the most part the residents of the city are accustomed to journey to El Paso to join with the people there in George Washington celebrations.

But in 1932 there were two bicentennial celebrations worthy of note in that consular district, the first of which occurred near the city of Chihuahua.

There, the consul reported, is a colony of the Mormon Church. It is customary for this colony to celebrate in honor of George Washington each year on his birthday. The two hundredth anniversary was made "a particularly outstanding event." Many of the Mormons are Mexican citizens and they entered into the spirit of the day with enthusiasm equal to that displayed by the American citizens in their midst.

The second celebration occurred on September 16, 1932, when Consul Blocker was the guest of the Ciudad Juarez Rotary Club. The report submitted by the Consul regarding this event points out that "the day was both the regular meeting of the club and the Independence Day of Mexico. Much time was devoted to the patriotic part of the program, speeches being made on Mexican heroes."

The American Consul in his address "recalled the fact that Washington, Hidalgo, and Bolívar were the fathers not only of the independence of their respective countries, but in reality of all the North,

MRS. J. N. GODDARD, AS "MARTHA WASHINGTON,"
AND MR. WILLIAM POLE, AS "GEORGE WASHINGTON," AT THE BICENTENNIAL CELEBRATION IN CHIHUAHUA, MEXICO.

Central, and South American republics, and that the seeds of liberty were first sowed by them."

Continuing his report, the Consul says:

The Independence Day of Mexico was a most fitting time to present to the Rotary Club, to hang at the left of the portrait of Hidalgo, a portrait of the Father of my Country and a co-patriot of the great Mexican priest who first rang the bells of liberty in Mexico.

I mentioned that in my country we were devoting the year to a Bicentennial Celebration doing homage to our liberator, General George Washington, and that it made the occasion doubly distinguished to present the Club with a portrait of General Washington.

I concluded by stating that the portrait was a gift from the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission to the Club. Lic. Mario Somohano Flores, president of the Ciudad Juarez Rotary Club, accepted the portrait with a short but beautifully worded reply to my remarks, and ordered that it be hung in the presence of the members of the Club, by the side of the portrait of Hidalgo in the luncheon room.

HONORED IN VERA CRUZ

Through the Masonic Lodges and the United States Consulate in Vera Cruz, Mexico's port city on the Atlantic, the Washington Bicentennial message was heralded to a representative group of that city's populace.

On February 22, 1932, the consulate was closed and the Stars and Stripes flown in honor of the day. The organized Masons of the city invited Hon. William Karnes, American Vice-Consul, to appear before them on the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of North America's most illustrious Mason, George Washington, and eulogize his name.

Consul Karnes accepted the invitation, and stressed in his address the fact that Masonic lodges throughout the world were commemorating this American hero and in that fact alone lay not only a testimony of his greatness, but a powerful agency for world brotherhood.

PORTRAITS UNVEILED IN DURANGO

In Durango, capital of the State of Durango and site of one of Mexico's famous cathedrals, literature relating to the bicentennial was distributed to Mexican schools, many of which, according to Hon. Ellis A. Bonnet, American Consul, manifested a marked interest in the life of George Washington.

The American women of Durango celebrated the opening of the celebration with a George Washington tea on February 22.

A reproduction of the famous Stuart Athenaeum portrait of Washington, sent to Durango by the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission, was made the object of a special unveiling ceremony at the June graduation exercises in the Instituto MacDonnell, a school in Durango operated under patronage of United States citizens. A similar portrait was hung with appropriate ceremony at the consulate, on July 4, 1932.

PROGRAM IN MONTERREY

The Rotary Club of Monterrey, Mexico, according to the report of Hon. Edward I. Nathan, American Consul, "devoted its entire session of February 18, 1932, to the celebration of the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington."

In addition to the regular members, among whom are a number of Americans, the club had invited numerous honor guests, including the foreign consular corps and the teachers of the American School. A chorus of pupils of the school, two of whom were in costumes of the Continental period, sang the Mexican and American National Anthems.

There were three addresses, two delivered by Mexicans in Spanish, and the other by Consul Nathan. Mr. Nathan's speech was brief and confined to a general estimate of the character of the First President of the United States and the esteem in which he is held by the people of that country which proudly and affectionately calls him "Father."

Professor Andrés Osuna, Director of Public Instruction for the State of Nuevo León, gave an excellent biographical summary of General Washington. He was followed by the final speaker, Lic. Virgilio Garza, an attorney of Monterrey, who spoke on "Washington's Influence on Latin America."

An elaborate three-color program was printed for the occasion in Spanish, bearing a likeness of George Washington and the flags of Mexico and the United States. EL SOL, a local daily paper, gave considerable prominence to the event in its issue of the following day.

TWO EVENTS AT TAMPICO

"Two commemorative celebrations were outstanding in the Tampico, Mexico, observance of the Bicentennial Celebration," wrote Hon. Walter P. McConaughy, American Vice Consul, in his report to the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission, "and both of these observances were held on February 22, 1932."

First was that of the American School in Tampico. Americans are instructors in this school and virtually all the American children in the city attend the institution. On the two hundredth anniversary of George Washington's birth a memorable ceremony was held at the school. This took the form of an historical pageant, supplemented by original declamations lauding the memory of Washington.

In the words of Vice Consul McConaughy, "the event was of special value in that it was actively participated in by the students themselves, and was prepared largely at their own initiative; thus it is no doubt true that the memory of the occasion is indelibly imprinted on the memory of each of the students present. Adults were invited to this ceremony and, it is said, were deeply impressed thereby."

The second Washington event of the day was a private observance under the auspices of Tampico Lodge No. 10 F. and A. M. Vice Consul McConaughy and other members of the American colony participated in this service, which emphasized the fraternal life of the Great American and the far-reaching influence his good name gave to the organizations to which he belonged.

CLUB PROGRAM IN GUADALAJARA

In Guadalajara there was an observance of the Bicentennial by an English Speaking Club, "composed mostly of Mexicans," according to the report of the American Consul in that city, Hon. Raleigh A. Gibson.

The February meeting of the club was made a George Washington Bicentennial Celebration and the speeches on that occasion were all devoted to the life of the First President of the United States and to eulogies of his character and expressions of good will to the country he founded.

PORTUGAL

IN PORTUGAL the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington was celebrated with a notable reception at the American Legation in Lisbon. The Prime Minister and other high officials of the Portuguese Government were present and joined with members of the American colony and the legation staff in paying honor to the memory of the First President of the United States. The Bicentennial Celebration also attracted the attention of the Portuguese newspapers, which published numerous biographical and historical articles about George Washington and the early history of the United States.

Hon. J. G. South, the American Minister, and Mrs. South were the hosts at the Bicentennial reception, which was held on February 22. In his report to the Department of State, Mr. South said:

I have the honor to report that, in commemoration of the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington, I gave a reception at the Legation yesterday, which was attended by the Prime Minister, the Acting Minister of Foreign Affairs, most of the other Ministers of State, their staffs and aides, the Military Governor of Lisbon, the Civil Governor of Lisbon, the ranking officers of the Army and Navy, the officials of the Ministry for Foreign Affairs, the members of the Diplomatic Corps, the American Colony and the wives and families of the foregoing.

The plans for the observance of the George Washington Bicentennial in Portugal aroused the interest of members of the foreign diplomatic corps in Lisbon, and especially of the Brazilian Ambassador, Dr. José Bonifacio de Andrada e Silva, who wrote to Mr. South at Lisbon on February 21 as follows:

Three years ago, in an article about my father-in-law the Councilor Lafayette Rodrigues Pereira, jurist and statesman, I published a letter he wrote in 1902 about the personality of George Washington, first President of your great nation.

On the occasion of the 200th birthday anniversary of the ever-remembered founder of the glorious Federation of North America, I have great pleasure in remitting to your Excellency the translation of the said letter, thus associating myself to the homage paid throughout the country to the memory of that venerable figure of American history.

The letter above referred to was included in an article published in the JORNAL DO COMMERCIO, of Rio de Janeiro, on January 6, 1929, under the following caption: "Lafayette Rodrigues Pereira—His Admiration for General Washington, by Dr. José Bonifacio de Andrada e Silva, Federal Deputy, now Brazilian Ambassador to Portugal." Mr. South sent the article to the Department of State, and it is here reprinted:

Lafayette Rodrigues Pereira had the deepest reverence for General George Washington, whom he considered the most perfect of heroes, a great benefactor of his country, full of patriotism and kindness, most righteous and deeply wise. With reference to this great man, founder of the powerful Nation of North America, Lafayette Rodrigues Pereira wrote the following letter to Cesario Alvim, in 1902:

"Rio de Janeiro, December 2, 1902.

"My dear Alvim: According to my promise I herewith remit to you a tin containing a handful of earth and a small stone taken from the tomb of General George Washington in Mount Vernon.

"These are, for me, most sacred objects, for they have been for many years in contact with the hero's remains, and have thus absorbed something of them.

"Antiquity would have made the General a demi-god. Romulus and Theseus were counted amongst the demi-gods for having founded Rome and Athens. Well, consider the deeds of Washington: He made his country's independence—the independence was practically the exclusive product of his genius and perseverance. The colonies, during the campaign, came nigh losing heart and accepting the political status later granted to Canada. He was the principal collaborator and inspirer of the Federal Constitution of 1787, 'practical reason's most beautiful conception,' as Lord Chatham called it in the English Parliament.

"A most wise Constitution for the people it was made for, but absolutely inapplicable to the Latin Race—as proved by the attempts at servile and ridiculous imitations ('o imitatores, servum pecus!') by the Latin peoples of both Americas. During eight years of government Washington taught his nation to love and apply the Constitution, and he founded by the Potomac the city that bears his name and is today one of the most beautiful in the world.

"What hero, ancient or modern, ever did as much? But that is not all. George Washington is the true founder of political liberty in modern times. The French Revolution owes its best and most generous inspirations to the American Revolution.

"Once Napoleon, wishing to flatter General Lafayette, said: 'General, you were present at the great battles in America.' To which the General replied: 'They were not great battles, Sire; they were small encounters, but on them depended the liberty of the world.'

"Washington is, perhaps, the most perfect, the most complete, the strongest representative of human personality. He possessed an indomitable energy in the execution of his purpose—something that reminds one of the obstinacy and tenacity of Cato. His powerful, solid and wonderfully balanced intellectual faculties gave him that power of genius the ancients called wisdom, viz., the faculty of finding the most just, practical and useful solutions for the most intricate complications in governing the State, for the greatest difficulties in private life. No one, so much as he, possessed that gift.

"He was modest—of that simple, sincere modesty peculiar to really superior men, clearly and deeply conscious of human weakness. When, in 1788, he came for his inauguration as President he was received at the Hudson River, opposite New York, in a gilt galleon manned by thirteen oarsmen, representing the thirteen States then forming the Union. During the crossing the guns of the national fleet and those of the foreign men-of-war anchored in the river, thundered their salvos; the men of the national and foreign merchants ships climbed the rigging and raised loud cheers. Five days later the General, writing to a friend in Alexandria, said that in the galleon he felt his soul overwhelmed by a feeling of deep humility, considering himself incapable of fulfilling such great expectations.

"Consider now the immaculate virtues that with a divine light, in public and private life, lit up the countenance of the great nation's noble founder. His iron will, one of the great forces of his soul, was ever at his country's service.

"It is difficult to find a man in history whose patriotism was more vigorous, deeper or more enlightened. He had only one passion—the love of his Country. And what self-denial! Victorious, triumphant, founder of the Nation, master of the blind, unanimous confidence of his fellow-citizens; armed by events and by victory, as well as by his virtues; of unlimited faculties, chief of an heroic army entirely devoted to him—he enters the hall of Congress in Annapolis, divests himself of his formidable power and hands it to men whose sole strength is the representative character invested in them. To these he said that upon leaving that hall he would return to the condition of a simple private man.

"What ancient hero, or modern one, has ever given proof so eloquent of the pureness of his intentions and of respect towards the liberties of his Country? Truly in Washington's great personality history gives us perchance the first example of a successful, victorious hero, devoid of the smallest particle of personal ambition.

"He is the hero of heroes. Alexander was more graceful and had more charm; Hannibal possessed more strategy and tactics; Caesar more elegance and eloquence; Frederick the Great more swiftness and action; Napoleon more brilliancy and flame. But Washington was the greatest of them all; for he possessed, to a degree much higher than theirs, respect for the rights of man, a deep sentiment of humanity, a patriotism purer, sincerer, more vigorous; and he had much more wisdom in government.

"During my visit to the United States I had the opportunity of observing that the American people give an intense and ardent devotion to this great man. The General's memory soars above the cities, farms, factories and workshops, as a heavenly blessing. That memory is in truth the link that binds in one unit, in one great people, those numerous and diverse populations—even more, perhaps, than their political institutions.

"I too made pilgrimage to Mount Vernon, the Mecca of Americans. It is the farm where the General lived and died. It lies on the right bank of the Potomac on slightly elevated ground. The building has something grand about it, but its architecture and surroundings recall some of our large farms. The property exists with all its land just as when owned by the great citizen. It belongs to the Mount Vernon Ladies Association of the Union and is administered by them. It is kept with the furniture and household objects of the hero's time. There I saw the bed and mattress on which he died; the trunk he used during the campaign of Independence, a large raw-leather one, with the date 1775 on the top; the coat and breeches in which he was inaugurated in 1788; and many volumes in the library signed "George Washington" in strong, clear hand; on a wall, horizontally fastened, the General's fowling piece, a flint gun; beside it a powder horn, already shabby, similar to those used by our compatriots.

"In a small field between the house and the river, and on the esplanade in front of the building, there are many leafy and thick trees, oaks, acacias, magnolias, nearly all planted by the hero.

"Washington was one of the greatest farmers in Virginia; he owned about 400 slaves whom he treated very kindly. He planted mostly wheat and tobacco. I was shown an empty barrel used to carry wheat; on it were branded the initials 'G. W.' He managed his farm with the zeal, order and strictness peculiar to his character, respecting religiously the limits of his neighbors, but allowing no one to encroach upon his land.

"Washington lived his last days in this beautiful mansion, surrounded by the respect, esteem and admiration of his fellow citizens and foreigners. Louis Philippe, afterward King of France, visited him there in 1798, and returned touched with respect for the simplicity and moral greatness of the man.

"He had returned to private life, but in truth he was still the highest representative of the strength and will of his country. In his private condition he promoted the Congress of Philadelphia, which decreed the Constitution; and he did so by private letters to the Governors of the States. One may say he called that famous assembly. Having finished with such happy success so many and prodigious works, he rested under the shade of his trees quietly, with the serenity of one who had done his duty nobly. Is not that the image of the greatest happiness to which a patriot can aspire?

"Guizot said of Washington that he was the happiest and most honorable of heroes. And with these words I shall close this letter. All that could be said is here included; it is no more than the repetition of things known; but in a conversation, written though it be, it is good to revolve the memory of things past, especially for us who live in times when the great ideals of humanity are considered either as the dreams of a lunatic, or as the refinements of consummate hypocrisy.

"To end, let me tell you how it pleases me to write to you of Washington today, December 2, Birthday anniversary of our own compatriot, whom history will rank among the most illustrious and deserving sovereigns of his century, for his admirable moral character, his unfailing patriotism, and for the wisdom and justice with which he executed the functions of Chief of the Constitutional State. Your old friend and colleague,

"LAFAYETTE."

This is a document which shows us the figure of Washington and the tribute which this Brazilian jurist and statesman paid to a life so rich in patriotism.

In the phrases, so sincere and full of feeling, with which he refers to the founder of the great Republican Nation, one feels the strength of a civic sentiment, deeply rooted in moral virtues, that should be followed. The lives of these great men are beautiful and precious examples that the present generation should study with perseverance and attention, for the good of the Country—the better to serve it.

MADEIRA

MADEIRA, Portuguese island 350 miles off the coast of northwest Africa, toasted George Washington with its famous wine and bore testimony to his universal greatness in speeches by its leading citizens who expressed themselves at a George Washington reception in Funchal on February 22, 1932. The reception was given by the American Consul, J. F. Huddleston, and Mrs. Huddleston, at the Casino Victoria. Consul Huddleston reports that more than 150 persons were present including the Civil Governor of Madeira and Madame Cabaco, the Military Governor, Lieut. Colonel Seyulveda Henriques, and his aide, the President of the municipality, the Captain of the Port, the President of the Chamber of Commerce, other Portuguese officials and their families, consuls of other countries and all Americans known to be in Funchal.

DIARIO DA NOTICIAS, Funchal newspaper, speaks of the affair as one of "great brilliance," the rooms of the Casino being "artistically decorated with flowers and with flags of America and Portugal, the tea having taken place in an atmosphere of highest distinction."

DIARIO DA MADEIRA adds a note in its report that "the reception began with the playing of the American and Portuguese national anthems, heard standing by the select guests, refreshments being later served with the distribution of small American flags to the guests. . . . All of the guests left the Casino Victoria charmed by the courtesies of the Consuls of the United States who were much complimented."

MOZAMBIQUE

MOZAMBIQUE, or Portuguese East Africa, through its public authorities and cosmopolitan populace was "well disposed toward showing its sympathy with a friendly Power and did what it could to join in the world-wide celebration of the Bicentennial." So says the American Consul at Lourenço Marques, Hon. Alfred D. Cameron.

The climate in the capital city of Mozambique during February, which is mid-summer in Africa, was so hot that any extensive celebration on Washington's Two Hundredth Birthday was considered out of the question; but to mark the anniversary Consul Cameron ordered a large American flag unfurled over the Consulate to signify to all passers-by that an important day in the history of the United States of America was being commemorated.

During the winter, however, on July 4, 1932, there was held at the Consulate in Lourenço Marques an Independence Day-Washington reception. Consul Cameron reported:

In honor of this occasion every one of the civil and military departments sent a representative to attend the function. Some five or six heads of Departments broke precedents by calling in person. There was also complete attendance of the Consular Corps, of representatives of American firms and of American tourists who happened to be in town. More than forty officials and prominent business men paid their respects.

In the spring, on November 24, 1932, the Bicentennial was brought to a close in Mozambique with the holding of a sumptuous Thanksgiving Day-Washington banquet at the Polana Hotel in Lourenço Marques. The guests of honor at this affair were the Secretary General of the Colonial Government and Mrs. Malheiros and the Union Consul General (Dean of the Consular Corps) and Mrs. Steyn. When the name of George Washington was toasted the guests arose and with genuine sincerity proclaimed their respect for the Great American.

URUGUAY

URUGUAY has always held George Washington in high esteem and on every appropriate occasion has honored his memory. It is not surprising to learn, therefore, that in the capital city of Montevideo, as well as in the cities of Durazno, Colonia, and Paysandú—the capitals of the respective Departments of those names—there are streets named “Washington.”

In the Celebration of the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington in 1932, the Government and citizens of Uruguay participated with enthusiasm. Public events were held in honor of George Washington; the school children paid tribute to his memory; and the newspapers of the country editorialized on the significance of the Bicentennial Celebration and reported in detail all Bicentennial exercises which took place.

As a forerunner of the Bicentennial Celebration, at the commencement exercises held on December 3, 1931, at the Estados Unidos de America School in Montevideo, Hon. J. Butler Wright, American Minister to Uruguay, presented to the school a George Washington portrait. The picture—a copy of the Gilbert Stuart Athenaeum portrait—was furnished by the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission.

Dr. Juan Carlos Blanco, Uruguayan Minister for Foreign Affairs, gave a luncheon on February 22, 1932, to commemorate the Two Hundredth Anniversary of George Washington's Birth. American Minister Wright was guest of honor. Present also at the luncheon were: the President of the National Assembly, the President of the Supreme Court, three members of the National Council of Administration, the Minister of Public Works, the Uruguayan Minister to the United States, representatives of the Departments of War and Marine, and officers of the Foreign Office.

The luncheon was featured by two speeches, one by Dr. Blanco, and the other by Minister Wright. A translated summary of Dr. Blanco's remarks follows:

The day which we have the honor to celebrate by this meeting of various representatives of the Uruguayan Government commemorates the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of one whose name is imperishably written not only upon the annals of the history of the United States, but also of the world.

Founder of republican government and first exponent of the principles of democracy, it is eminently just and proper that his name should claim the homage of the Government and people of Uruguay.

We cannot forget that when Artigas, the liberator of our country, suffered the reverses attendant upon his campaign for similar principles, he was offered refuge in the United States.

I have therefore the honor to convey to the President of the United States, through His Excellency Mr. Wright, who represents his country with ability and dignity, our most sincere felicitations upon the celebration of this memorable anniversary.

Minister Wright replied in an extemporaneous address expressing the appreciation of the government of the United States for this unusual demonstration on the part of the Uruguayan government. Mr. Wright closed his short address with an expression of confidence that friends of the United States would ever realize that the actions of our government were still actuated by the high precepts formulated and enunciated by George Washington; that his tenets had been, and would ever be, among the most valued principles of government in the Western Hemisphere.

THREE RADIO PROGRAMS ON FEBRUARY 22

On the same day, three programs in commemoration of George Washington's Birthday were broadcast from Montevideo radio stations. The first program was held under the auspices of the Association of Professors of Montevideo. Minister Wright delivered the main address in Spanish. The Director of the University and other professors also made short addresses. A translation of Mr. Wright's address, in which he quoted Daniel Webster, John Marshall, Calvin Coolidge and portions of Washington's Farewell Address, follows:

It is indeed a pleasure to greet by this means and on this day friends of the United States in Uruguay, a country which I have already visited four times—first in the year 1913.

I have had the honor, pleasure and privilege to be today the recipient of a manifestation of the high officials of the government of your country in celebration of this memorable two hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington, by which I have been profoundly moved. But let it not be believed that I have for one moment interpreted this gracious gesture toward my country and this charming courtesy toward myself in any other terms than a tribute to that man whose memorable and successful struggle for the triumph of the rights of people and the full enjoyment of the privileges of democratic government causes his name to be imperishably written upon the hearts of all those who love liberty, equality and justice.

On a previous occasion, I ventured to refer, in translation, to the homage paid to the memory of Washington by three public men of my country—Daniel Webster, Chief Justice Marshall, and President Coolidge, and to translate three paragraphs from the farewell address of President Washington when he declined to accept reelection for the third time. These sentiments appear so particularly applicable to this day and have such wide international significance—especially in the sympathetic atmosphere of the relations between Uruguay and the United States, that I shall venture to repeat them here:

"That name, descending with all time, spreading over the whole earth, and uttered in all languages belonging to the tribes and races of men, will forever be pronounced with affectionate gratitude by everyone in whose breast there shall arise an aspiration for human rights and human liberty."—Daniel Webster.

"More than any other individual, and as much as to one individual was possible, has he contributed to found this, our widespreading empire, and to give to the Western World independence and freedom."—John Marshall, Chief Justice of the United States.

"Wherever there are those who love ordered liberty, they may well join in the observance of that event. Although he belongs to us, yet by being a great American he became a great world figure."—ex-President Coolidge.

"Respect for its authority, compliance with its laws, acquiescence in its measures, are duties enjoined by the fundamental maxims of true liberty. The basis of our political systems is the right of the people to make and to alter their constitutions of government. But by an explicit and authentic act of the whole people is sacredly obligatory upon all. The very idea of the power and the right of the people to establish government presupposes the duty of every individual to obey the established government."—Farewell Address.

"Observe good faith and justice toward all nations. Cultivate peace and harmony with all. Religion and morality enjoin this conduct. And can it be that good policy does not equally enjoin it?"—Farewell Address.

"In the execution of such a plan nothing is more essential than that permanent, inveterate antipathies against particular nations and passionate attachments for others should be excluded, and that in place of them just and amicable feelings toward all should be cultivated. The nation which indulges toward another an habitual hatred or an habitual fondness is in some degree a slave. It is a slave to its animosity or to its affection, either of which is sufficient to lead it astray from its duty and its interest. Antipathy in one nation against another disposes each more readily to offer insult and injury, to lay hold of slight causes of umbrage, and to be haughty and intractable when accidental or trifling occasions of dispute occur."—Farewell Address.

WASHINGTON EXTOLLED

Later in the afternoon of February 22, Mr. Benjamin Muse, First Secretary of the United States Legation, delivered a brief address from the "Monte Carlo" broadcasting station—a station which specializes in cultural programs on notable anniversaries in the history of the two Americas.

The following is a translation of the remarks in full made by Mr. Muse on the occasion:

Two hundred years ago today George Washington, the great (patriot) of the North American nation, the "Father of his Country," was born. It will be the occasion in the United States for a demonstration of homage to a national hero unequalled in our history. A Commission, set up by Congress, has been engaged in formulating the plans and making the arrangements for this great celebration, which in my country is not only for today, but to last for a period of nine months, beginning today and ending with the North American Thanksgiving Day, next November. Today marks the beginning, therefore, in the United States of an extraordinary demonstration in which schools, colleges, churches, newspapers and organizations of every kind will take part throughout the length and breadth of the land.

In the United States Washington is in a very real sense our national hero. He is our ideal American. His character is lauded in schools throughout the country in numberless addresses, in thousands of books, and tens of thousands of articles. He has been the subject of over 400 biographies, and his letters and papers fill thousands of printed pages. There is hardly a child in the United States above ten years of age who has not a vivid impression of Washington and what he stands for.

Washington's reputation as a general rests upon a firm basis. It is true that he was repeatedly defeated in the field, but usually only when the odds in numbers, discipline and equipment were against him. In a country devoid of good roads, where the ocean and its innumerable tributaries had always provided the chief means of communication, he had to contend with an enemy who usually had complete control of the water, and, when at last with the aid of the French, that control was challenged, he struck the blow which ended our War of Independence. In the victorious Yorktown campaign and in the retreat through New Jersey he displayed military qualities of a very high order: the Trenton-Princeton campaign was brilliant.

Washington's statesmanship was also of a very high order. As the first President of the United States a responsibility fell to his lot which was shared by few of his successors. He had to take a very important part in launching the new Government, in breathing life into the Constitution and in giving to the office of the Chief Executive needed vigor and strength. The organization of the new government, the establishment of the bank and the creation of the cabinet were achievements of the highest order.

Those who were closely associated with him, from the slaves to his generals or the members of his cabinet, revered him as a man, a soldier, statesman and patriot. His patience, his courage, his tenacity of purpose, were understood and admired by his contemporaries. We sense this admiration in his choice as President of the Constitutional Convention, in the weight his advice carried in the ratifying of the Constitution, in the universal demand that he be the first President of the United States, in the nation's grief at his death.

Above all it was Washington's character, which was supremely great, which was responsible for the greatness of his achievements. In the Revolution it was the trust in Washington which held together a faltering and discouraged people, which tided the country over the darkest hours, which was responsible for the eventual victory. After peace had been won it was this trust in Washington which made it possible for a disunited people to attain enduring strength and unity. His memory will always remain a sacred legacy to the North American people.

I am deeply appreciative of the sentiments of friendship for my country and respect for our national hero which my colleagues in this ceremony have been so kind as to express.

We associate the name of Washington with those of Artigas, Bolívar, San Martín and the other great heroes who share the glory of the emancipation of our America and your participation in this ceremony is a source of deep satisfaction to us.

The third George Washington radio program held on February 22 was sponsored by the Patriotic Association of Uruguay. Several speeches were made in praise of George Washington, and the Vice President of the Association, Señor Nelso García Serrato, read a letter which the Association addressed to the Pan-American Union in honor of the occasion.

RECEPTION AT AMERICAN LEGATION

In the evening of Washington's birthday, Minister and Mrs. Wright, together with officials of the American Association of Uruguay, gave a reception at the American Legation at which were present approximately 350 people including officials of the Uruguayan government, members of the Diplomatic Corps, leading Uruguayan citizens and members of the foreign colonies, especially British and American.

The Bicentennial Celebration continued in full swing on February 23 and 24. On February 23, the Rotary Club of Montevideo held a luncheon in honor of the memory of George Washington with a record-breaking attendance. Present at the luncheon were the members of the United States Legation staff, the Consul General and the President of the American Association. Speeches were made by Sr. Dr. Jacobo Varela, Uruguayan Minister to Washington, Dr. Raúl E. Baechtgen, and Minister Wright. The address of Minister Varela follows:

Gentlemen:

States, cities, seventy mountains and rivers, bear the name of Washington. In the capital of the United States rises an obelisk higher than that of Rameses II. There is a statue of Washington in London, in Paris, in Buenos Aires, in many other cities. Lloyd George has called him the founder of the British Empire because he showed how the colonies ought not to be governed. Lafayette, on sending to him the gift without an equal to a republican—the key to the Bastille—said that it was his doctrines that had torn down this stronghold of autocracy.

His spirit again walks upon the earth and has perpetuated itself in the times. As we see him today, two hundred years after his birth, so also will he be admired by the men who may be living in the millenium of his birth. Always there will be told the story of the child who could not tell a lie, the story of the cherry tree; the early ventures and thoughts of the young man; the hazardous deeds of the hero, great in victory and indomitable in adversity during those endless, sad nights at Valley Forge; the august serenity of the twilight of his life. His purity, his equanimity, will shine forth, mingled with those contradictory attributes of the gods—supreme justice and understanding sympathy. More than remembrance of the man, Washington will remain a symbol of our epoch even when our western civilization may have been replaced by a new cycle of human culture.

The patient investigations of a generation of historians who have sought the truth instead of legendary tradition, have left few stones unturned. The greatness of Washington is such that it has resisted the analysis of an epoch that has examined it minutely but found only the most imperceptible veins in the eternal marble of this great man. Behind the portraits in the style of Epinal, like a painting of an old master under a modern imitation, appears the formidable MAN whom Jefferson described more than a hundred years ago. Six feet tall and of athletic build, he was first in war because he was strongest and most capable. He was first in peace because he was magnanimous to the conquered and had the fine courtesy to invite Lord Cornwallis to dinner, after the surrender at Yorktown. He conquered his enemies and himself also. His detractors blame him that before settling down he liked an easy life, wine, and that he was terrible in his anger. But that places the touch of humanity on his glorious majesty, which will shine forever in his achievement that has no equal—the creation of the great republic that is his monument and its doctrines which he formulated in his Farewell Address and which are the basis and guide of its people in the hour of their supreme decisions.

Mr. Minister of the United States, Butler Wright; we all know your own brilliant career and the great success you have had in your diplomatic missions. But I am moved to say there must be few times when you have experienced deeper satisfaction than when you see the unanimous veneration which your great patriot inspires in a people who encompass all beliefs and ideas and consequently are not always unanimous, but who are one in honoring the nobility, the achievements, and the warm heart of one of the highest types of the human race—George Washington.

The American Association of Uruguay devoted its bi-weekly luncheon on February 24, to a commemoration of the Bicentennial of Washington's birth. There was an unusually large attendance, including not only citizens of the United States, but also Uruguayan and British citizens.

The friendliness of the Uruguayan press to the Bicentennial Celebration was notable in the large numbers of clippings which reached the offices of the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission. All Uruguayan newspapers, without exception, published friendly allusions to the event; and such leading newspapers as EL DIA, LA MANANA, EL PLATA, EL DIARIO, and EL IMPARCIAL, devoted many columns to eulogies and photographs of George Washington and to accounts of the Bicentennial Celebration in Uruguay.

AMERICANS HONOR HERO OF URUGUAY

In reciprocation for the manifestation of Uruguayan friendship toward the United States as evidenced in the Bicentennial events on February 22, 23, and 24, the American Association of Uruguay, on June 19, the birthday of the Uruguayan national hero, General José Cervasio Artigas, held ceremonies at the Artigas Monument in Plaza Independencia of Montevideo.

One hundred and fifty children from the Estados Unidos School participated, singing the Uruguayan National anthem at the opening of the ceremonies and closing the event with the singing of the "Star Spangled Banner." A military band was furnished by the Uruguayan authorities. Approximately 1,000 people gathered at the Artigas Monument to witness the ceremony. Every reference by the speakers to Uruguayan-American friendship was greeted with applause. Mr. Wright opened the ceremony with the following remarks:

It is our privilege today to pay tribute to the memory of a great patriot who, together with those other heroes of the Americas of whom all citizens thereof are justly proud, dedicated his life to the cause of liberty.

This year also commemorates the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of an American liberator whom my compatriots—with deep affection—term the Father of his Country and who, I may say with pride and pleasure, is acclaimed by the other countries of our Americas as the leader in the struggle for independence and democracy.

The interpretation of this sentiment in Uruguay has been so felicitous—taking the form of gracious courtesy by the Minister of Foreign Affairs, the generous tributes rendered by the press, and the interest evidenced by the citizens of this republic as expressed through the far-reaching channels of the radio—that my fellow-citizens resident in Uruguay have been eager to claim the privilege of expressing in some tangible form their appreciation of those courtesies as well as their homage to the greatest man in Uruguayan history.

It would be unseemly for me to claim a pleasure which properly belongs to the president of the association of my fellow countrymen resident in Uruguay who will now address you and who, acting in behalf of all of us, will place upon the tomb of this your most distinguished citizen, a tribute of appreciation and respect. I am, however, so fortunate as to claim the honor of assuring you of the sincerity with which the people of the country of Washington salute the citizens of the land of Artigas.

MINISTER OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS SPEAKS

Mr. Phillip West, President of the American Association, laid the wreath on behalf of the Society and Dr. Juan Carlos Blanco, Uruguayan Minister of Foreign Affairs, responded with a short address on behalf of his government in appreciation of this friendly American gesture. A translation of Dr. Blanco's remarks follows:

The homage which the people of the United States of America are today paying to Artigas in the person of the representative of that country will be profoundly appreciated by all the citizens of the republic.

It was the Government of the United States of America, in fact, which offered to Artigas, in defeat, its generous hospitality, together with the honors of his rank, a rare distinction conferred by that people, who perceived even from that great distance the greatness of soul and the idealism of our national hero.

Through the years the friendship between the countries of Washington and of Artigas has endured.

This ceremony has a high significance—children, youth, womanhood—the flower of the country, participate in this homage and tribute.

We receive with gratitude the flowers which call to our minds the glorious memory of the past and which speak to us of the present friendship between two nations each of which, in its own sphere, represents the ideals of democracy. I have heard with great pleasure the words of the Hon. J. Butler Wright and those of Mr. West, president of the American Association, and in the name of the President of the Republic I thank them cordially and I reciprocate their sentiments.

LAST BICENTENNIAL EVENT

The last Bicentennial ceremony held in Uruguay took place on November 22, 1932. The Bolivarian Society of Uruguay, an institution maintained for the purpose of furthering intellectual and cultural relations between Uruguay and the United States, sponsored the program which was held in the Public Assembly Hall of the University of Montevideo.

Present at the ceremonies were officials of the government of Uruguay and the United States, contingents of cadets from the Uruguay Military and Naval Schools, students from the Crandon Institute, an American School for Girls, and a large representative audience.

The proceedings of the meeting were broadcast by radio. The President of the Society, Dr. Miguel Paez Formoso, presided. The secretary of the society, Dr. Hugh O'Neill Guerra, delivered an address devoted to the political and private life of George Washington. American Minister Wright closed the program with the following remarks:

No representative of the United States of America could fail to be deeply inspired by this tribute so generously paid to the memory of George Washington—an homage to a man whose memorable and successful struggle for the triumph of the rights of peoples and the full enjoyment of the privileges of democratic government has caused his name to be imperishably written upon the hearts of all who love liberty, equality and justice.

I therefore welcome this opportunity of expressing my appreciative gratitude for the gracious homage paid by the Uruguayan Government, its institutions, press and citizens, during the course of the present year, which marks the two hundredth anniversary of his birth.

It is thus under particularly auspicious circumstances that the Bolivarian Society, whose lofty purpose is to foster the spirit of true understanding between the peoples and the nations of this hemisphere, and over which you, Mr. President, so worthily preside, has convoked this meeting in order that it may add its eloquent and potent voice to those who recognize in Washington the embodiment of all the principles which we of the Americas hold most dear.

I should indeed be unappreciative if I were not to feel a deep sense of satisfaction in your generous action—a sentiment which I shall of course be happy to convey to my Government.

From all the memorable utterances of George Washington and from all the tributes paid to him, I shall select but three for this occasion:

In his Farewell Address, he uttered, among other truths which are as applicable today as they were when first spoken, the following memorable phrase—

“Observe good faith and justice toward all nations. Cultivate peace and harmony with all. Religion and morality enjoin this conduct, and can it be that good policy does not equally enjoin it?”

This is, in fact, the very motive of the society of which we have the honor to be the guests today.

John Marshall, Chief Justice of the United States from 1800 until his death in 1835, said,

“More than any other individual, and as much as to one individual was possible, has he contributed to found this, our widespreading empire, and to give to the Western World independence and freedom.”

But perhaps one of the most beautifully genuine tributes paid to the memory of this great American is one which appeared in the composition of a child who is the son of one of my good friends: given the subject of George Washington, he closed his essay with this unconsciously exquisite phrase: “God made him childless, so that his countrymen might call his Father.”

What better sentiment could be invoked as an expression of the deep and underlying sentiment which actuates this meeting of serious men than the realization that although we of the United States of America are proud to claim him as the Father of our Country, Washington is really the heritage of all those who cherish the ideals which form the very foundation of democratic government, and, therefore, the special inspiration of our sister republics of the Western Hemisphere.

Let us pledge our best endeavors to remain worthy of the sublime example that he has set for all of us.

PAN AMERICAN DAY TRIBUTE

His Excellency, Sr. Gabriel Terra, the President of Uruguay, sent the following message in tribute to the first President of the North American Republic, which was read on Pan American Day, April 14, 1932, at a ceremony before the tomb of Washington at Mount Vernon, attended by the chiefs of mission of the Latin American Republics, viz:

THE REPUBLIC OF URUGUAY, WHERE INDEPENDENCE AND DEMOCRACY ARE REVERED BY THE PEOPLE, JOINS IN THE HOMAGE WHICH IS BEING RENDERED TO THE MEMORY OF WASHINGTON ON THIS SECOND CENTENARY OF HIS BIRTH. WASHINGTON'S UPRIGHTNESS IN THE EXERCISE OF THE HIGHEST PUBLIC OFFICES, THE ORIENTATION OF HIS GOVERNMENT IN THE DIRECTION OF PEACE AND RESPECT FOR OTHER NATIONS, AND THE RECOGNITION OF HIS VIRTUES BY HIS FELLOW CITIZENS MAKE OF THE FIRST PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES A FIGURE VENERATED THROUGHOUT AMERICA, BUT PARTICULARLY IN URUGUAY, WHERE HIS MEMORY AND EXAMPLE ARE THIS YEAR BEING HONORED.

GABRIEL TERRA,
PRESIDENT OF THE REPUBLIC.

SWITZERLAND

SWITZERLAND was ready to honor the name of George Washington when the occasion presented itself during the Bicentennial of his birth, and throughout the Alpine land, notably in the larger cities, were held commemorative events participated in by the leaders of the nation and representatives of many other countries.

The red blood of liberty had been coursing through the veins of the Swiss for centuries when George Washington took his place as champion of the cause of liberty in the New World. It had found expression in the glorious exploits of William Tell; in the immortal deed of Arnold Winkelried as early as 1386, when he "made way for liberty and died," and it later reasserted itself in the gallantry of the Swiss Guards who perished at the Tuileries and whose sacrifice is now recalled by the famous Lion of Lucerne.

In Switzerland, therefore, there might be justification for hero-worship to confine itself to Swiss patriots; but the Swiss people themselves think and act otherwise, as was demonstrated by them time and again during the George Washington year.

His Excellency Dr. Giuseppe Motta, President of the Swiss Confederation, expressing the attitude of his people with respect to the celebration, sent the following message to the President of the United States:

BERNE, SWITZERLAND,
FEBRUARY 22, 1932.

HIS EXCELLENCY MR. HOOVER,
PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
WASHINGTON, D. C.

ON THE OCCASION OF THE BICENTENNIAL OF THE BIRTH OF WASHINGTON, THE FEDERAL COUNCIL, FAITHFULLY INTERPRETING THE DESIRE OF THE SWISS PEOPLE, RENDERS HOMAGE TO THE IMMORTAL MEMORY OF THE FIRST PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, AND OFFERS ITS CORDIAL GOOD WISHES FOR YOUR PERSONAL HAPPINESS AND THE PROSPERITY OF THE FRIENDLY REPUBLIC.

(SIGNED) MOTTA, PRESIDENT, OF THE SWISS CONFEDERATION.

Geneva, Switzerland, heard the message of the Bicentennial from the American Ambassador to Belgium and United States Senator Claude A. Swanson, of Virginia, both Delegates to the Disarmament Conference. A gala Washington banquet attended by governmental leaders held the stage on February 22, 1932, at Zurich. Berne paid its tribute in a reception attended by the President of the Swiss Confederation and all of the Federal Counselors. Lausanne's Mayor and the Rector of the famous University of Lausanne attended the observance of the Bicentenary in the Seat of the Swiss Federal Tribunal. At Lugano the Mayor placed wreaths on the famous Washington monument at a public ceremony. The oldest American student organization in Europe conducted the celebration at Fribourg. Basel newspapers devoted liberal space to the Washington theme. American diplomatic envoys in Switzerland were recipients of countless felicitations on the occasion; and in many other places and ways was the Bicentennial celebration marked in Switzerland.

CELEBRATION IN GENEVA

Hon. Hugh S. Gibson, American Ambassador to Belgium and acting chief of the American Delegation to the Disarmament Conference, and Senator Swanson, Delegate to the Disarmament Conference, played the leading roles in the observance of the Bicentennial in Geneva, Switzerland, on February 22, 1932.

The Celebration took the form of a dinner in commemoration of the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington, and large red, white and blue placards posted in conspicuous places in the hotels and stations announced the event to all Americans in the vicinity.

According to Prentiss B. Gilbert, American Consul at Geneva, who was toastmaster of the event, "There were present 180 guests, members of the resident American colony, Swiss friends, and members of the Delegation to the Disarmament Conference." The dinner was held at the Hotel des Bergues, the official residence of the United States Delegation.

AMBASSADOR'S ADDRESS

The American Ambassador to Belgium declared in a speech that drew considerable comment from the assembled guests and the press, that the United States still maintained George Washington's injunction to keep armaments "on a respectable, defensive posture." The full text of the Ambassador's address follows:

The Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington gives us occasion to consider how old we have really become, we who have long considered ourselves, and have been long considered a young nation. Since Washington's inauguration as first President of the United States in 1789, one hundred forty-three years have passed and the American Constitution is the oldest written basic law now governing any nation. Practically every nation of the world has fundamentally changed the organic structure of its Government since the adoption of the Constitution of the United States. Even Great Britain, whose constitutional principles though unwritten ante-date our own, has so fundamentally altered the situation that existed at that time, by the Reform Laws and by the Westminster Statutes reorganizing the relations between the different portions of the Empire, that any American of George Washington's day would barely be able to recognize it as the same Government he knew. Thus a new people, heirs of an old culture, have gradually evolved into one of the oldest of Governments. The United States finds itself the most venerable of existing republics, not one of which existed in its present form when Washington was born or when he became President. It is true that here in Switzerland the idea of representative government had long been a reality, but although the first confederated alliance in Switzerland was established between Uri, Schwytz and Unterwald in 1291, the present Constitution of this nation was only adopted in 1874.

It is with the conception of our Government, strikingly illustrated by the fact that we today celebrate the Two Hundredth anniversary of the great man who was chiefly instrumental in its foundation, that should make us see, and make the world realize, that our country has grown up to the privileges and responsibilities of maturity among nations. Therefore, when we take part in the activities of the world we bring not only something of that courage which inspired Washington to lead in a struggle for liberty when liberty was almost an unknown word, but also that judgment which comes from ripe experience gained from a long application of that system of Government the lines of which he traced.

It was amazing that his vision was not bounded by the narrow confines of the Eastern shores of the American continent, nor to the restricted population then scattered its length. On the contrary, he foresaw definitely the growth of a great nation and in his farewell address, after eight years of the Presidency, the views which he expressed on foreign affairs have influenced us more than those of any single President of the United States, not even excepting Monroe. It is almost unnecessary to repeat those words:

"Observe good faith and justice towards all Nations. Cultivate peace and harmony with all.—Religion and Morality enjoin this conduct; and can it be that good policy does not equally enjoin it?—it will be worthy of a free, enlightened, and, at no distant period, a great nation, to give to mankind the magnanimous and too novel example of a People always guided by an exalted justice and benevolence."

It is with these precepts in mind that we are met here in the common effort of the world to rid itself of the excessive burdens of armament. In the long history of our nation we have always maintained our armaments, in accordance with the injunction of our first President, at such a level as "to keep ourselves by suitable establishments on a respectable defensive posture." Thus from the earliest history of our nation, the purpose of arms has been defined as primarily for defense, and we find ourselves with some fifty-odd nations, seeking to put that principle into general application here and now.

It is not my purpose here today to eulogize George Washington. We have present some one far better fitted than I, by the ties which bind him to Washington's native State, by his own career as a student of the American Constitution, and by the daily practice in its application for many years in the Senate, to bring you inspiration from that State which produced George Washington, and of which he is the senior Senator. I have merely attempted to point out how certain principles which Washington laid down have, in the two hundred years since his birth, produced a nation whose governmental forms have been so widely emulated that it has become the dean rather than the newcomer among governments.

SENATOR SWANSON SPEAKS

Senator Swanson extolled the career and ideals of his fellow Virginian, Washington, decrying all modern slanderers of his name. The following notes of the Senator's address outline the context:

It is fortunate that George Washington's Bicentennial occurs a short while after some muck-raking writers have been striving to destroy the history, tradition and admiration centered around Washington. These writings simply reproduce slanders circulated during the Revolutionary War in order to destroy the character of the General and the confidence in which he was held by the people, as the Tories and British realized that the success of the cause of the Colonies was wrapped up in his person and if he was destroyed the Revolutionary cause would fail.

These slanders were exposed at the time and were dead until found and resurrected by these writers. They remind me of monkeys senselessly chattering in the forest over dead insects they have discovered. Many of these writers, after more thorough investigation of the life of Washington, have recanted and now pay tribute to his ability, worth and nobleness.

Frederick the Great, one of the most eminent soldiers of his time, described as one of the most successful military maneuvers of the age Washington's transferring his troops from New York to Yorktown in the face of a superior and vigilant enemy, through a long stretch of country, largely wilderness and without bridges. Washington's military exploits number him among the world's great geniuses.

Statesmanship consists in the wisdom to discern the right path and the valor to follow it. Washington possessed both qualities in a pre-eminent degree. No statesman ever showed more foresight than Washington, when he advised Congress against the proposed capture of Canada by forces of the Colonies. He deemed it not merely ill-advised from the military standpoint; he felt it would be a great mistake for the United States to possess Canada when the time came for making peace with England. Washington pointed out that we would either be compelled to restore Canada to France or be considered the most ungrateful ally, and that France would claim not only Canada but the territory around the Great Lakes and down both sides of the Mississippi River to Louisiana, thus shutting the United States off from westward expansion and tending to embroil us in the conflicts of European nations.

Previous to this, Washington had written to Patrick Henry, Governor of Virginia, and suggested that he organize troops to cross the Ohio and settle title to the great territory in the Northwest, in order that this might be included within the bounds of the United States at the time of making the treaty of peace with Great Britain. This led to the expedition of George Rogers Clark, the Hannibal of the West, who gained a notable victory at Vincennes and extended the limits of the United States to the Mississippi and beyond.

The foresight of Washington made possible the present mighty Republic. Statesmen of no other nation have shown greater foresight on any similar occasion.

Emerson, the great American essayist, has well said that every institution is the lengthened shadow of a man. In the broader sense it may be said that the United States is the lengthened shadow of Washington in power and traditions and ideals.

As long as America continues to be an extension of Washington in wisdom and fairness to all nations, she will progress toward a greater destiny than that which has blessed her in the past.

All the distinguished contemporaries of Washington admitted that in capacity, in calm judgment, in wisdom and leadership, he stood head and shoulders above them. No further proof of his greatness can be furnished than this tribute from members of the galaxy of great men which has never been surpassed at any one period in any one country in modern history.

FRIBOURG STUDENTS CELEBRATE

The oldest American students' organization in Europe, the Columbia Society of the University of Fribourg, held a Bicentennial celebration in that famous university city on February 21, 1932. At 3.30 p. m. there was Benediction of the Blessed Sacrament in the Chapel of the Villa St. Jean, which was followed by the Washington commemorative event at the same place. The gathering was presided over by Mr. Walter S. Carroll, of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, and addresses were delivered by Hon. Michael Francis Doyle, prominent attorney of Philadelphia and Chairman of the American Committee of the International Club at Geneva, and by Rev. Joseph F. Thorning, S.J., Representative of the International Catholic Peace Association and correspondent for the N. C. W. C. News Service at the Geneva Disarmament Conference. Both of these speakers lauded Washington from an international standpoint, pointing out that although General Washington desired at all times to avoid "foreign entanglements," nevertheless he sought all measure of cooperation with the nations of the world that would make for peace and economic welfare.

Among the distinguished guests were the Baroness Irma de Graffenried, Conseiller d'État Perrier, Mrs. W. F. Doyle, R. P. Alphonse van den Wildenburg, R. P. van den Oudenrijn, R. P. André Gigon, Mrs. Margaret O'Brien, the young lady students of the Villa Beata and Villa des Fougères, branch of Rosary College, Chicago. Representatives were also present from the French, Swiss, German, Italian, English, Polish, Hungarian, and Dutch national societies. The arrangements committee consisted of Messrs. J. L. Federal, W. Carroll, F. Pitt, M. O'Connor, L. Farrell, and J. Bodie.

PROGRAM IN BERNE

DER BUND, leading newspaper of Berne, capital of Switzerland, described the character of George Washington in an editorial article in the words of Machiavelli: "Great men are equal to themselves in all circumstances whether fortune elevates or crushes them. They keep their steady mind so deeply rooted in their way of living that everybody may easily recognize that fate has no power over them."

With this high estimate of Washington in their hearts the people of Berne, through their leaders, joined with the resident Americans in the city in celebrating the two hundredth anniversary of Washington's birth.

The celebration took the form of an official Washington reception in the Bellevue Palace in Berne and, as recorded by Hon. Winthrop S. Greene, Secretary of the American Legation in Switzerland, in a description for the Department of State, of April 19, 1932, "was largely attended by government officials, members of the diplomatic corps and Swiss people. There were actually present the President of the Swiss Confederation and all of the Federal Counselors. The American Minister to Switzerland, Hon. Hugh R. Wilson, journeyed from Geneva to Berne especially for the occasion." Although there were no speeches made, there was an exchange of greetings and felicitations among the government officials, with particular reference to the day, and all who attended left with a firmer conviction that George Washington was a hero worthy of international commemoration.

The American Consul in Berne, Hon. David B. Macgowan, received from a former resident of Switzerland, Mrs. Elma Schniewind, of New York City, a life-size bronze bust of George Washington as a gift to the Consulate. The bust is the work of the sculptor Bianchini, and has been placed in the central room of the Consulate where every visitor can see it upon entering the office.

MONUMENT IN LUGANO

In the city of Lugano, in the Swiss Canton of Tessin, where vineyards, olive and orange groves and walnut woods mark the landscape, is a famous monument to George Washington. According to information furnished the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission by the American Consul-General in Zurich, Hon. Lewis W. Haskell, it is the only public monument honoring Washington in Switzerland and is the work of an unknown sculptor, dating back to the days of the American Civil War. It is enclosed in an open pavilion under a copper cupola supported by eight Doric columns of granite. The pedestal bears the inscription:

MAGNUM SECLORUM DECUS

which may be translated as "An Adornment of the Ages," and below this:

GIORGIO WASHINGTON
1732—1799

It is said that the bust was ordered to be carved by a former resident of the Canton who had returned from a prolonged and profitable residence in the United States nearly three-quarters of a century ago. For many years the bust was in a private garden at Lugano, as an expression of the owner's gratitude to his adopted country. Later, coming into the hands of the city of Lugano, it was moved to its present location, the civic authorities providing the pavilion described. In the restless period following the Armistice the bust was thrown into the lake of Lugano, by an unknown malefactor, but was promptly restored by the local government.

Around this monument on the two hundredth anniversary of Washington's birth there gathered many of the citizens of Lugano and Americans living in their midst and an appropriate ceremony was held at which the Mayor of Lugano placed a wreath on the bust on behalf of the government of the Swiss city and its citizens. Another wreath was sent to Lugano for the occasion by the Bicentennial Committee in Zurich.

RECEPTION AT LAUSANNE

Lausanne, the seat of the Federal Tribunal in Switzerland, received the message of the Bicentennial at a celebration in the form of a Washington reception held in the gardens of the Lausanne Palace Hotel on Independence Day, 1932. The event was organized by the American Consul in Lausanne, Hon. Frederick W. Baldwin, acting in conjunction with a committee of Americans residing in that canton.

Mr. Baldwin reports that "the Presidents of the Executive and Legislative Councils of the Canton of Vaud, the Mayor of the City of Lausanne, the Rector of the University of Lausanne and all of the foreign consuls were invited to the celebration. About 150 people attended. The Consul delivered a speech, the main topic of which concerned the life and character of George Washington and his influence upon the whole world, following which the representatives of the city and university and the foreign consuls were greeted in French by Mr. Baldwin. The Rector of the University replied in French in the name of the canton, city and university authorities, thanked the Americans for their expression of good will and voiced deep admiration for George Washington. The 'Star Spangled Banner' and the Swiss National Anthem were played as the celebration ended. In the evening a George Washington dinner was organized, to which some fifty Americans, including a few foreigners came."

JOINT PROGRAM IN ZURICH

Zurich, capital of the Canton of Zurich, largest city in Switzerland and the country's most important commercial manufacturing center, sent its foremost citizens to represent the city at the George Washington Birthday celebration under the auspices of the American colony, assisted by several Swiss organizations at the Savoy Hotel, Zurich, on the evening of February 22, 1932.

The honorary guests were Herr Dr. Adolf H. Sträuli, National Counselor of the Canton of Zurich and Vice President of the Society of Swiss Friends of the United States of America; Herr Dr. E. Kloeti "Stadtpräsident" (Mayor); the Dean of the Consular corps in Zurich, Consul-General Bianchi of Italy; and Mr. Max P. Fiedler of the Society of Swiss Friends of the United States of America.

Speaking of the occasion, the American Consul in Zurich, Hon. George R. Hukill says in a dispatch of March 3, 1932, to the Department of State: "There were about 150 guests present and the celebration was considered one of the most successful ever arranged in this city on an American anniversary." Fifty persons participated on the committees in charge of the celebration and everything proceeded with clock-like precision.

Between the dinner and the ball a patriotic program was held, the chief feature of which was the following address delivered by Consul Hukill:

Mr. Chairman, our Guests, Ladies and Gentlemen: First of all I want to extend a hearty welcome and warmest greetings to our distinguished guests who have joined us this evening in our celebration of the birth, two hundred years ago, of George Washington.

We are honored with the presence of Herr Regierungsrat Dr. Sträuli, representing the government of the Canton of Zürich; Herr Stadtpräsident Dr. Kloeti, who as Mayor of Zürich represents the city government; Signor Bianchi, Italian Consul General, who as Dean of the Consular Corps in Zürich represents that body; Herr General Director Stierlin, of the Bally Company; the Reverend Mr. Miller, chaplain of the English Church in Zürich; Dr. Potter, Dr. Achard, and Mr. Prager, representing Rotary International.

By your presence, gentlemen, you impress upon us the esteem for Washington in the Old World, whence he drew such noble and generous support in his great struggle for liberty. The participation of other nations and their people in this event is very gratifying to Americans abroad and at home, and it brings to mind the account of one of Washington's biographers of the manner in which the news of his death was received in Europe in 1800.

On the occasion of a triumphal military procession in Paris, decreed by Napoleon, there was a feature which seemed strangely out of keeping with the glittering pageant and the sounds of victorious rejoicing. The standards and flags of the army were hung with crepe.

About the same time, if tradition may be trusted, the flags upon the conquering channel fleet of England were lowered to half-mast in token of grief for the same event which had caused the armies of France to wear the customary badge of mourning.

An uninformed observer of these manifestations might have wondered much whose memory it was that had called them forth from these two great nations, then struggling fiercely with each other for supremacy on land and sea. His wonder would not have abated had he been told that the man for whom they mourned had wrested an empire from one, and at the time of his death was arming his countrymen against the other.

I shall not attempt to deliver a eulogy on George Washington this evening. To do so would require more time than I could fairly expect you to give me and my strongest efforts would not add to his imperishable fame. I shall merely quote the words of President Calvin Coolidge in a speech to the nation in 1924: "His was the directing spirit without which there would have been no Independence, no Union, no Constitution, and no Republic. His influence grows. His stature increases with the increasing years. In wisdom of action, in purity of character, he stands alone."

He is the man whom we honor tonight.

SWISS NEWSPAPERS FRIENDLY

Zurich newspapers not only devoted considerable space to chronicles of the Bicentennial events in Switzerland and Europe in general, but editorialized on the subject of Washington in a way that was unmistakably friendly and sincere. The following translated quotation from the NEUE ZÜRCHER-ZEITUNG of February 21, 1932, indicates the spirit of the Swiss press in eulogizing the great American hero:

George Washington, as we see him today, is an aristocrat in his very nature and in all his gestures. His apparent pride hides a sympathetic timidity. He was an unequalled soldier, severe with himself and often surprisingly tender toward others. He was an indefatigable worker. He battled with unequalled courage. More so than any other leader, he possessed the gift to fill others with his own unshakable convictions. As a patriot, he had a firm belief in something still to be shaped. He weathered the most terrible difficulties. His solitude was a part of his greatness as only a few were valiant enough to appreciate fully the purity of his intentions. Washington was a man who loved and strove for affection, who aimed always at the highest ideals, fought and suffered. The cardinal point is this: he suffered. Notwithstanding the gulf of years which might separate us, we understand and love him. Our compassion and our veneration belong to him.

THE SWISS-AMERICAN REVIEW, official bulletin of the Society of Swiss Friends of the United States of America, issue of February, 1932, was devoted almost entirely to the Bicentennial theme. The famous Stuart portrait of Washington was reproduced on the cover of the magazine, which contained a lengthy biographical article with illustrations of Sulgrave Manor, ancestral home of the Washington family; an old ink drawing of General Washington, and Mount Vernon; two Washington letters, a picture of the Washington monument at Lugano, Switzerland, detailed information concerning the Bicentennial celebration at Zurich and a splendid article entitled "Swiss People Around George Washington." The last named article, translated from the original context in the magazine follows:

SWISS PEOPLE AROUND GEORGE WASHINGTON

The struggle which arose in 1765 on the occasion of the introduction of a stamp tax in America and which concerned the question whether the English Parliament had the right to tax the colonies of Northern America without their consent, and which finally led to the declaration of independence of the 13 United States was not only politically but also socially rooted. It was the struggle of the enlightened intellectuals and of the little men against the great business men, the great proprietors and the families of officers, who all were on the side of England. This explains why the already large colony of Swiss-Americans were separated into two severely opposed camps. On the English side there were all the nobles and rich ones established in leading positions. Henry Bouquet of Rolle was the Superior of Washington and Governor General of Florida. His successor in this office was Frederic Haldimand from Yverdon. When in his fight against Washington he became Governor General of Canada, Augustin Prevost from Geneva succeeded him in Florida. All three of them were highly gifted military chiefs and fought together with de Meuron from Newchâtel against the efforts to establish independence with a passion which made them deeply hated among the friends of George Washington. They were far more dangerous for the sacred cause than the Englishmen who did not want to fight but to negotiate. This enmity explains why George Washington had Major John André from Geneva hanged as a spy when he was captured by the insurgents and when it was established that he had been the mediator of a correspondence between the English commander-in-chief, Sir Henry Clinton, and the American, General Benedict Arnold, concerning the surrender of the Hudson fort, West Point. Washington felt also very hostile towards Johann Joachim Züblin from St. Gall, who in 1760 had been elected preacher in Savannah, and who in 1777 was delegated as a leading politician of the State of Georgia to the Continental Congress, where he voted against the declaration of independence. Washington, however, succeeded in mobilizing his own electors against him and Züblin was compelled to flee. Washington himself could not do quite without the Swiss. Among the private soldiers they had a leading part as instructors, directed by Colonel Steuben of Prussia. The physician Benjamin Rush, and Heinrich Zimmermann (carpenter), who had a very influential voice in the political life of Pennsylvania, organized the sanitary service of the Rebels. J. J. Faesch manufactured guns in New Jersey, and Congressman Henry Wiesner furnished from New York the necessary powder. Dr. Rush even signed the Declaration of Independence. His name can be found between Robert Morris and Benjamin Franklin. At the side of these prominent people fought thousands of unknown soldiers whose ancestors had left Helvetia to start a new life in America, and they risked their life for the cause of the new world.

Not only the Swiss people in America were prominent in the hard struggle for the independence of the 13 States. From Switzerland many enthusiastic friends of the movement crossed the ocean to take sides with George Washington. They were particularly numerous when Yves Gilbert Motier, the Marquis de Lafayette, together with the German Johann Kalb, who in 1768, by order of Choiseuls, agitated the colonies against the mother country, assembled a regiment, probably financed by the French Government, with which he sailed to America. There were many Swiss people in this regiment. Among them we find a young citizen of Geneva, Albert Abraham Alphonse Gallatin, who subsequently became the best known Swiss in America. Born in 1761, he was the son of Jean Gallatin, councilor of State of Geneva and a close friend of Necker and Madame Stael. A love affair was the cause of a lasting separation from his father, and so he went to Canada with Lafayette, who became General of the American Northern Army. The lack of means was the cause of the failure of this expedition. The retreat was inevitable and the success of the insurgents was checked for years. Lafayette sailed for France to get some aid. With this aid which he succeeded in obtaining, he barred the retreat of Lord Cornwallis, which operation ended in the capitulation of Yorktown on October 19th, 1781. The English had long before become tired of this expensive war, so the insurgents were able to sign a peace with England. Gallatin, who already had been commander of Fort Passamaquoddy, was now compelled to earn his bread by giving French lessons until the paternal heritage enabled him to buy a farm in the vicinity of the property of George Washington. He got into close personal contact with the President and enjoyed a political and economical training which very soon showed rich fruits. After having settled in Pennsylvania, Gallatin began to be politically active. In 1789 he was councilor of State and in 1793 he was elected U. S. Senator. As A. Steinach in his "History and Life of the Swiss Colonies of Northern America," 1889, relates, the Senate, however, invalidated this nomination, because contrarily to the provisions of the Constitution, Gallatin had not yet been a citizen of the Republic for nine years. Two years later the nomination was uncontested.

In the Parliament he was at the head of the enemies of England. His principal interest was devoted to the finances of the State. The new Republic was nearly bankrupt. Gallatin in his votes showed such a solid knowledge of these matters that in 1801 President Jefferson made him Secretary of the Treasury. He held this charge up to 1814. Through a prudent exploitation of the federal farm territories, through the establishment and circumspect guidance of a national bank, through the amortization of the national debt made possible by an extreme economy, through extremely careful budget practices and through the adaptation of the taxes to the budget Gallatin succeeded in putting order into the shaken finances of the young States to cover the needs and even to create reserves for extraordinary cases. At the beginning of the war with England, in 1812, he was, therefore, enabled to raise the necessary means without friction. After this war, he went to London together with John Quincy Adams, who was Minister in Russia, to negotiate peace with England and to conclude a treaty of commerce. After the happy accomplishment of this task, he was appointed Minister of the United States in Paris, where he remained until 1823 and where his good counsels in financial matters were very carefully and thankfully heeded. Baring intended to reward Gallatin richly for these services, but he refused with this explanation: "A man who has directed the finances of his country may not die rich."

Gallatin returned to America in 1823. He was offered a seat in the Cabinet, but he refused every political office. The Presidentship of the national bank and of the Historical Society of New York pleased him more. He devoted his time to investigations on the theories of currency and to historical researches. His achievements in both fields were remarkable even from the literary point of view. He died in New York in 1849, 88 years old. Gallatin has reached the highest honors open to a Swiss in America. His beneficent activity brought the greatest esteem to the name of his mother country. May his countrymen always strive to preserve this esteem.

The editor of the SWISS-AMERICAN REVIEW invited the American Consul to write the foreword to the Washington edition of the magazine and in response to the request Mr. Hukill submitted the following statement, which was given prominent place in the booklet:

The response of the S. F. U. S. A. to the suggestion of the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission that appropriate commemorative ceremonies be held throughout the world on this anniversary, as exemplified in this special edition of the Society's bulletin, is a splendid tribute to the memory of Washington from those who have been associated with the land of which he was the father. To the Society's active and whole-hearted support of the plan for an appropriate program in Zurich is due in great measure its success. Such interest on the part of those to whom Washington can be but an historical figure of another nation is further assurance of the regard in which his name is held beyond the boundaries of the land where he is "first in the hearts of his countrymen."

In the United States this anniversary will be observed with various ceremonies from February 22nd to Thanksgiving Day. Exercises will be held in the schools and churches and by social, civic, commercial, patriotic and other organizations in every community. Similar celebrations will be held abroad, wherever there are admirers of the man, the soldier, the statesman, who more than any of his contemporaries established the republic whose capital bears his name. These manifestations give further evidence of the place the name of George Washington shall ever hold in history.

HUNGARY

THE memory of George Washington was honored in Bicentennial programs and other appropriate events in every corner of Hungary where a committee of 400, including the most prominent men in the country, headed the nation-wide activities. From one end of the kingdom to the other, in scores of Hungarian towns and cities, streets were named, trees planted, commemorative tablets erected, and programs were conducted—all as Bicentennial features in memory of George Washington.

On the day preceding the official opening of the Celebration honoring George Washington on the Two Hundredth Anniversary of his Birth, President Hoover received the following cablegrams from the Kingdom of Hungary:

BUDAPEST, FEBRUARY 21, 1932.

PRESIDENT HOOVER,

PRESIDENT OF THE HUNGARIAN ACADEMY OF SCIENCES.
BARON SIGISMUND PERÉNYI,
PRESIDENT OF THE WORLD ASSOCIATION OF HUNGARIANS.
DR. ROWLAND HEGEDÜS,
PRESIDENT OF THE HUNGARIAN AMERICAN CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.

In this fashion did the people of Hungary convey to the people of the United States their interest in the Bicentennial Celebration and their intention of taking an active part in the world-wide tribute to our First President.

The initiative in the Bicentennial program for Hungary was taken by Dr. Rowland Hegedüs, president of the Hungarian American Chamber of Commerce, and former Minister of Finance, to whom belongs much of the credit for the success of the observances. It was largely through his efforts that the Hungarian George Washington Bicentennial Committee was organized.

Heading the Hungarian committee were Count Albert Apponyi, Hungary's First Delegate to the League of Nations since that nation joined the League in 1924, and Dr. Albert Berzeviczy, President of the Hungarian Royal Academy, both of whom acted as presidents. There were likewise two vice presidents,—Baron Sigismund Perényi, President of the World Association of Hungarians, and Dr. Hegedüs. The United States Minister to Hungary, Nicholas Roosevelt, and the Hungarian Minister to the United States, Count László Széchenyi, were honorary presidents of the committee.

IMPRESSIVE OPENING CEREMONIES

The opening program of the Bicentennial celebration in Hungary was presented in Budapest in the Royal Hungarian Academy of Science on the morning of February 21, 1932, under the auspices of the Hungarian Bicentennial Committee. The importance attached to the program is shown by the number of prominent Hungarians and others who were in attendance. The Regent of Hungary had planned to be present but was prevented by illness. Included among the guests were the Archduke Joseph, the presidents of the two houses of Parliament, the Foreign Minister, diplomatic representatives of other countries, and many others.

No pains had been spared to make the program decorative and impressive. Flags of both countries as well as numerous colorful banners were hung throughout the hall. There were guards in brilliant uniform and troops of Boy Scouts to lend a martial air. The best male choir in Budapest was engaged to sing the Hungarian and American national anthems, and the entire program was broadcast and filmed in moving pictures.

Dr. Berzeviczy presided and delivered the opening address of which the following is a summarized translation:

Nowhere did the appeal of the Washington Bicentenary Committee find a warmer reception than in Hungary where the figure of this great patriot is so deeply embedded in the hearts of the people. In spite of the great distance friendly relations have long existed between Hungary and the free people of North America.

Hungarians took part in the American fight for independence. Michael Kovats became a colonel in a cavalry regiment under Brigadier Pulaski.

The people of Hungary followed with great interest America's fight for independence.

Daniel Webster fought for the independence of Hungary. He sent Dudley Mann to Vienna to learn the truth about Hungary. Then followed a temporary estrangement between America and Austria. But after the war of 1848 there was a great exodus of Hungarian patriots. Ujhazy, the leader of the émigrés, was appointed by Kossuth the first Hungarian Minister to the United States. Ujhazy founded the settlement of "Uj Buda" in Iowa.

It was due largely to these émigrés that America took steps to bring Kossuth to America. The S. S. Mississippi was despatched to the shores of Asia Minor to fetch Kossuth. Kossuth was received by the American Congress and had great moral success in America, establishing that warm friendship between the two nations which finds expression in today's celebration.

Hungarians also took part in the Civil War, including Asboth, Stahl, and Anselm in the armies of the North.

After the "compromise" with Austria in 1867 there was a new emigration of Hungarians for economic reasons. About two and one-half million emigrants went to America from the former Hungarian territories. The present number of Hungarians in the United States is 316,318. These Hungarians helped to build up the United States, one more reason to celebrate the founder of the American nation.

Reverting to Washington, Dr. Berzeviczy pointed out that he was, without controversy, the greatest general and statesman in American history and a great human figure.

Describing Washington's life, the speaker referred to him as a farmer, frontiersman, surveyor and a born leader.

Vanity and selfishness were unknown to Washington. He died in his 67th year, two years after the expiration of his second term of presidency. The Washington monument in Budapest will for ages to come tell Hungarians of the greatness of Washington.

Owing to the absence in Geneva of Count Albert Apponyi, who was scheduled to make the principal address, Dr. Hegedüs was the next speaker. "His speech in Hungarian," wrote Minister Roosevelt to the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission, "provoked enthusiasm and approbation when he enlisted the Spirit of Washington in the campaign for 'Justice for Hungary.'" A brief summary in English of the speech follows:

Among the greatest men of history there were only five who at the same time were great generals and statesmen. These were Alexander the Great, Julius Caesar, Frederick the Great, Napoleon, and George Washington. But while the first four were leading established nations, Washington united people into a nation. The name "Americans" begins with Washington. Washington's influence today goes beyond the American frontiers. America became a leading world power and Washington's principles of liberty and justice exerted great influence upon Europe. Carlyle seeks the roots of the French revolution in the American struggle for liberty.

Washington's figure is very important also in Hungary, not only because he gave a home to many million Hungarians but also because his ideals correspond with those of the Hungarian nation. As a general, Washington was similar to Görgey; as a statesman, his political wisdom was similar to that of Deák.

Kossuth's visit to America was very important as far as Hungary was concerned. It was Kossuth who said that America would sooner or later become involved in the affairs of Europe. This prophecy came true during the World War. If, when America entered the war, American public opinion had been influenced by Kossuth's American speeches, America's intervention would not have caused the mutilation of Hungary; it would have led to the establishment of an independent Hungary. The fact that Congress refused to ratify the "Paris-suburb" peace treaties shows the influence of Washington's farewell address—his political testament which will ever remain the foundation of American politics.

The speech of Dr. Hegedüs was followed by the singing of the Hungarian National Anthem and the "Star Spangled Banner" by the male choir of Budapest.

Minister Roosevelt was then introduced and made the following address.

As the representative in Hungary of the Government which George Washington created, permit me to express the warm appreciation of the American nation that the people of Hungary, in these times of crisis and suffering, should have taken such pains to show their admiration for George Washington and their friendship for America by calling together in his honor this gathering of distinguished Hungarians representative of every group in Hungarian life. I believe I am right in taking this as a proof of the appeal that the memory of George Washington makes to all classes of mankind.

Nor is this wide appeal altogether fortuitous, for Washington in his own life combined experiences common to many different classes of people. Born a member of the landed aristocracy of Virginia, linked by family and class ties with the England of Addison, Walpole and Marlborough, he was brought up on the frontier of the American wilderness. Heir to great estates, he nevertheless began at an early age to earn his own living, and successively filled the functions of an engineer, a frontiersman, farmer, soldier, merchant, politician, law-maker, and nation builder. The hunting field was as familiar to him as the field of battle or the field of parliamentary debate. Essentially an "outdoor man"—a lover of horses, dogs and trees—he also had a shrewd business instinct and exceptional business ability.

There is irony in the fact that, although hospitable by inclination and fond to his last days of social activities, and especially of dances and balls, he lived a lonely life even though surrounded by admirers and pestered by politicians and self-seekers. A man of strong emotions and passions, he held himself ever in check, calm when others were excited, and rising above personal enmities and rancor. Self-less, serene, detached, objective, he was able to control the disruptive passions and jealousies of his people and to unite in the service of his country violent partisans and prejudiced politicians.

If I remind you briefly of the atmosphere in which Washington was born, you may the better understand him. I said a minute ago that he belonged to the landed aristocracy of Virginia, brought up in a community which bore the earmarks of 18th century English culture and was closely patterned after the life of the English county families. But only a few miles beyond the colonial manor house lay the wilderness, stretching 5,000 kilometers across an unknown continent to the Pacific. The vast virgin forests of the Appalachian mountains presented an almost impassable barrier to the coastal settlement of a million or more colonists scattered from Canada to Carolina. In fact, the wilderness even seemed to be actively at war with the colonists.

In order to plant their corn and beans and build their houses, it was necessary to chop down giant trees by the thousands. Always the forest stood just at the edge of the clearing, ready to reclaim any fields that the farmer neglected. Life was a constant struggle against nature—a struggle in which self-reliance, endurance, ingenuity and energy were most needed. The frontier revealed the truth about men. It unmasked weaklings and the pretentious; it brought up the strong and the sound. A leveller of mankind, it yet was also a great school for leadership.

Into this wilderness forest George Washington plunged at the early age of 16, first as a surveyor laying out boundaries of private estates, and later as a soldier in the British expedition against the French and Indians in the region of the present city of Detroit. Washington commanded a company of volunteers which served with—and under—the British regulars. The campaign in itself was unimportant but influenced the world's future as it gave to this young man of destiny his first conviction that the ways of the Englishmen of England were not those of the Americans of Virginia, and that the conservatism and self-complacency of English officialdom made it difficult for English Ministers or officers to understand American problems. Incidentally, the intimate knowledge which he obtained of how the British handled their troops in the American wilderness gave him an insight into British tactics which, during the Revolutionary War, helped him so to conduct his own troops as to achieve victory.

For five years, on and off, Washington was active in the military defense of the wilderness frontier. When finally he returned to the administration of his estates it was natural for him to take a part in the internal government of Virginia comparable to that which he had taken in its defense against Indian and alien enemies. For sixteen years he served as a member of the Colonial legislature of Virginia, unobtrusively and modestly, as one who preferred to help rather than to direct. When Virginia decided to elect a member to attend the First Continental Congress which met in 1774—two years before the Declaration of Independence—to discuss what the colonies should do to obtain fair treatment from the Mother country, the choice naturally fell on George Washington. The following spring he attended the Second Continental Congress. At both meetings he remained in the background, but in spite of his modesty his opinion was constantly sought and his advice followed.

A fellow-member in the Continental Congress said of Washington that he had never known him to talk for longer than ten minutes. Another, describing Washington's record in that parliamentary body, said "If you speak of solid information and sound judgment, Colonel Washington is unquestionably the greatest man on that floor."

Here was a conservative and an aristocrat anxious to further the cause of liberals and commoners; a Virginian ready to fight for the defense of New England. It became clear at once that Washington was a symbol of union as well as of independence. He was thus chosen Commander-in-chief of the Revolutionary Armies in June of 1775, and directed to proceed to Boston to lead the New England forces against the British. While questions of political expediency influenced his selection, it is difficult not to believe that destiny itself played a rôle in thus choosing for the apparently hopeless task of uniting a handful of colonists scattered along a coastline 2,000 miles in length to fight a war against the great British Empire, a man who in a rare degree embodied those qualities of character requisite for the leader of such a cause.

I shall not bother you with the details of the military activities of the American revolution, other than to remind you that the war lasted eight years; that while the Americans were handicapped by lack of resources, the British were handicapped by the difficulty of operating in a hostile country two months from the home base, their line of communication harassed by enemies in Europe. Nor shall I recount how the presence of a naval detachment of France, at the time at war with England, helped to hasten the final victory of the revolutionary forces. Frederick the Great of Prussia, when the war was won, sent a sword, it is claimed, to Washington with the inscription "From the oldest to the greatest General in the world." It is interesting and pertinent to note that when one of the Prussian King's courtiers sought to flatter His Majesty by suggesting that he, Frederick, was the greatest of Generals, the King is reported to have replied, "No, I am not; Washington surpasses me. I conquered with means, he has conquered without them."

But Washington's services to his country were not alone as a military strategist. The colonies had won their independence from England, but sought to become independent each of the other. Despite a common racial affinity and history the thirteen States of America nearly went the way of the nations of Europe, seeking each to erect tariff walls against its neighbor, to hamper trade, to establish its own currency, to levy its own taxes, and in other ways to exercise that complete sovereignty which goes with a full national status. To Washington and others it was clear that in disunion lay disaster. "Today one nation, tomorrow thirteen," he said in a moment of despondency. As that shrewd American philosopher-statesman, Benjamin Franklin, had put it in American slang a few years earlier when attending a meeting of the representatives of the thirteen colonies at which each was insisting on having its own way, "Either we hang together or we'll hang separately."

In the four chaotic years that followed the peace Washington took little active part in suggesting policies. But he was the one figure known to all his countrymen. He alone stood out above state lines, and had the confidence of different sections. When, therefore, their quarrels became most bitter it was to Washington that they turned, confident that he in his fairness and common sense would solve them without fear or favor. When it was finally decided to call a convention to frame a constitution to create a national government it was essential that Washington preside. The mere fact that he would attend was enough to lend national significance to the gathering. When he was named its presiding officer men throughout the States saw new hope for the future. Their distrust of each other was complete. But so also was their faith in Washington. This faith he fully justified by keeping above partisan strife and political scheming, playing rather the rôle of mediator and welder, holding the delegates together and encouraging them to agree.

Out of that convention came the Constitution of the United States. But even yet the States were slow to unite, reluctant to ratify the Constitution that their delegates had created. When finally it was in order—and another precious year or more had been wasted while politicians haggled lest they lose petty privileges and patronage under the new system—the States without a dissenting vote chose as the man best suited to breathe life into the new Government the leader in whom all Americans had placed their trust during the eight years of war, and to whom all had turned when the Constitution was framed. General Washington became President Washington. The stamp of his great character was thus placed from the beginning on that office and his common sense, moderation and fairness were concentrated on the formation of a great government.

Time does not permit me to enumerate the many important services which Washington rendered as first President of the United States. Countless volumes have been written about them, and students of government in all countries have examined his acts with discerning interest. Suffice it here to stress again the influence of Washington's character in holding the new Government together and in over-riding the jealousies of politicians. Party feeling ran high in America from the beginning. Not only was there rivalry for power between different members of the Cabinet but fundamental principles of government were at stake.

On the one side stood the brilliant and conservative first Secretary of the Treasury, Alexander Hamilton, determined at all costs to make the Federal Government strongly centralized so that it could easily dominate the government of the States. Bitterly opposed to him was the first Secretary of State, Thomas Jefferson, a man of wide intellectual powers and extensive theoretical knowledge of the philosophy of government. Jefferson's ambition was to see the powers of the individual States strengthened and the National Government kept weak. Between Jefferson and Hamilton was much personal bitterness. Both were men of strong character who had played—and were to continue to play—great rôles in moulding the destinies of the United States.

President Washington saw that unless partisan strife could be minimized during the first years of the new Government that Government might well perish from internal dissension. It fell to his lot, therefore, to maintain a balance between the followers of Jefferson and those of Hamilton, steering a course between the highly centralized, strongly nationalistic government desired by Hamilton and the loosely federalized government based on States' Rights desired by Jefferson. As time passed Washington's sympathies went over more and more to the Hamiltonian policies. As a result the United States today has a centralized government based on the principle of federalism.

Washington was President when the French revolution broke out. In the ensuing wars between France and England he was determined to preserve a strict neutrality. In fact so strongly was he impressed with the importance for the New American Nation to keep aloof from the European war that he evolved the policy which has ever since guided America's relations with the rest of the world.

This policy was crystallized in his famous "Farewell Address" on completing his services as President of the United States. Often referred to as his "political testament," a portion of it, at least, deserves to be quoted because it is so little known in Europe and yet has had such a profound influence on American foreign policy, regardless of whether the party in power has been Republican or Democratic. Few documents have played such a dominant part in the development of America's foreign relations.

After stating that the great rôle of conduct for America in regard to foreign nations should be, in extending commercial relations, to have with them as little political connection as possible, President Washington explained that "Europe has a set of primary interests which to us have none or a very remote relation.—Hence she must be engaged in frequent controversies, the causes of which are essentially foreign to our concerns.—Hence, therefore, it must be unwise in us to implicate ourselves by artificial ties in the ordinary vicissitudes of her policies or the ordinary combinations and collisions of her friendships, or enmities . . .

"Our detached and distant situation invites and enables us to pursue a different course . . . Why forego the advantages of so peculiar a situation? . . . Why by interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalry, interest, humor or caprice? . . . 'Tis our true policy to steer clear of permanent alliances, with any portion of the foreign world."

It should be noted that Washington emphasized aloofness from the ordinary combinations and vicissitudes of European policy, thus implying that on extraordinary occasions a different policy might be dictated. This was, in fact, what happened when America's interests were directly threatened by foreign powers. In the last century and a quarter the United States took part in three wars with European nations and participated in countless international gatherings where its interests were directly concerned. Its policy has been most succinctly summed up as one of "co-operation without commitments; of independence without isolation."

Washington retired from the Presidency on the fourth of March, 1797. For a brief time at last he was able to devote himself to the care of his estates which he so greatly loved. Men still sought his opinion on all manner of subjects and came from distant lands to see him. In fact, he complained that his home was like a roadside tavern, constantly filled with changing guests. In 1798, just before his end, when a crisis in our relations with France threatened another war, he was called from his retirement by the unanimous demand of his people once more to become the Commander-in-chief of the American armed forces. Fortunately the war scare passed and the former President went back to his home at Mount Vernon, once more to tend his fields and farm.

Riding out in rain and snow on the morning of December 12, 1799, to superintend the work in one of the pastures, he caught a chill. When he got back he was put to bed and his favorite physician was sent for. The cold rapidly developed into acute congestion of the lungs, and after two days of illness the end came. "I die hard," he is reported to have said, "but I am not afraid to go." His death plunged the American nation into mourning and drew tributes from all parts of the world.

Almost of mythical proportions during his life, the figure of Washington has loomed ever larger with the passage of time. Far greater was his rôle than that in the famous saying, "First in war, first in peace, first in the hearts of his countrymen," for his influence permeated the entire life of the American action and so in time made itself felt throughout the world. No Caesar this, no Napoleon; nor a man of revolutionary intellectual powers; but rather a man of vast common sense and courage, selfless, strong and far-seeing, modest but fearless in pushing through whatever task he commenced, a great leader and a great patriot, rightly distinguished as the "Father of his Country."

Press reports of the program were all generous in their praise, many of them going to great lengths to detail the event.

MANY CITIES PARTICIPATE

The Hungarian Bicentennial Committee reported celebrations of various kinds in 26 cities and counties. These celebrations consisted of programs, tree plantings, municipal festivities, the display of flags and decorations, the publishing of articles on George Washington in newspapers and periodicals, and other similar features. In most of these activities the schools played a prominent part.

The report from the Hungarian Bicentennial Committee, signed by Virgil Kördögh, Director, is herewith quoted, being transmitted to the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission through the American Minister:

MANY CITIES PARTICIPATE

I take pleasure, Mr. Minister, in making the following report relative to the celebrations held throughout Hungary on the occasion of the Bicentennial of the Birth of George Washington:

Budapest—The Lord Mayor of the City of Budapest celebrated the Bicentennial of the Birth of George Washington in a festive general assembly, reviewing the biography of George Washington and extolling his merits. After the meeting the Lord Mayor sent a telegram of greetings to the United States.

Debrecan—The Royal Free City of Debrecan commemorated the birthday of George Washington by a magnificent celebration. Professor Dr. Béla Tankó made a speech recalling the splendid qualities of Washington. This was followed by songs by the city choir, which were highly appreciated by a large audience.

Pécz—The Royal Free City of Pécz celebrated the Bicentennial of the Birth of George Washington in its press as well as in its schools, and the town was adorned with flags.

Sopron—The Royal Free City of Sopron will lay out a new park in memory of Washington, and all the nut trees planted therein will be called after America's great hero. In the same park will be placed a commemorative tablet.

Baja—The Mayor of the City of Baja called a festive assembly in commemoration of the bicentennial of the birth of George Washington. The planting of memorial trees was decided upon by the audience. The local press mentioned Washington in its leading articles.

JULY FOURTH CELEBRATION

Special ceremonies were arranged by the committee in observance of America's Independence Day, and these were conducted on the morning of July 3, 1932, at the monument to Washington in the Municipal Park at Budapest.

The first part of the program consisted of the formal opening of an avenue in the Municipal Park which passes in front of the Washington monument and which was named the Washington Promenade. The custody of the promenade was transferred from the Department of Public Works to the Deputy Mayor of Budapest, representing the municipality. As this ceremony was concluded, the State Police Orchestra played the Star Spangled Banner.

At the monument there was a large assemblage including members of the Hungarian Parliament, representatives of the Royal Hungarian Government, members of the diplomatic and consular corps in Budapest, representatives of the Hungarian George Washington Bicentennial Committee, and many other persons prominent in official and private life in Hungary and other countries. The program here was opened by the Chorus of Budapest singing the Hungarian National Anthem.

A brief address of welcome was made by Dr. Rowland Hegedüs, speaking as the representative of Count Albert Apponyi, president of the Hungarian George Washington Bicentennial Committee.

Baron Sigmund Perényi was then introduced as the principal speaker. The Baron, president of the World Association of Hungarians, said:

I dare say that we Hungarians yield to no other nation in reverence and respect to the founder of American freedom and greatness because we believe him to be the representative of those principles of liberty and justice which God has destined to become the common benefit of humanity.

In paying homage to the greatest American here we express also the feelings of gratitude towards America and Americans who have shown us so often their sympathy and friendly feelings, who have given bread to multitudes of emigrated Hungarians who are now true and faithful citizens of the mighty Republic.

We live in an age of the gravest financial crisis created by distrust and hatred and enmity in international relations and the waves of the economic ruin threaten to inundate the whole world.

In the gloomy night of adversity we come to the spirit of Washington to find hope and consolation in our present misfortunes. Sorrow takes a deeper root in human breasts than joys. When nations are suffering and millions live a wretched existence, the heart of men can feel all the more the intensity of yearning after heaven-sent leaders and the true veneration for those great patriots who have devoted their lives to the welfare of their fatherland.

Washington was the first and he is still the greatest American and whoever studies his history must consider his principles as a living source of instruction to statesmen and to patriots all over the world.

Washington's military genius which had directed the war, his wisdom which had controlled his people, and his patriotism were everywhere appreciated and he was esteemed as the purest and noblest character.

In his farewell address issued in the year 1796, a paper unequalled in patriotic sentiment and wisdom he set forth the principles which had guided him: "Be united," he said in substance, "be Americans. Observe justice and good faith toward all nations and be independent politically of all. In a word be a nation, be Americans and be true to yourselves."

"Observe good justice and faith toward all Nations," he said, and if the spirit of Washington could raise its voice now it would proclaim this principle again as a rule for ever to be followed as the only possibility for economic cooperation, as the only remedy in the present desperate situation to save the world. He would recommend to let the passionate excitement of past times subside before the prudent advice of present necessities.

Spirit of Washington watch over the principles, which were the guiding star of thy noble life for the prosperity and future security of thine own country and for the common benefit of humanity.

In the name of the Hungarian people I lay this wreath on thy memorial.

At this point five trees were planted in memory of George Washington and the Hungarian soldiers who fought in the Revolutionary War. The trees were planted by representatives of the Regent of

The "Star Spangled Banner" was sung by the Budapest Chorus.

United States Consul General John Ball Osborne, the final speaker on the program, then made an address as follows:

Minister Roosevelt, who regrets keenly that circumstances prevent his presence here today, has requested me to represent him on this occasion of the celebration of American Independence under the auspices of the George Washington Bicentennial Committee of Hungary.

Among the numerous ties of friendship which unite Hungary and the United States none are stronger and more deeply appreciated by the American people than those which relate to George Washington and the foundation of the United States.

In the great struggle for American Independence very many Hungarian Hussars who were incorporated in the Foreign Legion of the French Army participated gallantly, and among the collaborators of Washington was the Hungarian Colonel Michael de Kowats, who rendered valuable service as cavalry instructor in the Continental Army.

These historical ties with the birth of the American Republic, are beautifully symbolized by this artistic and imposing monument erected in 1906 in memory of George Washington by the Hungarian residents of the United States. This monument also symbolizes the strong social bonds between the two countries and reminds us that there are half a million Hungarians in the United States who are thinking today of Budapest and its tribute of homage to the foremost American of all time.

Among the several organizations that are constantly working for a better understanding between the two countries is the Hungarian American Chamber of Commerce, which has been active in promoting the observance in Hungary of the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington. This organization has contributed greatly toward the establishment of closer relations between Hungarians and Americans, as respects not only trade and financial links, but also cultural bonds.

This monument is particularly significant and inspiring when we recall the fact that Washington never visited Hungary or any other foreign country, excepting only Barbados in his youth. It is a tribute of homage from Hungarians to one who stands in history as the exponent of national liberty and the personification of the American people at their best.

Washington's intense patriotism and unflagging devotion to the cause of liberty, his valor and military genius, and his fortitude and patience in the times of trial are qualities that appeal strongly to Hungarians. In nobility of character and patriotism George Washington and Louis Kossuth were kindred souls of the same glorious type and this fact itself constitutes an everlasting tie between the two nations. In several cities of the United States there are public monuments of Kossuth, notably in New York City and Cleveland, Ohio.

You are doubtless familiar with the principal facts in the eventful life of George Washington, who displayed such great talents in peace as well as in war; as President of the United States as well as in the management of his estate at Mount Vernon. While his early formal education was by no means extensive or remarkable and he spoke no foreign language, he made up for all deficiencies by the diligent reading of well-chosen literature. His outstanding achievement in the colonial period was the service he rendered after Braddock's defeat. In fact, it was his military genius and aptitude as a leader of men that focussed on him the attention of Congress as the appropriate Commander-in-Chief of the Continental Armies in the Revolution.

At the age of 27 years he married a lady of Virginia and their combined fortunes in landed property made him one of the richest men in America. He represented the best type of an aristocratic country gentleman. As a farmer and merchant of his products he was keen, progressive and successful, attending personally to small details. He made the best tobacco in Virginia and its superior quality was recognized in England. Barrels of flour stamped with his name and estate were admitted freely into British ports without examination.

With such a comfortable economic background the average man would prefer a peaceful life of ease when the storm of war came—but not so with Washington. The fire of liberty burned in his soul and impelled by this great force he risked everything and threw himself unreservedly into the struggle for national independence which was to drag through seven years of trials and tribulations, alternating defeats and victories.

Perhaps the most picturesque moment of Washington's life was when, chosen by Congress as the Commander-in-Chief of the Continental Army, he arrived at Boston after the battle at Bunker Hill and, seated majestically on his horse under a famous elm tree, with aristocratic dignity, he took command of a motley, unorganized army of farmers, mechanics and tradesmen, who, under his leadership, were destined to become veterans, to make history, and to change the map of the world.

Washington's subsequent services in the establishment of the National Government and as the first President of the United States were invaluable. It may justly be said that from the outbreak of the Revolution until his death Washington was the guiding star of the American nation. His wise words of advice still influence the conduct of the American people and the principles of the American Government.

In his address Baron Perényi has referred to the hope and consolation afforded by the Spirit of Washington in this gloomy night of world-wide adversity. It is true. Little by little all the nations have become so interdependent that disaster to one reacts adversely on all others. At the present time all the nations are passing through a Valley Forge which calls for the same courage and patience that enabled Washington to triumph.

Today Budapest has strengthened the existing ties between the two countries by the graceful dedication to the memory of George Washington of this promenade in front of the Washington Monument, in this sylvan scene of entrancing beauty. All these ties constitute what may be termed a Spiritual Bridge between Hungary and the United States over which troop in both directions unceasingly invisible messengers of friendship and goodwill, working for a better international understanding.

On behalf of the American Minister and in the name of my Government and my compatriots, I thank you all, as well as all the organizations here represented, for this new evidence of goodwill toward the United States, and, in memory of George Washington and, in token of sincere Hungarian-American friendship, I lay this wreath upon the Washington Memorial.

Several selections from Hungary's patriotic music were then played by the State Police Orchestra to bring the program to a close.

On July 6, 1932, President Hoover received the following cablegram from the Hungarian World Association and the Hungarian Chamber of Commerce:

BUDAPEST, JULY 6, 1932.

CEREMONY AT WASHINGTON MONUMENT

An interesting ceremony was conducted at the Washington Monument in Budapest on August 18, 1932, when a party of Americans, mostly of Hungarian descent, visited that memorial to pay tribute to the memory of America's first President. The group, consisting of more than a hundred persons, brought soil from Mount Vernon to mingle with the soil of Hungary, symbolizing the ties existing between the two countries.

Among the addresses made on this occasion was one delivered by George Lukacs, former Hungarian Minister of Public Education, who spoke eloquently of the numerous American citizens of Hungarian birth or ancestry. These people, Mr. Lukacs said, always kept bright and strong the friendship of Hungary and the United States.

Mr. Osborne also spoke on this occasion. His remarks were as follows:

It was the intention of Minister Roosevelt to be here and greet you but he has requested me to express to you his keen regret that he has been unable to come.

To you, as messengers of international friendship and goodwill from my country, I extend heartiest welcome and grateful appreciation of the valuable service which you are rendering to the cause of good understanding between Hungary and the United States.

Most of you are so fortunate as to have this splendid country as a background and hence you are familiar with the numerous strong historical and living ties between the two countries, not the least important of which are those that relate to the life and times of George Washington.

To us Americans the most sacred spot in Hungary is precisely here where 26 years ago generous-minded Hungarian residents of the United States erected this impressive statue of George Washington. Here ever since, at least once a year, on Independence Day, the Americans of Budapest have gathered to commemorate the foundation of our Government and the immortal services rendered to our country by George Washington.

Today you have added to the sentimental value of this sacred spot by bringing here some of the soil taken from Washington's home at Mount Vernon. This tribute symbolizes beautifully the ties of blood existing between Hungary and the United States, to which His Excellency George Lukacs has so eloquently referred.

No country in the world is better qualified than the United States to understand and appraise justly the problems and aspirations of different peoples, because our nation is made up of all the races and nationalities of the world. Throughout the vast domain of the United States Hungarians by birth and by stock are scattered by the thousands and their hearts beat in sympathetic rhythm with the Magyars in Europe. The knowledge of this fact is a source of consolation and encouragement to the Hungarian nation.

Every large group that comes on a visit to Hungary promotes its welfare, and so your own visit has its spiritual aspects. By the exchange of helpful information and constructive ideas you will exercise an influence in the cause of international peace and happiness.

On November 26, the George Washington Bicentennial Committee of Hungary sent the following telegram to the President of the United States:

BUDAPEST, 1932, NOV. 26.

PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES,
WASHINGTON.

ON OCCASION OF THANKSGIVING DAY THE HUNGARIAN GEORGE WASHINGTON BICENTENNIAL COMMITTEE IN THE NAME OF THE HUNGARIAN PEOPLE SEND CORDIAL GREETINGS TO THE GREAT AMERICAN NATION EXPRESSING THEIR ADMIRATION AND FORMING MOST HEARTY WISHES FOR THE PROSPERITY OF THE UNITED STATES.

DR. ROWLAND HEGEDUS,
BARON SIGISMUND PERÉNYI.

In this manner was the Bicentennial Celebration in the Kingdom of Hungary brought to an official close. For nine months the people of Hungary honored the memory of George Washington; and this will remain as a permanent memorial to the mutual friendship and respect of the people of the United States and the Kingdom of Hungary.

FINLAND

TO COMMEMORATE the Bicentennial of the Birth of George Washington the President of the Republic of Finland, P. E. Svinhufvud, sent the following telegram of felicitation to the President of the United States:

HELSINGFORS, FEBRUARY 21, 1932.

HIS EXCELLENCY HERBERT HOOVER
PRESIDENT OF UNITED STATES
WASHINGTON, D. C.

ON THIS SOLEMN DAY WHEN THE PEOPLE OF THE UNITED STATES ARE CELEBRATING THE TWO HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE BIRTH OF THEIR FIRST PRESIDENT AND GREAT CITIZEN GEORGE WASHINGTON I BEG YOU TO ACCEPT THE MOST SINCERE CONGRATULATIONS OF THE PEOPLE OF FINLAND.

P. E. SVINHUFVUD,
PRESIDENT OF REPUBLIC OF FINLAND.

On the afternoon of February 22, at the American legation, the American Minister, Mr. Edward E. Brodie, tendered a reception in honor of the occasion. Attending this function were the President of the Republic of Finland and Madame Svinhufvud, cabinet members and their wives, members of the diplomatic corps, prominent Finns of all ranks of society and representatives of the American colony in Helsingfors.

It is interesting to note the comments of the Finnish newspapers as of February 22. They show conclusively the respect and admiration in which the name of George Washington is held in that Republic.

One long editorial ends as follows:

The result of his work is the great Republic, the United States of America, with which Finland has so many friendly ties.

Another newspaper said:

By the force of his personality he held together the band of volunteers, and by his discipline, bravery, and love of liberty instilled into his men a burning desire for victory which, even after years of defeats, still smoldered in the breasts of all his soldiers.

A third newspaper commented:

George Washington was great as a soldier, as a statesman, and as a man. He was pure and noble by nature. The American nation has hailed him as being "First in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen."

A fourth newspaper, speaking of Washington's achievements after the Revolutionary War made the following statement:

George Washington had led the army to victory and now he was to strengthen the union, reconcile parties, shape the administration, and inspire in his countrymen confidence in the new social order. We know that he succeeded in his task. At the close of his first term he was re-elected, but when the people wanted to elect him for a third term he refused to be a candidate, retiring to his estate at Mount Vernon.

GREECE

GREECE, with its classic background of history, literature, religion and mythology, on whose tablets are graven hero-names of the ages, recognizing in George Washington a character worthy of a place with the figures of Hellenic herolore, gave expression to its high regard for the Great American during the Bicentennial. The President of the Hellenic Republic, His Excellency Alexandre Zaimis, sent the following greetings to the President of the United States on the opening day of the Washington celebration:

ATHENS, FEBRUARY 22, 1932.

HIS EXCELLENCY
MR. HERBERT HOOVER
PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES,
WASHINGTON.

ON THE OCCASION OF THE BICENTENNIAL OF THE BIRTH OF WASHINGTON, I BEG YOUR EXCELLENCY TO ACCEPT THE SINCERE GOOD WISHES OF THE HELLENIC PEOPLE AND MYSELF FOR THE HAPPINESS AND PROSPERITY BOTH OF YOUR EXCELLENCY AND OF THE NOBLE AMERICAN NATION.

(SIGNED) ALEXANDRE ZAIMIS,
PRESIDENT OF THE HELLENIC REPUBLIC.

His Excellency, Themistocles Sofoulis, President of the Hellenic Chamber, sent the felicitations of the legislative body of Greece to the same branch of the Government of the United States on the occasion of the inauguration of the Bicentennial year. This message, which was laid before the House of Representatives by the Speaker, follows:

ATHENS, FEBRUARY 22, 1932.

HIS EXCELLENCY
THE PRESIDENT OF THE CONGRESS OF THE CONFEDERATION OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA
WASHINGTON, D. C.

ON THE OCCASION OF THE BICENTENNIAL OF THE BIRTH OF WASHINGTON, THE GREAT AMERICAN LIBERATOR, I BEG

YOU TO BE THE INTERPRETER TO THE CONGRESS AND THE PEOPLE OF THE UNITED STATES OF THE RESPECTFUL ADMIRATION FELT BY THE HELLENIC CHAMBER FOR HIS NOBLE MEMORY. WE CAN NOT FORGET THAT THIS ILLUSTRIOUS CHAMPION OF INDEPENDENCE CLOSED HIS CAREER WHILE DESIRING FOR HIS PEOPLE CONCORD AND PEACE TOWARDS WHICH ALSO OUR BEST WISHES FOR ALL HUMANITY, WHOSE HAPPINESS IS INSEPARABLE FROM THE PROSPERITY OF THE AMERICAN PEOPLE, ARE ALSO DIRECTED AT THE PRESENT TIME.

(SIGNED) SOFOULIS, PRESIDENT OF THE CHAMBER.

CEREMONIES IN ATHENS AND SALONIKI

The Bicentennial received its greatest ovations in Greece in the ancient cities of Athens and Saloniki, where it was celebrated in the form of receptions, colonial balls, speech-making at public gatherings, Thanksgiving Day dinners, and addresses before educational institutions.

On February 22, 1932, at the Hotel Angleterre in Athens the Athens Post of the American Legion staged a gala reception and ball which, according to Hon. Lester Maynard, American Consul General, were attended by American and foreign officials as well as leading Greek officials, their families and the local American colony. The decorations, music and programs reflected the Bicentennial motif.

During the afternoon Prof. Samuel Elliott Basset, Professor of Greek at the University of Vermont, was invited by the American Legion to give a lecture on the life of Washington in the hall of the Greek Archeological Society. The students of Athens College and the American college for Girls learned special patriotic songs for the occasion and attended in a body. From THE ATHENS TIMES, an English language newspaper published in the capital city, the address of Professor Basset is quoted as follows:

In addressing the American Legion of Athens I am moved to say: "Fellow Americans and Fellow Greeks"—"Fellow Greeks" because many years ago in many parts of this land I broke bread with the Greeks. I learned to know at first hand that human virtue of hospitality for which Hellenes have always been famous.

Homer frequently illustrates that virtue. Pericles in his Funeral Oration says that Athens, the Hellas of Hellas, differed from other nations because "we unhesitatingly benefit others, not from any consideration of profit, but because of the nobility of the act."

More than two thousand years later the modern Hellenes gave signal proof that the words of Pericles were no exaggeration; when, within the last decade, although their land was crowded with newcomers of their own race, they nevertheless threw open their doors to thousands of needy aliens, "not from any consideration of profit, but because of the nobility of the act."

This disinterested consideration for the stranger, a virtue typically Hellenic, if it could become worldwide, would help to smooth out many an international difficulty and would certainly increase the friendship between nations. For the individual who has once shared the hospitality of the Greeks, as I did thirty years ago, always thereafter feels an intimate fellowship with every Greek.

There is another peculiarly Greek virtue—which likewise might be cultivated by all nations with profit to the world—that prompts me to say "Fellow Americans."

This is the capacity for a certain other nationalism, or at least a binationalism. I mean the ability to extend the love of country so that it includes more than one nation, and at the same time to deepen the loyalty of both nations.

The ancient Hellene when he settled in a distant colony could be loyal to the land of his adoption without forsaking his allegiance to his mother city.

So his modern descendant who becomes an American citizen maintains his pride in Greece and his loyalty to her religion, her language and her national interests, and at the same time proves himself a loyal American.

The Greeks in America alone of the newer American citizens have a strong and flourishing organization whose two-fold aim is to strengthen their allegiance to Hellas and to increase their effectiveness as American citizens, and their loyalty to America.

There is no more convincing evidence of this loyalty than the record as American soldiers of men like you gentlemen of the Athens Post of the American Legion, and the fact that your Post is the largest in the American Legion outside of America.

As members of the American Legion you rightly honor today the memory of the First Commander-in-Chief of the American army.

But this commemorative gathering which you have assembled, because it is held at a time when men all over the world are looking with grave anxiety towards the immediate future of human civilization and because this occasion is celebrated by Greeks and Americans in this city of Athens has an international and deeply human significance.

Today marks the two hundredth and therefore notable anniversary not of any particular achievement of George Washington as General or President, but of his birth. We are gathered to pay honor to George Washington as a man and as a great man.

Among the great men of history there have been prophets, men with a more human vision of a better future for mankind.

Washington was not a prophet. There have also been men of genius, who have revealed some unusual capacity in art or science or invention, as generals or statesmen, so far beyond the experience of mankind that it seemed superhuman.

By the verdict of history, Washington was not one of these. Yet, although he was neither a genius nor a prophet he holds a firm place among the men of all time and he does this by reason of his qualities as a man.

Few human beings lack these qualities utterly, but in Washington they reached heroic proportions. It was by his heroic human qualities and not by prophetic vision or by the gift of genius that Washington made possible the establishment of the American nation, and by the same qualities that he made an indelible impression upon the government of that nation during the formative years of its infancy.

A nation is often measured by its material success. Men forget how much of that success may have been due to external considerations; to its geographical position and the lavish gifts of nature and of fortune. The growth of the United States of America from a weak and obscure State to a great world power is, of course, a notable achievement. But the fact that since its beginning, more than one hundred and fifty years ago, it has continued under the same free government, with no Dictator for the briefest period and with no other even temporary abrogation of the chief principles of its Constitution, is of greater significance for human progress.

Where in history has democracy shown an equal stability? And nothing can be more fitting than that in Athens, where all around us are monuments of the world's first great democracy of two thousand years ago, we should pay honor to the father of the most permanent experiment in modern democracy.

It is most appropriate that in Athens, which through Socrates first taught the world the supreme importance of developing the highest qualities of the man, we should pay tribute to the memory of Washington, who contributed to the permanence of free government by reason of his human qualities.

Washington was a man, even as you and I, but, unlike us, he was a man of heroic size. Homer would have said of him "surpassing the men of today."

He was a man writ large in letters of gold. He had the qualities of other men of his class, who were Virginian gentlemen, but their qualities in him reached heroic proportions. They were "Homeric"; like those which flourished in the time of which Homer sings, in that springtime of the human race, when life was deeply and strongly lived in all its joys and sorrows and in all its responsibilities and obligations.

Like Homer's heroes, Washington enjoyed the good things of life, "the dance and the song, which are the garnishments of the feast." As any Homeric prince he found enjoyment in overseeing his country estate, its broad acres with its cattle and its tilled fields.

His temper would sometimes blaze forth like the wrath of Achilles, but unlike Achilles, after the brief outburst, Washington cherished no grudge.

His laughter was Homeric, boisterous with the joy of living, and like Homer's heroes, he was not ashamed of tears. When he bade farewell to his officers at the close of the war he threw his arms around their necks and kissed them, with tears of emotion; and when he delivered his farewell address to Congress we are told that his eyes were wet.

So he was loved as few men of history. Because of the heroic proportions of his lovable qualities as a man he was "first in the hearts of his countrymen."

But Washington revealed in still grander proportions and this is the secret of his greatness—a more positive, more effective, more irresistible, human quality, which alone meets every test in a great crisis. There has never been any doubt what this quality was. In 1770, before Washington had shown any sign of greatness, a contemporary wrote of him "he is a young man of extraordinary and exalted character."

More than a century and a half later, in a book published last year, a noted American historian sums up the verdict of history in these words:

"When we think of Washington it is not as a general, nor as an executive or diplomat; we think of the man who by sheer force of character held a divided and disorganized army together until victory was achieved, and who after peace was won, still held his disunited countrymen by their love and respect and admiration for himself until a nation was welded into enduring strength and unity."

"Sheer force of character" was the secret of Washington's greatness.

Fifty years ago every American child knew by heart the story of Washington and the cherry tree: how as a small boy, possessed of his first hatchet, he cut down his father's favorite cherry tree, and when his father questioned him about it, he admitted that he cut it down, because, as he said, "I can not tell a lie."

The cold light of historical criticism has relegated this story to the realm of myth. Yet this myth of Washington and the cherry tree is in the highest sense true.

"The highest and noblest thing that history can be," says Gilbert Chesterton, "is a good story, for this appeals to the heart of all generations and prints indelibly a great lesson of the past."

The story of the cherry tree pictures concretely, vividly and unforgetably the historical truth that sheer force of character, that is, a serious recognition of the deeper responsibilities of life and of the basic principles of right living, and an unswerving loyalty to both, is the human quality which is essential in the effective life, especially in its crises, great or small, for it is like a rock that can not be shaken by any storm of adversity.

In the dark days of Valley Forge, when the Continental army was reduced to a few thousand half-naked, half-starved soldiers, when the Confederacy was all but bankrupt in finances and—what was worse—in morale, America still had a sufficient asset in the sheer force of character of George Washington.

For the serious recognition and the loyal acceptance of the deeper responsibilities of life makes a man an effective optimist.

He has no room in his heart nor time to spare for Fear, the Black Mother of Helplessness.

And the fearlessness and confidence of the leader awakens in his followers a responsive confidence, that we call morale, that makes men all but invincible.

It was by this his sheer force of character that Washington laid the enduring foundations of American democracy; it was this which gave his life historical significance and made it a lasting possession of humanity, and it is this that lends to this two hundredth anniversary of his birth a timely and an international significance.

The present world crisis has arisen not unnaturally after a century in which human progress has been too largely one-sided.

The improvement of the conditions and means of living has outstripped the progressive development of the principles of living.

There has been a time-lag in the development of the highest human qualities.

The world has forgotten the immortal words of Socrates, uttered in the ancient Agora yonder, in the very building whose foundations came to light last year: "Concern yourselves not first of all nor so earnestly for the things of man as for the man himself that he may be as excellent as possible."

The world has been so much interested in producing wealth that it has not had much time to give to producing character. In prosperity this lack of an even balance between the things of the man and the man himself is less noticed, but in a crisis like the present the need of men, like Washington, is apparent.

The world today is rich in resources, in the materials of prosperity; the only shortage is in morale and in leaders of strong character, confident themselves and trusted by their countrymen.

Instead of morale we have fear, whose daughter is helplessness; instead of strong leaders ready to act, and backed by united nations, there are too many who hesitate and seem uncertain what their countrymen expect them to do.

Suppose there were today in every nation—as fortunately there are in some nations—one man who like Washington because of his lovable human qualities, and above all by his sheer force of character, could unite and inspire with confidence the people of his own nation, and the other nations.

There would be a speedy solution of the world's present difficulties. And only such men can save civilization in crises that are likely to occur from time to time hereafter.

We are apt to think that just ahead, somewhere beyond the first bend in the road, lies the millennium, a prosperity free from depressions, a world without crises.

But the conditions of our mortality are such that while humanity may rise to unknown heights, its ascent is continually marked by critical periods of danger, when civilization can be kept from a fall only by heroic human qualities, especially by sheer force of character and personality like that of Washington. Herein lies the deep human significance of this two hundredth anniversary of his birth.

A few months ago there came to light an American newspaper of January 4, 1800, containing a full account of the funeral of Washington, which had been held shortly before.

The account concluded with these words:

"The sun was now setting. Alas the sun of glory was set forever. No!—the name of Washington, the most illustrious and beloved personage which America has produced, will triumph over death. The unclouded brightness of his glory will illuminate the future ages."

This prophecy, stripped of its rhetoric, has been fulfilled, as a thousand commemorative gatherings like this give evidence today.

But homage of the lips, and mere passive recognition of Washington's greatness is doing but half-hearted honor to his memory. The ancient Hellenes of the Age of Pericles paid a more sincere tribute to the great men of their heroic past by imitating and emulating them.

The greatness of our present age is largely due to our use of the physical power which past ages have stored up in the earth for us.

We are fools if we fail to make an equal use of the power of the human spirit, developed by the heroic great of all time, of whom Washington was one.

The obligation which rests upon us and upon all the millions who remember Washington today is to see that his heroic qualities are indispensable in our present civilization, that we give them preference in the exercise of our franchise, and that we do what we can to focus the attention of education and of all agencies for moulding public opinion in the need for developing a serious recognition and a loyal acceptance of the deeper responsibilities of life, what we call force of character.

Then we shall be profiting by the lesson of history; we shall be doing what we can to avoid a further one-sided progress of humanity, and we shall be paying the most profound and effective tribute to the undying fame of Washington.

JULY 4 IN ATHENS

On Independence Day, July 4, 1932, the entire American colony in Athens and many of their

Athenian friends convened at the Greek Archeological Society's hall to pay honor to George Washington. In the principal address Hon. Edwin A. Plitt, American Consul in Athens, reminded his listeners that Washington had only a solemn faith in the future when he and his compatriots were struggling to establish a new nation, while Americans of today have a rich and traditional past on which to found all efforts for world recovery. The full text of Consul Plitt's address reads as follows:

I believe that patriotism should be the keynote of any address delivered during an Independence Day celebration. Much of the significance of the meaning of the word seems, however, to have been lost in these days of world-wide depression and increasing belief in internationalism to cure the ills that seem to be besetting us humans in every field of endeavor. Therefore, the fact that so many of us have braved the discomfort of a rather warm afternoon and gathered here to celebrate an event which is the most important milestone in the development of our United States, is proof that as far as we are concerned patriotism is still a live issue with us. And being so far from home, makes our appreciation of it but the keener. For it is not our daily contact with other nationalities that makes us think more of our own? Subconsciously we are forever comparing our ways with those of the people around us, and the mere fact that another carries the same kind of passport as ourselves forms a powerful bond of unity in the knowledge of which we can gather added strength to accomplish the various tasks that have been assigned to us to carry on overseas.

I sometimes wonder, however, whether we actually make the best use of this bond of national sympathy and mutual ideals, for I fear that today there may be few of us, no matter whether we happen to meet on Broadway or Stadium Street, whose conversation does not sooner or later turn toward the subject of these hard times. And this indicates neither an optimistic nor patriotic outlook upon life. True patriotism is more than periodical flag waving, and should not be something which is reserved only for those days which happen to be indicated in red on the calendar, but should be with us throughout the year. Fortunately, it is with a great many, and it is to those in every country regardless of whether its emblem is white and blue, or red, white and blue, that whatever progress has been achieved by them, that appreciation is due.

But no progress is possible without faith in the future. Therefore, patriotism and optimism must go hand in hand. Pessimism never extended frontiers, neither did it build railroads, ships, airplanes, nor the great cities and industries that we have today. It is true, the world is passing through a temporary period of difficulties that has made so many look upon the future with apprehension. But is it not possible that we advanced a bit too fast in the last twenty years, and we must now mark time for awhile in order that we may the better accommodate ourselves with the natural rhythm of a more normal progress? Perhaps as yet unrealized by us, we may be on the threshold of a new and greater period of material and spiritual evolution, the benefits of which may be beyond our present limited comprehension, and we should be grateful to be able to be a part thereof. With this in mind, let us compare our position then with another period of long ago, but of particular significance to us.

When the first Americans wrested a few stony acres from the wilderness they had only their faith in the future to help them along. George Washington, whose bicentennial is being celebrated throughout the world this year, wherever Americans are gathered together, had only his own optimism and patriotic faith of his supporters to help him mould thirteen poor little colonies into the semblance of a political unit, which but few outside of its own boundaries at the time believed could successfully stand up against a powerful European nation.

But it did, and so well, that we are here to celebrate the achievement today. And what has happened since? In less than a half a century later, this small strip along the Atlantic seaboard, brought into political unity by Washington, expanded across a territory larger than Europe, and made the broad Pacific its western boundary. And since then, its people—that is, those whom you and I represent here today—developed this vast empire to such an extent that it became the magnet that for over a hundred years attracted all citizens of the world who became dissatisfied with the limitations of the places of their birth. And still they come, clamoring in thousands to be let into its gates, convinced that no matter what ills are besetting the rest of the world, America's future does not lie behind her. Of such achievement it is our patriotic privilege to be rightfully proud.

Some of our history, like that of other great nations as well, has had to do with wars. But patriotism is not reserved only for such periods of national stress. It serves in times of peace as well. It calls for the same amount of personal sacrifices and optimism as to the outcome of our endeavors—only the drama of the battlefield is lacking. Many of us here today, have seen the latter with our own eyes, and we know from such dire experience that perseverance was required to overcome the hardships we then faced, and this same patriotism and unity of purpose will once again help us and the rest of the world to a brighter future. But to achieve it we must not only have the same faith in the outcome as we had fourteen years ago, but we must work as well, and shift the callous from the spinal terminal to the palm, as someone has so aptly expressed it. No matter what form our patriotism takes, so far as our own problems are concerned, the potentialities of America are so great, such problems may be looked upon as only incidental in the forward march of a great people.

In the first century and a half of its existence the United States became the richest nation of the world, with its full development still lying hidden in the centuries to come. Washington and his time had only their faith in the future to help them and carry on their task; we have that same faith, but in addition thereto the assurance of achievement as reflected in our history; and the exercising of the same manner of straight thinking, common sense, and kindness, that distinguished the early Americans, enabling them to overcome all obstacles, and which qualities have through the years become a national characteristic, will once more carry us over the top in this great economic struggle of the world.

As I have said, we can rightfully be proud in having a share in this, and for those of us who are living in a foreign land that has so warmly welcomed us to its hospitable shores, and are looked upon by our Greek friends as representative Americans, there is an exceptional opportunity to demonstrate this national trait at the present time, which will not only add honor to us individually, but become a patriotic service to that great commonwealth so far away, which is your and my United States.

The concluding Bicentennial observance in Athens was held on Thanksgiving Day, when the American Legion, Athens Post, again was responsible for the staging of a Washington dinner and dance. Consul Lester Maynard presided and the affair was attended by American and Greek Governmental officials and members of the American colony of Athens.

PROGRAM IN SALONIKI

In Saloniki, known in the days of Paul the Apostle as Thessalonica and now famous for its archeological wonders and Byzantine architecture, the name of George Washington was given significant honor. On Sunday evening, February 21, 1932, a public Washington service was held at the Anatolia College. The principal feature of this occasion was the address of Hon. Charles J. Pisar, American Consul at Saloniki, in which the major events of the life of the First President of the United States were developed. Mr. Pisar repeated his address the following morning before the student body and guests of the Thessalonica Agricultural and Industrial Institute. At the latter school Mr. Pisar's address was preceded by the remarks of Mr. C. L. House and an address delivered in Greek by Mr. Costa Zannas, one of the Grecian members of the Board of Trustees of the school, on the subject of George Washington, emphasizing particularly his life as an agriculturist. During the afternoon an athletic program took place and in the evening a Greek translation of Mr. Pisar's address was read before a native audience and several of the students related instances in the life of Washington. Mr. Pisar's address follows:

Tomorrow, February 22, there will be celebrated in the United States, and in all other countries wherever Americans may foregather, the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of George Washington, who is associated in the minds of all Americans with the eulogy declaring him to have been "First in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen."

As a soldier and statesman Washington stands forth as the outstanding international as well as national figure of his time. But it was his great character which inspired men, not only those who were his contemporaries but those who have followed since. His fearlessness, honesty and unselfishness, sound judgment and unflagging determination, together with an unlimited ambition for his country, enabled him to achieve victory for the cause of independence almost single-handed, and organize the colonies into the Republic of the United States in spite of the most discouraging difficulties and obstacles which ever beset a man.

Before I go on further with this review of the life of Washington let me tell you something of the colonization of North America and of the conditions that existed before and at the time when Washington appeared upon the scene.

In the sixteenth century numerous attempts were made by the French, Spaniards and the English to colonize North America but it was not until the beginning of the seventeenth century that the English efforts met with success. In 1606 the Virginia Company was chartered in England. At that time the name of Virginia was used to designate the whole of the territory which was claimed by England. The members of this company were divided into two principal groups, those who resided in or near London, and those who lived in southwestern England in the vicinity of Plymouth. To the Londoners the King gave the right to colonize the territory between Cape Fear and the Potomac River, and the Plymouth men he gave a similar right to plant colonies north of the Hudson River. The first expeditions sent out by these companies were not successful due largely to the fact that its members were imbued with the idea of finding gold and returning to England instead of building homes and remaining as permanent settlers. They found the country inhospitable, the winter climate in the north was severe, and the Indians unfriendly. Their numbers soon became decimated, and those who survived returned to England. These failures, however, did not deter others from seeking their fortunes in the new land. New companies were formed which profited by the experience of the former enterprises, were more successful and soon numerous colonies sprang up along the entire Atlantic seaboard from Massachusetts to Georgia.

Although the first settlers came to America principally for economic reasons, many of those who came later sought asylum in the new world where they could worship God according to the dictates of their conscience. Among the first of these people were the Pilgrims or nonconformists whom King James determined to make conform to the established Church or drive them out of England. This group was followed by the Massachusetts Bay Company which was eminently prosperous. Subsequently other groups came to America to seek religious freedom, headed by Roger Williams and Anne Hutchinson. A group of Catholics founded a colony in Maryland under Lord Baltimore, while the Society of Friends or Quakers, under the able leadership of William Penn, settled in Pennsylvania. Following the discovery of the Hudson River by Henry Hudson, a sturdy colony was founded by the Dutch at what is now New York City, while the Swedes, whose King, Gustavus Adolphus, also had a colonial aspiration, settled in southern Delaware.

All these settlers made their home in the narrow strip of land between the Atlantic seaboard and the Appalachian Mountains which is nowhere more than 250 miles wide. It was a wild and thickly wooded region which required hard work before it could be cleared and made productive. In most parts the Indians were unfriendly and distrustful of the newcomers. In the northern colonies the people engaged in shipbuilding and trading; those in the middle colonies engaged in trade, while in the south they became large land owners and planters.

During the 125 years which passed between the founding of the first permanent English colonies in North America and the birth of Washington the colonization of America was attended by many difficulties, struggles, quarrels and dissensions among the colonies and the companies, and between the colonists and their royal governors. Political and religious quarrels took place in some of the colonies and in several instances whole factions broke away from the parent colonies to settle elsewhere. Notwithstanding all these, the colonies continued to grow, new settlers came from Europe, so that by 1732, the year of Washington's birth, 600,000 people had settled in the new world. It was not, however, until shortly before Washington's birth that any serious attempt had been made by the settlers to venture into the frontier wilderness beyond the Allegheny Mountains in which movement Washington was later prominently identified.

In 1656, John Washington, then 20 years of age, the son of a preacher in a small English village, and the great-grandfather of George Washington, came to Virginia. He was later joined by his brother, Lawrence, who had been previously in America, in permanent residence on a rich tract of land between the Rappahannock and Potomac Rivers. It was an uninhabited region, except for the Indians. Both the Washington brothers were prudent men and readily accumulated estates in Virginia where they prospered shrewdly with the rest.

John Washington became a notable figure in the Virginia Colony and took considerable interest in its government. He took care to raise his children in a way to prosper at the very first. Seventy-six years later the Washingtons were still to be found on the land settled by him. They had become thorough Virginians and closely identified with the life of the new country.

Augustine Washington, the grandson of John, and the father of George, in his turn inherited most of the family estates, in addition to which he acquired other property. He also had interests in an iron mine, and on the whole was very comfortably situated. By a first marriage he had two sons, Lawrence and Augustine. George was the eldest son by a second marriage. His father had every means to give him as good a schooling as could be had at that time, but he died when George was 11 years of age, and in his will he provided for him only the portion of a younger son. As Virginia custom dictated, the bulk of the estate went to Lawrence, the eldest son. Augustine, the second son, received most of the property in Westmoreland County. George, who had been left to the guardianship of his young mother, shared with the four younger children the residue of the estate. He was to inherit his father's farm on the Rappahannock River, when he became of age, but for the rest he had to look out for himself. His father and two older brothers had been to England to get their schooling and preparation for life, but George could only hope to get such elementary and practical education as was to be had in Virginia at that time. He might have grown up with very little education but he had an eager mind and strong will which led him to acquire learning despite the lack of advantages.

His formal schooling ended at the age of 13. Even at that age he showed considerable business instinct and gave much time to preparing himself to become a practical business man. Washington was undoubtedly in every sense of the word a self-made man. When his regular instruction ended, his education began, and through all his later years he was constantly absorbing knowledge from contact with men, from an extensive library which he had accumulated, and from a wide correspondence. One of the most recent foreign biographers of Washington said: "At 16 he did not evince the same brilliant ingenuity shown by Benjamin Franklin at the same age nor were his the divine gifts of Voltaire, that favorite of the most refined society which ever existed. Even so, he was neither a fool nor a bumpkin; the character and precision of mind were apparent from the days of his earliest training. If he was not quick to seize an idea, if dreams came seldom into the province of his imagination, if he was practically unable to define or to express his feelings, at least from an early age he was able to recognize and appreciate things as they were. Indeed, upon this, his entire life and all his actions were hinged so rigidly and exactly that he inspired sympathy in everyone he met. The young Franklin, the young Voltaire, the young Rousseau were uprooted; the young Washington was solidly rooted in the soil he loved and which suited him. In his peregrinations as a boy from one Virginia manor to another he learned more than Latin, French, and fencing. He learned to know his country, its climate, its seasons, its yield, the disposition of its inhabitants, the character of its notables, the value of its negroes; in fact the import of every cloud on its horizon."

When sixteen years of age Washington became a surveyor and for four years earned a living and much experience in that calling. Through his brother Lawrence, who was the owner of Mount Vernon, and other wealthy land owners, he obtained many important commissions, and was thrown into contact with the leading people of the colony. His first surveying commission which he undertook for Lord Fairfax, who had been granted extensive land rights in the Shenandoah Valley, which was then still unknown and unsettled, was carried out with such capability and despatch that although he was self-taught, he was recommended and appointed the first official surveyor for Culpeper County. He soon became an expert on the country beyond the Allegheny Mountains.

In 1751, when his brother, Lawrence, died, he found himself named as executor of his will, and subsequently by its provisions inherited the estate of Mount Vernon.

It was at this time that the French who had come down from Canada were laying claim to the rich Ohio Valley west of the Alleghenies. They had driven out the early English colonists who had settled where Pittsburgh now stands and had built a fort. The English would not tolerate the encroachments of the French into their territory. Governor Dinwiddie of Virginia had instructions to settle the Ohio Valley and to provide the settlers with the necessary protection through the construction of a series of forts down the Ohio River. Knowing Washington for his knowledge of the country, his experience as a woodsman and a hardy traveller, Governor Dinwiddie chose him, although only 21 years of age, as his messenger to the French Commander in north-western Pennsylvania to warn him of England's claim to the Ohio Valley and to demand his withdrawal. Washington accomplished the 250-mile journey without a mishap, winning the confidence of the Indians he met on his way. The French, however, were determined to stay. Washington learned what their intentions were, and the report which he prepared for Governor Dinwiddie was considered of enough importance to be sent from London to all the European capitals by way of justifying Great Britain in making war upon France.

For the next twenty years Washington was identified with one expedition or another into the territory beyond the Alleghenies, either under commission from the Governor of Virginia or on behalf of himself or his friends. He led a force of Virginia Militia against the French, accompanied General Braddock as a personal aide in a campaign against the French at Fort Duquesne, built numerous roads, and a series of forts in the Shenandoah Valley to protect the settlers against the increasing raids of the Indians who were growing restive under the advance of the white settlers.

During all this time Washington continued to give close attention to his estates. He was an expert farmer. He was one of the first farmers in Virginia to resort to scientific fertilization and the rotation of crops, and kept extensive records of his experiments. His estate was managed in a businesslike manner. He kept a very careful set of account books for it, as he did for his other enterprises. Overseers made weekly reports showing just how each laborer was employed and what crops had been planted or gathered. While he was absent reports were made to him and he replied in long letters of instruction. He overlooked no detail in carrying on his farm according to the practice of the day. He also successfully managed the estates which had been left to his step-children.

In addition to his interest in farming, Washington was also associated in many business enterprises which included drainage and lumber operations in the Dismal Swamp of Virginia. He was interested in several real estate and transportation companies. When his brother Lawrence was still alive he became interested with him in the Ohio Company, which had a grant of 500,000 acres of land on the east side of the Ohio River. Later on he conceived a plan for an Atlantic-Mississippi waterway and navigation between Lake Erie and the Ohio River by a series of canals. Even after the Revolutionary War, Washington's pioneering interest did not abate, and he made an extensive expedition into the wilderness on behalf of the Potomac Company, of which he was the head, to look into the possibility of opening navigation through to the West.

During all this time the colonies were prospering and a lucrative trade was being developed not only with England but with the West Indies, France and other countries. England felt, however, that she was not getting a full share of this trade, and a series of Navigation Acts were imposed upon the colonists prohibiting them to trade with any other country but England. No manufacturing was permitted in the colonies, which were required to sell all their raw materials to England and purchase from the mother country their requirements of manufactured goods. English manufacturers were not permitted to export looms and other industrial equipment to the colonies.

In 1763, England having concluded a rather costly war with France, and not wishing to make any further experiments in illegal taxation at home, turned to the colonies as a source of revenue. Under the pretext of protecting the colonists against the French and the Indians, but really to obtain provision for their maintenance, England sent 10,000 troops to be quartered among the colonists at their expense. A series of stamp and import taxes were imposed upon the colonists, all of which were stoutly resisted on the plea that the Crown had no authority to impose taxation to which the colonists had not given their consent. No taxation without representation became the slogan of the day.

In addition to a tax on tea, the sole right for the importation of tea into the colonies was given by the British Parliament to the East India Company. The colonies resolved to refuse and boycott this tea. When the exporters at Boston attempted to land this tea a number of colonists, disguised as Indians, boarded the three ships then in the harbor and threw the tea overboard. To punish the colonists, the harbor of Boston was closed to trade, and other repressive measures were adopted. In order to carry out these measures British troops were concentrated at Boston under General Gage. The colonists took counter measures. They met at Philadelphia and drew up a Bill of Rights in which they defined their attitude. Two of the American leaders, John Hancock and Samuel Adams, had been marked down by the British Government for arrest on a charge of treason. They were known to be in Lexington, about 11 miles from Boston, and on April 18, 1775, Gage sent his forces for their arrest and to seize certain stores which had been accumulated by the colonists at Concord. His movements were observed, the colonists were forewarned, and when the British arrived at Lexington they were confronted by a company of militia, upon whom they opened fire. They next continued to Concord, where they found that the stores had been removed. The firing at Lexington brought out new levies of armed colonists from all directions. A skirmish occurred at Concord. The British then retreated to Charleston, to where they were pursued by the colonists until they were within the protection of their warships in Boston Harbor. Instead of returning to their homes, the colonists decided to lay siege to Boston.

The war having now begun, the need for a strong commander to lead the colonial forces became evident. In view of his character, training and expression, it was only natural for the Second Continental Congress to select Washington for the task.

He assumed direction at the military operations on July 3, 1775, and at once found that he had a most disheartening task before him. His army, based on short terms of enlistment, constantly changed in number and personnel; he had no heavy guns suited to siege operations, and for weeks at a time had no powder save what the men had in their pouches. Washington was obliged to present a bold front to the enemy but was unable to undertake any active movement or to explain the reasons for his inaction. In the winter of 1775-1776 heavy guns, which had been captured in the previous spring at Ticonderoga and Crown Point by men from Western New England, were drawn over the snow to his lines, and the capture of a British vessel provided the necessary powder. Now, at last, Washington was able to assume the offensive. In March, 1776, he seized Dorchester Heights, overlooking Boston, which no longer became tenable to the British, who evacuated the town and left the harbor.

When the American colonies at first undertook to resist the British troops which had been sent out to enforce the unjust laws and taxes which had been imposed upon them, there were many people, including Washington, who had no intention of breaking away from the mother country and setting up an independent nation. Most of them were content to remain under British rule but sought greater freedom and a more liberal policy on the part of the British rulers. As the war progressed and the colonies realized that they could expect no change in the attitude of England, the desire for independence grew. In 1776, Washington wrote: "When I took command of the army, I abhorred the idea of independence; now I am convinced that nothing else will save us." On July 4, 1776, the colonies declared themselves a free and independent nation and from then on the war was prosecuted with the purpose of making that independence in fact as well as in name.

The conditions that Washington found when he assumed command of the Colonial troops repeated themselves throughout the early part of the war, which dragged on for eight years. From the outset there was always great difficulty in securing the requisite number of soldiers and in keeping up a disciplined force. The people were usually ready to turn out for a few weeks, but enlistments for a term of years were hard to obtain. In the latter part of 1776 Washington was able to persuade Congress to authorize the formation of a permanent force. Many obstacles were encountered in organizing this force, but the soldier when drilled became a splendid force, able to encounter successfully their own number of veterans of the opposite side. Now that the forces had been organized, Congress still failed to provide the troops with adequate clothing and food, and sometimes failed to pay them for months. The army underwent terrible sufferings during the cold winters, and particularly at Valley Forge in the winter of 1777, when the men were without blankets and food, and at one time nearly 3,000 were unfit for duty for want of shoes and clothing. Washington wrote of his troops at that time: "Naked and starving as they are, we cannot enough admire the incomparable patience and fidelity of the soldiery. . . ."

Throughout all this time Washington fought hard for his troops, but Congress was without funds, and little could be done in the early years of the struggles until, with the defeat of the British in the north, the success of the cause of the Colonists was assured and help came from abroad. In addition to the difficulties Washington had in keeping his army together, there were many disaffected officers and suspicious members of Congress who were trying to disparage everything he did, and to displace him in his command. A weaker man might have succumbed to the intrigues which were carried on against him, but his character, determination and patriotic devotion to the cause carried him on to complete the task he had undertaken.

His great abilities as a soldier were manifest throughout the war. His generalship extending over a series of years from the siege of Boston to the fall of Yorktown, we are told, is unrivaled in the history of warfare. When Lord Cornwallis surrendered to him after the battle of Yorktown he expressed his admiration for the skill with which Washington had conducted the campaign all the way from New York, adding that his "achievements in New Jersey were such that nothing could surpass them."

The United States were now independent, but the problems which confronted them were as difficult as the securing of their independence had been. The war had failed to unite them into one nation. No one realized this more than Washington. He sent a circular letter to the state Governors in which he expressed his fears in language which showed what a statesmanlike view he had of the situation. He wrote: "It is yet to be decided whether the revolution must ultimately be considered a blessing or a curse. . . . This is the moment for the Americans to establish or ruin their character forever. . . . There should be lodged somewhere a supreme power to regulate and govern the general concerns of the confederated republic, without which the Union cannot be of long duration."

For the next four years, although Washington turned to his estates and other private business and the opening of the country beyond the Alleghenies, he continued to give much attention to the future organization of the thirteen colonies into a compact nation, and in 1787 presided over the convention which drafted the Constitution of the United States.

When the Constitution was at last adopted by the thirteen states and the new republic was ready to embark on its course it was at this time that the whole country again turned to Washington as the most experienced and ablest man, and unanimously elected him President. For eight years he continued to guide the helm of state, and during that period no important national question arose which did not receive his personal attention and decision. He laid down the principles of such vital questions as public revenue, public debt, and civil and criminal law of the republic, the admission of new states, the treatment of the Indians, the system of taxation, and the protection of life and property.

His early self-training in business manifested itself in the organization of a national bank which provided a basis for the national credit. When he assumed the presidency the country was hopelessly in debt, contracted during the war, and had no credit, and when he closed his term of office a large part of this debt had been paid, and the country's credit established.

During his presidency Washington continued to give considerable attention to the opening and development of the territory west of the Alleghenies. Both Virginia and North Carolina consented that part of their territory beyond the mountains be given a separate organization, out of which the states of Kentucky and Tennessee were formed and admitted into the Union. In the northeast Vermont was organized out of a part of New Hampshire land grants and also admitted as a state, so that at the close of Washington's administration the original thirteen states had increased to sixteen; the great Northwest territory had been organized, and Ohio was almost ready to enter the Union.

We therefore see that Washington in addition to being a great soldier was also a great statesman. He was a builder, a creator. All his life was devoted to building up the country he loved so well. It has often been said that had there been no revolutionary war Washington would have been a great man. The American experiment in the organization of its Federal Government under the leadership of Washington proved so successful that all the nations that arose in the Western Hemisphere drew their inspiration from the example.

After seeing the new nation firmly planted on its feet, Washington at the close of his second term of office was ready to let others carry on. He was anxious to return to his estate at Mount Vernon, which had been neglected during his absence, and to spend his last days in the quiet of his home on which he had spent much time to beautify. He was also anxious to get back to his books, for he was a great reader and probably had one of the largest libraries of any gentleman in the colonies at that time. He was a prolific writer, and nearly 20,000 letters are in existence which contain his sentiments. His writings, not including his journals, general orders, and state papers, fill fourteen volumes. His correspondence abounds with many sayings which are as applicable today as they were in his time.

On December 12, 1799, Washington contracted a chill while riding over his estate, and two days later peacefully passed away. Shortly after his death, Napoleon, then on the eve of his own career, paid this tribute to Washington:

"The people who so lately stigmatized Washington as a rebel, regard even the enfranchisement of America, as one of the events consecrated by history and past ages. Such is the veneration excited by great characters. He seems so little to belong to modern times, that he imparts to us the same vivid impression as the most august examples of antiquity with all that they accomplished. His work is scarcely finished when it at once attracts the veneration which we freely accord to those achievements only that are consecrated by time. The American revolution, the contemporary of our own, is fixed forever. Washington began it with energy and finished it with moderation. He knew how to maintain it, pursuing always the prosperity of his country; and this aim alone can justify at the tribunal of the Most High, enterprises so extraordinary.

"His administration was as mild and firm in internal affairs as it was noble and prudent toward foreign nations. He uniformly respected the usages of other countries, as he would desire the rights of Americans to be respected by them. Thus in all his negotiations, the heroic simplicity of the President of the United States, without elevation or debasement, was brought into communication with the majesty of Kings. He sought not in his administration those conceptions which the age calls great, but which he regarded as vain. His ideas were more sage than bold; he sought not admiration, but he always enjoyed esteem, alike in the field and in the Senate, in the midst of business as in the quiet of retirement."

One hundred and twenty-six years later, President Coolidge, speaking at a joint session of the American Congress, said of Washington: "His ways were the ways of truth. He built for eternity. His influence grows. His stature increases with the increasing years. In wisdom of action, in purity of character, he stands alone. We can not yet estimate him. We can only indicate our reverence for him and thank the Divine Providence which sent him to serve and inspire his fellow men."

That is the story of George Washington—surveyor, frontiersman, road engineer, soldier, planter, commander of the colonial armies, President of the United States, the father of his country who was first in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen.

AUSTRIA

RESIDENT HERBERT HOOVER, on February 22, 1932, received the following cablegram from President Wilhelm Miklas of Austria:

VIENNA, FEBRUARY 22, 1932.

PRESIDENT HOOVER,
WASHINGTON, D. C.

ON OCCASION TODAY'S BICENTENARY BIRTH NATIONAL HERO GEORGE WASHINGTON PLEASE ACCEPT MY AND AUSTRIAN PEOPLES CORDIAL MESSAGE OF SYMPATHY AND FRIENDSHIP TO YOU AND AMERICAN NATION.

PRESIDENT MIKLAS.

The President of the Republic of Austria thus felicitated the President and the people of the United States on the Two Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington.

Even before the official opening of the Bicentennial Celebration, Austria demonstrated her regard for the First President of the United States and her friendliness to the American people. At noon on February 4, 1932, at the White House when His Excellency Edgar L. G. Prochnik, Austrian Minister to the United States, presented to President Hoover a birthday gift, from the people of Austria to the people of the United States, in commemoration of the Bicentennial of the Birth of George Washington.

The gift presented by the Austrian Minister was an equestrian statuette of George Washington, designed by Professor Dobrich, one of Austria's outstanding sculptors, and made in the Vienna Porcelain Art Works. Professor Dobrich, before making the statuette, studied every available portrait and statue of General Washington in order to make an accurate reproduction of his features.

Of gleaming white porcelain, the figures of Washington and his mount present a striking contrast to the pedestal of ebony. The base itself is decorated in sterling silver with the shields of the nine states composing the Austrian Republic: Burgenland, Corinthia, Lower Austria, Upper Austria, Salzburg, Styria, Tirol, Vorarlburg and Vienna. It bears the inscription, also on a silver shield:

1732, AUSTRIA TO THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA WITH FRIENDSHIP, ESTEEM AND ADMIRATION, 1932.

The gift and the spirit behind the gift were appreciated by the American people. Hundreds of pictures of the statuette and of the actual presentation appeared in the newspapers of the United States. The gift remains as a permanent mark of mutual respect and friendliness between the two peoples.

LARGE GATHERING AT EXERCISES IN VIENNA

A large gathering of Austrians and Americans met on the evening of February 22, 1932, in the ceremonial halls of the Neue Hofburg in Vienna to honor the memory of George Washington on the Two Hundredth Anniversary of his Birth. This festival marked the opening in Austria of the nine months' Bicentennial Celebration of the birth of the First President of the United States.

In Austria, as elsewhere, George Washington is more than the national hero of a foreign country. He is a world figure, a man who did much to elevate civilization and hasten its progress. This demonstration on February 22, which was attended by more than seven hundred people, was arranged by the America-Austria Society in conjunction with the American Women's Club and the American Medical Association of Vienna.

Johann Schober, ex-Chancellor of Austria and at the time president of the America-Austria Society, officially opened the exercises. Chancellor Schober presented to the American Minister, Gilchrist B. Stockton, a model of the equestrian statue of George Washington which was sent by the Austrian people to the American people in honor of the George Washington Bicentennial Celebration and which was presented to President Hoover by Austrian Minister Prochnik on February 4.

Minister Stockton delivered the main address of the evening. Following his address, members of the Viennese State Opera Ballet corps danced the minuet. A buffet supper and dancing concluded the program.

Minister Stockton spoke as follows:

Mr. President of the America-Austria Society; Members of the Austro-American Organizations in Vienna; and Other Friends:

Two hundred years ago today in Westmoreland County, Virginia, was born a man-child. Legend tells us that the newborn babe was husky, with large hands and feet, and at an early age possessed a voice which attracted attention. Nevertheless not even his own mother realized that her first-born had in him the makings of a future President of the United States, something every American mother of today is fully aware of, no matter how puny and insignificant her infant may appear in the eyes of others. However, fifty-five years later, after the conclusion of the work of the Constitutional Convention, Washington's mother foresaw that he would become President and is quoted as having said that she thought "he would do as well as anybody."

Last year at the Fourth of July banquet given by the American Medical Association of Vienna, I quoted the late, great George T. Baker of New York, in one of the few interviews he ever gave to the press, as having said, "There is rarely a reason good enough for anybody to talk. Silence is the secret of success." George Washington, whether or not he had ever heard this precept in a phrase so well turned, practised it assiduously all of his life. Thomas Jefferson once said of him, "I served with General Washington in the Legislature of Virginia before the Revolution and during it with Dr. Franklin in Congress. I never heard either of them speak ten minutes at a time." In 1759 the Speaker of the Virginia House of Burgesses was commissioned to thank Colonel Washington on behalf of the Colony for his recently rendered distinguished military services. The Speaker performed his task in such eulogistic terms that Washington was quite overwhelmed. He rose to acknowledge the tribute, but was so disconcerted that he was unable to articulate distinctly. He blushed and stammered, and the Speaker to relieve him of his embarrassment said quietly, "Sit down, Mr. Washington, your modesty equals your valor and that surpasses the power of any language that I possess." And yet this is the man whose memory two hundred years after his birth we are today celebrating in every nation in the world wherever a small group of Americans can be gathered together, with endless speech-making! When John Adams nominated Washington for Commander-in-Chief he indulged in such glowing terms that the latter was overcome with confusion and left the room. If he can look down on this world today and hear all the panegyrics in his honor I am quite sure that he will experience the most uncomfortable day of a doubtless much agitated spiritual existence.

If I had the valor of a Washington, or even that of the Consul General here, I too would never make a speech. I know the dangers latent in the most innocent public utterances, but I also realize that there are certain occasions like the Fourth of July and a Washington Bicentennial Celebration when speech-making by a Minister is not only permissible, but compulsory.

We are indebted to the Reverend Mason L. Weems, Episcopal clergyman, for the story of the hatchet and of the colt young George killed in an attempt to break, and for other romances of his youth. Although Washington may or may not have been incapable of telling a lie at six years of age, nevertheless we are now in possession of sufficient evidence to prove that Parson Weems even at a much more mature age was not so handicapped. The end frequently justified the means and I am confident that posterity will forgive Parson Weems his vivid imagination. I wonder now what tale the mothers of other nations relate to their offspring to impress upon them the importance of telling the truth.

I cannot recall the time when I did not know Washington's devastating reply to his irate parent, "Father, I cannot tell a lie, I did it with my hatchet." However, later in life he overcame the disability. On one occasion he wrote to a friend that the mosquitoes of New Jersey "could bite through the thickest book." He also naively records in his diary that he announced that he would leave at 8 and then immediately gave private orders to go at 5, so as to avoid the throng. After his appointment as Commander-in-Chief he wrote to his wife, "You may believe me, my dear Patsy, when I assure you in the most solemn manner that so far from seeking this appointment, I have used every endeavor in my power to avoid it," although there is some evidence that during the struggle for the prize he had been a passive although very willing candidate!

Washington's chief claim to military fame lies in his success in deceiving the enemy. At Princeton he had camp fires built along the brow of a hill for a mile and when they were all burning brightly withdrew his army, marched around the other side of the hill, and attacked the enemy at daybreak. On another occasion lacking artillery he had a row of fierce-looking, round, black spots painted on canvas which from Brooklyn looked like the mouths of cannon. Elbert Hubbard is my authority for stating that Washington even sent a note to the British threatening to fire these sham cannon, upon which the enemy, upon receiving, hastily moved out of range, and later discovering how they had been tricked, bravely sent word to Washington to "shoot and be damned."

To many of us, Washington may seem a man of great dignity, but of little sense of humor. However, careful reading reveals that even the great Father of his Country enjoyed his little joke. The King of Spain, knowing that Washington was essentially a farmer, and evidently with his tongue in his cheek, sent him a present of a jackass, which the latter promptly proposed to name in honor of the donor. When Cornwallis surrendered at Yorktown, Washington treated him with the greatest courtesy. He even gave a dinner in his honor at which Rochambeau proposed a toast to "The United States," and Washington responded with "The King of France." Cornwallis merely proposed "The King," and Washington in putting the toast expressed it as Cornwallis would have desired, "The King of England," and added "May he stay there," which, legend records, made even Cornwallis laugh, and anybody who could have made Cornwallis laugh at Yorktown is certainly entitled to be called a wit.

Washington received scant education as a boy. His father died when he was eleven, and at fifteen his school days were over. His insufficient knowledge of grammar is revealed by such entries in his diary as the complaint that the "house-keeper has done gone and left things in confusion," and the one made during his surveying days with regard to his tent which once "caught a fire," and we "was luckily preserved by one of our mens awaking." However, practice makes perfect and Washington's letters and communications of his more mature years are clear in expression and full of vigor and simple dignity.

We are constantly discovering so many things are not so which we thought we knew about Washington, that on checking up my facts I was gratified to find that John Marshall, later Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court, actually did refer to Washington in a resolution five days after the latter's death, as "First in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen." That bit of childhood Washingtonia is at least authentic and I expect to cling to it grimly.

There is one characteristic of Washington upon which all who knew him seem to agree—an almost complete control of an almost ungovernable temper. One of my most vivid mental pictures of Washington is of the young Virginian during Braddock's defeat, galloping madly about with curses and exhortations, trying to rally the British regulars, panic-stricken and terrified by the withering fire of French and Indian rifles. I can also see in my mind's eye the picture in my old school history of Washington storming at General Charles Lee whose rank disobedience had snatched a brilliant victory from Washington's grasp at Monmouth. We are told that Washington learned to curb a sharp tongue by keeping silent.

However, in spite of a calm and unruffled exterior there was always fire in his veins and even during his later life, though at infrequent intervals there were eruptions of the volcano within him. When the news of General St. Clair's crushing defeat, as a result of his disobedience of Washington's orders, reached the Chief Executive, he is said to have flown into a veritable rage and to have actually beat his forehead with his fists. Those of us who are also cursed with tempers find much comfort in the manner in which Washington through self-discipline kept his own tumultuous passions in check.

The main outlines of Washington's biography are familiar to every American, but there are some striking milestones that on such an occasion it may be worth while to recall. Before he was 25 he was allotted the task of defending a frontier more than 350 miles long with only 700 men! This early training in the realities of war together with the fifteen years he spent as a member of the House of Burgesses laid the firm foundations for his future military and political career. By 1776, when he drove the British out of Boston, he had become and remained until his death the foremost man in North America. He was unanimously chosen Commander-in-Chief of the Continental Army in 1775; unanimously elected President of the Constitutional Convention in 1787; unanimously elected the First President of the United States in 1789; and unanimously reelected in 1793. The almost universal acknowledgment of Washington's superior gifts upon the part of his contemporaries is one of the most remarkable things about his career. Another unusual thing was the fact that he, one of the richest men in the colonies, should have been one of the leaders of the Revolution. Rebels are not generally found among those who have worldly goods to lose.

Washington was a master of strategy and the Revolution was ultimately won by his never doing anything the enemy expected him to do. Few men are indispensable, but Washington was an exception. Without him, without his courage, patience, energy, fortitude, vision, and patriotism the War of Independence would undoubtedly have been lost. At the conclusion of hostilities his hold upon the country and upon the army was tremendous.

The knowledge that Washington was in favor of anything made further debate unnecessary for most people. Upon relinquishing his command he addressed a circular letter to the Governors of the liberated colonies urging with uncanny clairvoyance an "indissoluble union of the states under one federal head." How much suffering and how much bloodshed might have been saved if that single word "indissoluble" could have been inserted in the Constitution in 1787. However, at that time all of the states were probably dubious about making the experiment of union "indissoluble." Washington himself referred to the instrument as "the best constitution which could be obtained at that epoch," and devoted his vast influence, to securing its ratification.

Washington was a slave owner, but had no high regard for that institution. He "wished from his soul" that Virginia might be persuaded to abolish slavery as "it might prevent much future mischief." This is another example of this extraordinary man's inexplicable foresight. His will contained a provision freeing his slaves and also incidentally the request that no oration be pronounced at his funeral. Unfortunately he omitted including his future anniversaries.

He presided over a cabinet including both Alexander Hamilton and Thomas Jefferson, the brilliant, eloquent, and vigorous exponents of diametrically opposed political doctrines, and with wise tolerance managed to keep the peace between them.

Great emphasis has been laid upon the fact that Washington spurned a crown which might well have been his had he desired it. This was a temptation which Washington lightly brushed aside, but to which Napoleon succumbed. However, I am sure that Washington would not have taken great credit unto himself for this renunciation. Perhaps if Napoleon had been reared in the wilderness of the New World, free from monarchical traditions he might not have yielded to his ambition to establish a dynasty. Washington, too, was childless and perhaps even at the time he recognized dimly that it was a greater thing to be "the Father of his Country."

Although the people as a whole apparently never wavered in their devotion to Washington, nevertheless, like all of his successors, he was while President the target of brutal and virulent attacks, especially during his second term. It is recorded that he once said he "had never repented but once having slipped the moment of resigning his office, and that was every moment since." He was accused of having desired while Commander-in-chief to abandon the Revolutionary struggle and of embezzling public funds by drawing more than his expenses. He was ridiculed for "aping monarchy" and lampooned as "the step-father of his country." Some of his enemies even suggested the setting up of a guillotine for his benefit!

There were storms in those formative years of the Republic just as there are today. There were then, as there are also today, people who cursed the captain because he could not stop the storm instead of thanking God for a skipper who could keep the ship afloat.

Some cynic once said that God takes care of fools, children, and the United States. Every American has cause to give thanks for such providential intervention. In every great crisis the instrument has always been ready at hand—a Washington to mould the Constitution, a Marshall to interpret it, a Lincoln to preserve it.

Great figures have strode the world's stage since the dawn of civilization. Courage, brilliance, fortitude, resourcefulness, self-sacrifice, patriotism, and countless other virtues have been plentiful enough, but Washington's supreme claim to greatness can be summed up in a word—he had Character.

MUNICIPAL APARTMENT HOUSE NAMED

A lasting tribute was paid to the memory of George Washington in Vienna on May 26, 1932, when one of the municipal apartment houses, situated on a hill overlooking the Austrian capital, was named "George Washington-Hof" at impressive dedicatory ceremonies conducted under the auspices of the Viennese authorities.

The naming of this building in honor of George Washington was the development of an idea first proposed by Mayor Karl Seitz early in the year 1932. The Mayor advised the United States Minister, Mr. Stockton, of his plan which he had no doubt would be approved by the Municipal Council. That body, when apprized of the Mayor's desire, readily agreed to carry it out, and Mr. Stockton was asked to suggest an appropriate date for the dedication of the "George Washington-Hof." At his suggestion the ceremony was planned for May 26, 1932.

The program was prepared under the direction of Mayor Seitz, and, according to the REICHPOST, one of Vienna's leading newspapers, "many thousands of people assembled to attend the dedication."

A flourish of trumpets by members of the Vienna State Opera signalled the opening of the program. The "Freie Typographia" Association of Vienna, directed by Heinrich Schoof, then sang the choral ode "Wer ist Frei?"

Mayor Seitz, delivering the address of welcome, was greeted with enthusiastic applause as he mounted the speakers' platform.

A translation of the Mayor's speech, in part, follows:

Two hundred years have passed since George Washington's birth. Not only the American Union celebrates this anniversary, but the people of all countries celebrate it with America. We Viennese also want to do so, not in accordance with the calendar, but in accordance with Washington's character, on a spring day in the midst of the masses of the people of Vienna, who render homage to liberty.

George Washington has become a symbol of the spirit which causes mankind to progress, a symbol of democracy, of Republicanism. And therefore we can say to the great American people: he does not belong to you but belongs to us all—he is common property. Therefore Washington is honored throughout the world, and we Viennese, we Austrians honor him, for we know that our city and our country can advance only if inspired by the idea personified in George Washington.

The City of Vienna has affixed on this group of houses a memorial tablet on which is carved the likeness of Washington. Five thousand people have found a home here. May all Viennese who pass this spot remember for one moment the great man who was born two hundred years ago and who founded a great country. May they be strengthened by this thought to struggle further for democracy, for peace and the freedom of all people.

President Wilhelm Miklas then delivered a brief speech in which he said:

The historical fact that 200 years ago George Washington, the great American national hero and founder of a nation, was born, offers an occasion for memorial ceremonies throughout the world during this year. The Austrian federal capital seizes this historical opportunity, and its Municipal Council has decided to name one of its largest groups of apartment houses after the founder of the Great American Union and thus at the same time to honor the great hero in the cause of liberty. I heartily join in this manifestation of the Vienna Municipal Council and the people of this city, and in the name of all the people of the Austrian Federation also, the more so since all of us remember the noble relief work which Washington's great American people accomplished in times of greatest distress in Austria, particularly for the children of Vienna.

May this group of apartment houses, which reminds us in its gigantic proportions of American institutions, be at the same time a symbol of Austrian gratitude towards the American people, and a pledge of the peaceful and friendly feeling which links us with their country and all the other peoples of the world.

Enthusiastic applause greeted President Miklas at the end of his speech, and amid demonstrations of hearty approval, Minister Stockton was introduced as the next speaker. Mr. Stockton said:

Mr. Burgermeister, Ladies and Gentlemen:

I wish to express the appreciation of the United States George Washington Bicentennial Commission and of the American people for the honor conferred by the Burgermeister and Municipal Council of Vienna upon the memory of George Washington in naming this splendid group of municipal apartment buildings "George Washington-Hof," and for the medallion of Washington over the entrance, which is an excellent likeness of the first President of the United States.

I would remind you that before he was a soldier and a statesman Washington was a surveyor and an engineer. I am sure that he would have taken great interest in the attractive manner in which these buildings have been laid out, taking every advantage of the topography and overlooking the beautiful city of Vienna in the valley below. He would have admired their solid construction and applauded the manner in which each apartment is provided with light and air. The system of naming each court after the trees planted in it would also have appealed to him, as he was especially fond of trees. The United States Department of Agriculture sent me a sapling grown from the nut of an American walnut at Mount Vernon, the beloved home of Washington, which I delivered to the Burgermeister and which I trust will take root in Austrian soil and thrive as a living token of the bond of friendship between Austria and the United States.

Washington was equally interested in cities and would have loved Vienna, with its beautiful parks and handsome buildings. Although he never had the privilege of seeing any of the magnificent capitals of Europe, nevertheless he studied maps of them and asked questions concerning them of every European traveler with whom he came into contact. Washington may even be regarded as the pioneer American town-planner, as he not only inspired, but personally supervised the laying out of the beautiful and spacious capital of the United States which bears his name.

One hundred and forty-five years ago yesterday the Constitutional Convention assembled in Philadelphia and selected Washington as its president. After months of strenuous and at times disheartening labor it produced a wise compromise which, with only a few amendments has ever since remained the supreme law of the United States. Without Washington's great prestige and guiding hand, it is doubtful whether the Convention would have succeeded in its task of formulating a federal charter. Washington himself was not enthusiastic over all of its provisions, but felt that it was "the best constitution which could be obtained at that epoch."

We are always curious about the heredity and environment, the youth and education of great men. However, the probing finger of the biographer has been able to find little authentic material about Washington's early years. Apparently as a boy he was not uncommon and merely lived the vigorous, outdoor life in a pioneer community of the son of parents in moderate circumstances.

Painstaking effort has been exerted to prove that Washington was descended from an ancient and noble lineage, but careful, honest, genealogical research of recent years has revealed that like Franklin, Jefferson, Lincoln, and other towering Americans, there flowed through his veins only the blood of good, plain, pioneer stock. Washington himself, when once questioned as to his ancestry replied that it was of small moment and a subject to which he had paid little attention.

Before Washington was twenty-five he was assigned the defense of a frontier more than 350 miles long, or approximately the distance between Vienna and Innsbruck, with a command of only 700 men! This early training in the actualities of war together with the fifteen years he spent as a member of the House of Burgesses, the equivalent of an Austrian provincial diet, laid the firm foundations for his future military and political career. In 1775 he was unanimously chosen Commander-in-Chief of the Continental Army, and soon became and remained until his death the foremost man in North America. He was unanimously elected President of the Constitutional Convention in 1787; unanimously elected the first President of the United States in 1789; and unanimously re-elected in 1793. The almost universal acknowledgment of Washington's superior gifts upon the part of his contemporaries is one of the most remarkable things about his career. Another unusual thing was that he refused to accept any salary for his services as Commander-in-Chief during the Revolution. This gesture, which might have been regarded as affectation in any one else, was accepted as perfectly natural and proper when made by Washington.

Few men are ever indispensable, but Washington was an exception. Without him, without his courage, energy, tenacity, and patriotism, the War of Independence would undoubtedly have been lost. At the conclusion of hostilities his hold upon the country and upon the army was incredible. The knowledge that Washington was in favor of anything made further debate unnecessary for most people.

Although the people as a whole apparently never wavered in their devotion to Washington, nevertheless, like all of his successors, he was, at times, the target of brutal and virulent attacks. These unwarranted assaults embittered him very much, and he is recorded as having said on one occasion that "he would rather be in his grave than in his present situation." Such at times seems to be the fate of every man who would serve his country!

It is given to few men to write their own epitaphs, but no eulogy of Washington was ever more fitting than his own simple words on the death of a friend:

"He left as fair a reputation as ever belonged to a human character," and, "While living no man could be more esteemed, and since dead none more lamented."

The program was concluded by the singing of "My Old Kentucky Home," in German, by the "Freie Typographia," after which the buildings were inspected by the official party.

The bronze medallion with Washington's likeness, referred to by Mayor Seitz, was made by the eminent Austrian sculptor, Heinrich Scholz, and was unveiled during the dedicatory program. The plaque bore the following inscription in German:

IN HONOR OF GEORGE WASHINGTON (1732-1799),
FOUNDER AND FIRST PRESIDENT OF THE REPUBLIC OF THE UNITED STATES OF NORTH AMERICA, WHO WAS BORN TWO HUNDRED YEARS AGO, THIS GROUP OF APARTMENT HOUSES IS NAMED BY THE MUNICI-PALITY OF VIENNA IN THE YEAR 1932, GEORGE WASHINGTON-HOF.

The apartment house, which Vienna named in honor of George Washington, is thus described in the souvenir program of the dedication:

Vienna, the capital of the Republic of Austria, is also glad to honor the great statesman, George Washington, on the occasion of his 200th birthday.

Vienna was for four centuries the residence of the emperor of a large empire. But the great mass of the people were always liberal, democratic, and republican in their views. Thus the City of Vienna immediately declared itself, at the turning-point in 1918-1919, by an overwhelming majority of its citizens' votes, in favor of the Republic of Austria. History has placed two great tasks before this City: to protect and care for the traditional treasures of an extremely old culture and to use its whole power for the development of a community founded on liberty and self-administration. The visitors coming from near and far in ever-increasing numbers are witness that Republican Vienna has remained the long famous center of art, science, and refined social intercourse and that the City has achieved a very great deal for the economic life, the health, and the spiritual development of the masses, showing a spirit of self-sacrifice scarcely anywhere surpassed. Particularly striking among these achievements are the apartment houses and garden settlements erected by Vienna in a period of little more than ten years for more than fifty thousand families. In order to perpetuate Washington's memory in the hearts of the Vienna people, the City Administration has chosen the prettiest among the large apartment buildings recently completed, to name it in honor of Washington.

That group of apartment houses which will henceforth bear the name dear to all these republicans is not situated in the crowded central and old districts of Vienna; but on an elevation, so to speak on the shoulders of the city, under a freer and wider sky, it unfolds itself, with a lovely view of the city itself and of the rich countryside to the south. Around several courtyards, which are named after the trees planted therein, undetached houses with more than 1,000 apartments have been built. They are traversed by pretty streets and paths, and large round arches providing an open vista. On large lawns and in big parks young and old can enjoy themselves without being disturbed by the noise and dust of the traffic of the large capital. Despite the uniformity of the architecture, every courtyard offers a different happy picture. In one stand the tender birch-trees, in another blossoms white and purple lilac, in another there is the sweet perfume of acacias, and in another stand the maple-trees with big bunches of flowers. Even the smallest apartment has a balcony or a loggia facing these spots of recreation and peace. It is a small house republic, in which the inhabitants can, at a low cost, lead in their smaller or larger homes, their own free life, in which everybody enjoys the same rights and conveniences. All these people are linked together by the same economic purposes and social ideals. There are common baths and central laundries, kindergartens, and advisory centers for mothers, a large library, and a hall for assemblies, etc. The inhabitants participate as much as possible in the administration of all these institutions. Therefore they are glad to care for their maintenance.

Washington, who was a pioneer town-planner and who himself supervised the planning of the Capital of the United States which bears his name, would be pleased if he could see these buildings.

The Washington group of houses is situated in a historically interesting neighborhood. It is on the very old road leading from the town towards the crossing of the Alps into Italy. From here the crusading knights started for the Holy Land, here the Turks pushed forward against the town, and from this elevation the merchants coming from the South beheld for the first time the old city on the Danube situated beyond the hills. On the highest point of this hill, just before the entrance to the Washington-Courts, stands one of the oldest landmarks of Vienna, a gothic column called the "Spinnerin am Kreuz" (the spinner at the cross). According to the legend, a woman collected her savings during all her life to erect this religious monument here. Thus it is said that the work of art is due to the desire and wish of a woman of the people. The Washington-Courts too are intended to be, like the other large new apartment houses of the Municipality of Vienna, a monument, an expression of the wish of the Vienna people of today.

BULGARIA

HIS MAJESTY KING BORIS III of Bulgaria, Prince Cyril, the members of the palace staff, the Prime Minister and his Cabinet, and the Council of Ministers joined with the other citizens of Bulgaria and Americans resident in their midst in a series of George Washington Bicentennial observances that were described by the American Minister to Bulgaria, Hon. Henry W. Shoemaker, in official dispatches to the Department of State as "spontaneous and enthusiastic" events, meeting with a "vast response throughout the whole country."

At the beginning of the celebration King Boris expressed his own felicitations and the Bicentennial sentiments in the hearts of his people in the following radiogram to the President of the United States:

SOFIA, BULGARIA, FEBRUARY 21, 1932.

MR. HOOVER,
PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES,
WASHINGTON, D. C.

ON THE OCCASION OF WASHINGTON'S BICENTENARY THE BULGARIAN PEOPLE AND I SEND CORDIAL GREETINGS TO THE GREAT AMERICAN NATION EXPRESSING OUR ADMIRATION AND FORMING MOST HEARTY WISHES FOR THE PROSPERITY OF THE UNITED STATES.

BORIS.

The Bicentennial Celebration in Bulgaria included the following principal events:

1. A reception and tea dance to the American Colony at the home of the American Minister, Sofia, February 20, 1932.

2. Ceremonial visits at the American Legation by representatives of His Majesty King Boris, the Government of Bulgaria, and members of the Diplomatic Corps, February 22, 1932.

3. A public meeting under the auspices of the Bulgarian-American Society, Sofia, at which Mr. C. D. Chacaroff, editor of the BULGARIAN BRITISH REVIEW, an ardent student of Washington history was the speaker, February 27.
